WILLIAM ERNEST HENLEY.

By THOMAS WOOD STEVENS.

HENLEY, you will not find it lone or chill in ghostly fields of flight with nought to bar;
Not yours to drift from star to vaulted star
No man who knew you failed to know your will;
So much you were for fervent love and war,
So keen to leave a blessing or a scar,
That Death must keep you loved and hated still.

For you no art that knew but half its quest,
For you no soul that dared but half of sinning,
For you no heart that shrank from love's whole pain:
Well—now you know the darkness and the rest,
Know if the game we play is worth the winning,

KENTUCKY UNIONISTS.

By PROF. WILLIAM E. DODD.

CAPT. THOMAS SPEED'S book, "The Union Cause in Kentucky," (Putnam,) strongly commended by Justice Harlan, ought to be a good book. It is a polemic, though not of a fierce nature. Capt. Speed was himself an officer in a Kentucky regiment, and he is the historian of the Kentucky Union regiments; he has imbibed so freely at the fountain of patriotism that he cannot see how those fellow-Kentuckians who ran off to help "Jeff" Davis in 1861 could have been anything but raiders, guerrillas, and traitors. He claims for his story the stamp of unbiased history, calling in as a witness a Justice of the United States Supreme Court, and then proceeds to stigmatize all other historians of Kentucky as unworthy special pleaders or arrant rebels.

The Blue Grass State, like many others, has not been blessed with plenteous crops of historians. Capt. Speed regrets that most of those she has had did not turn their attention to other themes or get out of the field of literature altogether. Collins, Hodges, and Schaler, writers of histories of the State, are all alike displeasing to our present author. But Schaler, whose work found a place in the excellent American Commonwealths Series, comes in for the largest share of unfavorable comment. In fact, Capt. Speed says the motif of his book is to refute the shameless falsehoods of his predecessors. This attitude of mind so clearly set forth in the introduction, seriously weakens his position with the general reader; the student will class him at once with those he stigmatizes.

This is unfortunate, for the book is worth while. The accounts of the elections of 1860 and 1861, of the means by which the Unionists prevented the calling of a Convention in the Spring of 1861, of the shrewd strokes of Lincoln on behalf of the National cause in the State of his nativity, are eminently worth reading and preserving. The fact that the narrator was a participant only adds to the value of much that he says. His lists of names show how many of the leading families of that "dark and bloody ground" adhered to the Washington Government at that time of stress for our Republic.

The chapters which treat of the "Provisional Government" of Kentucky with peripatetic headquarters, of Bragg's short and ill-starred "invasion," and of the ugly work of the Confederate guerrilla chiefs are of distinct value, though the author's wandering way of telling things detracts from their interest. He repeats his assertions and quotes again and again single passages from his authorities. Some of the larger citations and reprints of important speeches, however, render the book valuable as a reference. So that the work justifies Justice Harlan's recommendation that it be given to the public. It will have value, like the works of some of Capt. Speed's repudiated predecessors, simply because it will be essential to the future historian of Kentucky and the other border States.

The importance of securing the adherence of the border States to the National Government so clearly seen by President Lincoln is re-emphasized in this book. The rampant Abolitionist of Massachusetts or the Western Reserve could never understand why Lincoln repudiated the orders of Gen. Frémont emancipating all the slaves in the territory under his command. Had he known what is clearly presented in Capt. Speed's book and what all clear-headed Kentucky Unionists saw, there would have been less criticism of the master politician in the White House. Had the President failed to handle Kentucky deftly that powerful Commonwealth would certainly have given her allegiance to the Richmond authorities, and with Albert Sidney Johnston and Beauregard stationed along the Ohio in 1861 the opening of the Mississippi would have been quite a different thing to what it was in early 1862. On how narrow margins have the existence of nations depended!

When the news of First Manassas reached Louisville it was not easy to suppress the jubilation of the secessionists. Lincoln knew that the crisis was grave; he did not insist even on Kentucky's declaring her loyalty to the Union, to say nothing of furnishing her quota of troops as called for in April preceding. He was happy to carry the elections, which came off in August, on the promise of neutrality. Of course neutrality was out of the question for any State in that fearful struggle; but at a time when a proclamation of the whole truth would have driven the State into the arms of Jefferson Davis and when the existence of the Union depended on preventing this it would have been utter folly to tell all one knew. Nobody understood this better than the alert Unionists in Kentucky. They managed well indeed when one remembers that Gov. Magoffin was an ardent Southern Rights man, a friend of President Davis and Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston. There is little necessity these days to "explain away" the charges of inconsistency on the part of Unionists who promised what they knew they could not fulfill. The Confederate leaders did the same. All leaders of the masses, especially the greatest that Kentucky ever produced, have been profuse in promises—sometimes sincere, more frequently the contrary.

As Lincoln would have said, the one great task of the Summer and Autumn of 1861 was to preserve the Union. If this could be done by an empty promise, was that not better than by a battle? "Paris is worth a mass," said the greatest of French Kings. The excuse of Henry IV. was enough for Lincoln, why may it not answer for the leaders in Kentucky in 1861? Capt. Speed need not strive to justify what time and history have already put beyond controversy. The politician may wrangle about consistency and sincerity; the historian narrates the course of events in the light of indisputable facts and cares not who is justified or condemned.

BOTH poet and philosopher wert thou,
Of naught regardless in great Nature's whole,
Found good in everything, and did endow
With infinite promise the ephemeral Now.
Watching the pageant of the years unroll,
Brave loyalty to truth thy sternest vow.

Thy voice persuasive yet inspires and charms.
The tender cadence of thy Threnody
Touches all hearts. Afar seem strife and arms
As we thy Woodnotes read, thy Concord lays.
The Oversoul still speaks to men through thee,
And thou interpretest for us the Days!

DINNER AND MANNERS.

HILDEGARDE HAWTHORNE.

THAT word "dinner" has a pleasing sound to the ear, and is moreover to most of us evocative as well of pleasing memories and anticipations. Perhaps we remember a little sun-flecked table under vines beside the Seine, where with two or three companions we sat out the long French evening, drenched in the scent of roses, and lingered over each perfect course, not forgetting a toast to the chef in the warm red wine. There we chatted over the coffee and fine cognac till the moon rose, and the men's cigars made glowing spots here and there under the arbor. Snatches of light laughter reached us from other tables, the song of a child in the street, the vehement discussion of two students on a question of art amused us—

Or it may be the mind takes up another impression. The dark mystery of the forest pressing close to the camp circle, the pungent odor of burning wood mingled with the smell of frying bacon, the huge, fantastic shadow of the guide leaping and bowing against the trees, a ripple of water on the shore, a long pine table, tin cups and plates, crisp fried trout, steaming coffee, and an appetite! An appetite that insisted on grunts and sighs rather than human speech, an appetite demanding an absolute, single-minded attention. Overhead the large August stars, and close about the khaki-clothed comrades of our nomadism.

"Dining and Its Amenities" can therefore scarcely fail of attracting us to open its covers, and once open we find a lot to keep us turning the pages. Here are tales of how men have eaten in all ages. The savage reveling in long pig, Lucullus and his Roman friends dallying over nightingales' tongues. Here are the moving histories of the beginnings and glorious consummations of the wines and liquors which to-day make glad our hearts and light our steps. Here are anecdotes, here are the maxims of that prince of the table, Brillat-Savarin, in their original French, with translations appended. We are given the evolution of the table utensils as well as the food because of which they exist, and the glass and porcelain come in for a share of encomiums as well as the soup or the entree.

The book is somewhat overloaded with words of Latin derivation; one could wish that a statement of Ruskin's which is quoted had been taken more to heart. Such phrases as "Romulus and Remus are still represented in marble enjoying their matutinal lacteous sorbitium from the udders of a she-wolf," or "A draught of this unequaled wine of Montrachet would serve well as an irrigator of the parched throats of the learned brethren who, in their praises of Sparus ovis, seem to have delayed too long the inhibition of the very wine best suited to the gastric coction of this most delicate morsel" may be amusing for the first hundred pages, but after that the jaded mind moans for rest and simple Saxon.

There is a chapter on table jests and many a hint to story tellers, with a collection of old tales; for the author begins by stating that there is no such thing as a new story. "A good old story, well told, with humorous embellishments, may be called a marron glacé," he says. He has a fling at puns, and quotes the French couplet—with gusto. He tells us of table superstitions, of cooks, of seasonings and dinner clubs. He rails against the bottled sauces whose advertisements decorate yards of trolley car, and praises some American imitations of foreign cheeses. There are apt quotations from authors ancient and modern; in all ages men have had wise and witty things to say of dining—or while dining. He greatly condemns the habit of taking a cocktail or other drink immediately before dinner—no gourmet would so outrage tongue and stomach. Nothing before the chilly and delicate mollusk, and with him a wine golden, mild.

Jeux de mots

Thought, discretion, taste, enthusiasm combine to create the perfect gourmet, and the author of this book is not slack in his praises of the pleasures of the table. The enjoyment of a perfect dinner is an art in which all the five senses should share; it is the supreme expression of civilization—or so at least we feel as we close the book and lean back, retrospective once more, dreamily recalling, it may be, a happy Thanksgiving when a merry family group made fun and chatter in the old dining room with the family portraits looking on—or a petit souper à deux in the corner of some glittering restaurant where the crowd made a seclusion not without its charm, and the orchestra discoursed sweet music.

***

There is in human nature a strong tendency toward elaboration; things that begin in order to make life easier or more commendable are continued and expanded until the labors of Herculee would be a reet cure compared with them. Clothes, for instance! Originally invented to keep the body warm and protected, to give a pleasing touch of color, a grace of line—legitimate ends. But nowadays men and women alike groan under their tyranny. From the underground sweatshops where they begin to evolve to the hooking and buttoning of them into place on the no-longer-astonished body they are a burden. Look at the men going home of a July afternoon. Watch the packing of trunks for an outing—truly we are worthy of Puck's summing up.

***

So it is that recognizing the necessity of a code of behavior to prevent friction and encourage an unselfish regard for the peace of others, manners and social customs originated. Gracious and gentle behavior is a beautiful thing, not to be acquired withnut heart and brain and training. But on this we superimpose a huge mass of customs and observances until we require a closely printed volume of somo 350 pages, revised every other year to keep it up to date, to inform us how to behave. Doubtless those among us who know the code best disregard a great many of its rules. But to disregard a thing known is a very different thing from being ignorant of its existence. If you don't know the rules of society and are emulous of moving in it, presumahly the only thing to do is to set about learning them. If it worries you more to leave the wrong number of cards than to study the secrets of card etiquette, take whatever time is needed to learn it. Some souls are filled with an infinite dismay if they choose the wrong fork amid the array beside their plates—for these the chapter on forks and spoons. You can learn when and how to make calls, give dinners, how to an acquaintance, or write an introductory letter. In fact, most of us have to know these things and a myriad more in the social arrangement we have constructed for ourselves. But good manners themselves can scarcely he got out of a book, however carefully they may have been put into it. Vulgarity, like murder, will out. That laugh, too loud or too self-conscious; those gestures, those attitudes with their hint of coarseness; the manner that causes others to feel overborne or which conveys the impression that the person thinks himself or herself cleverer, more important than any one else—how often we meet these people and how little all the books in the world can teach them! The present volnme is excellent of its sort, well-written, clear, tactful. It tells the social aspirant all he needs to know. The observancee which make up so much of life are here for the conning. But breeding—as we are told in the book on dining, one may learn how to become a good cook, hut a good roaster is not made by rule of thumb—breeding is like the fragrance of a flower, that can be no more suddenly acquired than you can throw a perfume un a camellia and make a violet of it.

Chemung County.

The excellent idea of county histories is followed by Messrs. A. S. Barnes & Co. in the publication of "A Brief History of Chemung County, New York." Ausburn Towner, who writes it, gives a mass of simply stated facts rather than a writing of any color. Though it is designed for use in schools every adu t resi i-nt of the county will find it doubtless of local interest.

An interesting item mentioned in the book is that as late as 1779 the power of the Indians, formidable until then, was broken in a battle fought in that county between the Americans on one side and the British and Indians on the other. Up to that time also the county was practically unsettled.

A RUSSIAN PRISONER IN JAPAN

K. K. KAWAKAMI, A. M.

THE Russian prisoners of war in Japan were indeed treated "as The Hague ordains," perhaps even more generously. During the Franco-Prussian war of 1870 the French prisoners were forced to work on fortifications all along the German frontier, and they died in droves from the lack of sufficient food and clothing, and for want of sanitary surroundings. When the 30,000 Turkish soldiers at Plevna surrendered to the Czar's army they were left herded like cattle in the open fields beyond the town, with no shelter nor covering nor food for three days and nights, and this in the dead of Winter—damp, cold, miserable Balkan Winter. The world was horrified hy such atrocities, and The Hague Conference of 1899 adopted a convention with a rule that "prisoners of war shall be treated, as regards food, quarters, and clothing, on the same footing as the troops of the Government which has captured them." According to this universally accepted rule of international law, therefore, Japan was under no obligation to treat the Russian prisoners more generously than she treats her own soldiers. The Czar had no right to complain if the Mikado fed the Muscovite soldiers with fish and boiled rice, pickled plums, and daikon, and only a scanty supply of meat cooked with soy. And yet the Russian prisoners had, as this book tells us, white bread made from the most expensive American flour. They had clean, hot food three times a day, including soup, meat, vegetables cooked in "Western" style, and delicious Japanese tea; they slept in clean beds, with abundant covering, and were wrapped in neat sanitary clothing; they enjoyed hot baths and more fresh air than they wanted; they were allowed to walk outdoors at any time. And when it is remembered that the Russian prisoners numbered 70,000 strong, even the anti-Japanese entourages of the Muscovite ruler must admit that the inhabitants of Nippon are not "yellow monkeys," as they certainly thought they were.

Perhaps no book has as yet described the Russian prisoners' life in Japan so graphically and so entertainingly as this book. The work professes to be the "journal of a Russian prisoner's wife in Japan," but the thought it sets forth is distinctly masculine, thinly guised in feminine expression. Is it too hasty to suspect that it was really written hy some war correspondent, perhaps an American? However that may be, it impresses us as a work by one who is well versed with the daily life and the political and social conditions in both Russia and Japan. It is unfortunate that the author allowed himself—or herself if you prefer—to fall to the common error of those writers who seem to think it clever to use bits of Japanese expressions, many of which they do not fully understand. Always liable to be either misspelled or misused, such excrescions, instead of embellishing the book, mar the harmony of its style. To cite a few instances from this book before us, sakesama, tomodachi, hiaku, and saio de gomarimasu, are not spelled correctly, while such expressions as danna san, okasama, and Nippon heika are not used in the right sense. Such, however, is a trivial defect, and need not seriously affect our judgment of the book.

The main uhject uf this book, as we have already intimated, is to ehow how human, Christian, and civilised was the Japanese treatment of the Russian prisoners, and the picture it presents is vivid and charming. While admitting that the Japanese authorities were not entirely free from hlunders and mismanagements, the author credits them with sincere efforts to adhere to the principles of humanity in treating the prisoners. Describing the Russian officers' wards, the book says:

> Here they live, two to each alcove, free to wander in and out and visit each other and go to adjoining wards, when they are able to walk. It is not my idea of a prison at all. Surely there is the fullest liberty within the barracks. There aro no fetters, no restrictions. Everything is plain to a degree; simple, hygienic, and clean; and when I consider and sum up all these things, I wonder if there is anything at all to complain of. The prisoners' lot could not be a happier one, and I, for one, would less willingly be a prisoner-of-war in some places I can think of in Russia.

The Russian officers, however, found enough to complain of. They were looking for insults and humiliations, and of course they found them or rather imagined them. They would not see, as our author tells us, anything that the Japanese did for them in the right light, persisting to attribute hostile, sinister motives to them. They grumbled that they were not allowed the freedom French officers had in German cities in 1870, where at Wiesbaden and Frankfort they lived in hotels.

They forget that there are no hotels, as such, in Matsuyama (where the main body of the Russian prisoners were kept), and that the Govaramsnt furnishes here as much privacy and more foreign comforts than any tourist can command in a tea house; while the rank and filo are in a heaven of plenty, cleanliness, comfort, and idleness they never dreamed of before, and that contraste sharply with the suffering, the cold, disease, and starvation of the poor French prisoners in Dresden, Magdeburg, Mayence, Ulm, and Augsburg in Christian Germany, in 1870.

Nor was it material comfort only that the Russian prisoners were allowed. Thero was liberty of mind in those "paper and bamboo prisons." All the books forbidden them in their own country were freely read and loaned around in their quarters in Japan. Many were seriously reading and discussing republican forms of Government and representative assemblies.

It is amazing what advanced and liberal sentiments they dare voice, dare continually and openly discuss here in this freedom! And what contradiction! Freedom in prison! Freedom of speech in a pagan, Asiatic country, but not in our own Christian country! There is no censorship of what we read here, there is no censor who cut outs of military affairs in the Kobe paper, and what the censor cuts for Dairinji, the censor at Oguri leaves untouched."

Let us not close our eyes to the faults of the Japanese authorities, where such are really found, for the land of the cherry blossom and chrysanthemum is withal a land of thistles and thorns. The commandant of the prisoners' barracks was, we are told, after the German mode, both in appearance and manner. In contrast with the chivalrous, courteous soldier of the old Samurai type, like Gen. Nogi, Japanese officers of the new school are somewhat haughty, assertive, bent upon parading their authority. "It is the old story of the parvenu in power, the upstart in control, the beggar on horseback." And it was such petty officials and ill-qualified interpreters who were responsible for most troubles that occurred in connection with the treatment of the Russian prisoners. As the typical case of such interpreters, the author pictures one in these words:

> Taciturn and suspicious, and woodenly stupid, he watches them (prisoners) all the time, as if espionage, and not translation, were his duty. He peers over their shoulders to see what they read and write, noses in to see what they are doing, and has his ears pricked-up listening to all they say.

This interpreter, like most of his colleagues, picked up the gabble and patois of East Siberia and never studied a Russian grammar or used a dictionary. Naturally, the Russian officers, who wrote in academic Russian, were too frequently subjected to misinterpretation at the hands of these "vicious little uneducated interpreters," who suspected everything they could not understand.

Strewn here and there through its pages the book contains pointed remarks about the prominent characters in Russia and other countries. To cite a few instances, Gorky is an "outcast and degenerate"; Count Tolstoy a "crass Socialist, mischiefmaker, and humbug," whose books are popular merely because of his "moujik blouse and those delightful tableaus of a real nobleman shoemaking and haymaking"; Witte a "high-handed genil," whose railroad and industrial policies have ruined Russia; Alexieff a "sailor on horseback, who knew no more about the Japanese Army establishment than he does of the Patagonian Army"; Rojestvensky a "fussy old martinet," hated by all his officers, and Stoessel a "henpecked" coward, who, having surrendered Port Arthur in betrayal of his loyal soldiers, was shameless enough to ask Gen. Nogi if his wife would be allowed to take all her own things away with her. As for Mr. Roosevelt, he is the archangel of high-handed despots, whose steel wrist "hammered out at the American Cronstadt ? a peace which neither Japan nor Russia truly wanted. "That terrible American President, Il Strenuoso," wanted peace at all costs, and he surely was "capable of locking the conferees in a room and starving them into obedience."

Oh! it is the strangest thing in all the world! Never more will a peace conference go to America. The Americans are too literal. A peace conference is for the purpose of making peace, they argue—therefore, Make peace! Quick! At once! Immediately! Or! sooner than that, even; if the Roosevelt happens to be ruling.

A COMEDY OF THE ITALIAN ALPS.

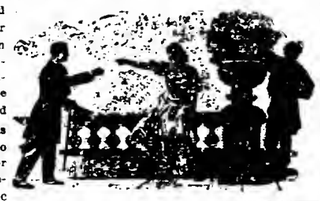
guide to a pretty American girl and her folks, and the ensuing complications are entertaining and amusing. The narrative is always spirited and the character drawing good. Of course, much of the charm of the tale is due to its locale. The effort of the author to put the romance and beauty of the Italian lakes and mountains in her book has been reasonably successful. The descriptions are unforced and Miss Webster has the tact not to insist on her scenic environment, not to force the moonlight and the snowy summits on her readers. People who know the Italian Alps will like to visit them again in company with a guide so agreeable. People who have never been there will want to go when they read the book. Moreover, it is a charming tale of young love, told in the modern way, with as little sentiment as possible, though what there is rings true, and plenty of humor.



Whether a woman may be wooed and won as the heroine of this book is wooed and won is a question no man may answer. The ethics and philosophy of the modern love story have never been analyzed. But it is an established rule that young love must invariably be treated of in a humorous fashion. Undiluted sentiment is no longer acceptable. It seems, to the ordinary novel reader, Paul and Virginia are classical, imperishable, but, bless their hearts, back numbers. Jerry's methods of love-making are deplorable, but he gets the girl, and he is funny all the time. The time has come when all the world loves a funny lover. Jerry's future father-in-law, a practical American marooned abroad, reminds one of Mr. Howells's Maine man longing for his Bangor Whig in Venice.

REGULATION OF COMMERCE.

A GENERATION ago the topic of Mr. Calvert's book would hardly have interested the generality of his profession unless enlisted by a retainer. To-day campaigns turn upon his topic, and every well-informed man needs the information presented here in binding suitable for the gentleman's library, and in literary form adapted to the general understanding. The law student, the practicing lawyer, the legislator, the man of affairs, will all find here an orderly presentation of the subject, with ample references to original decisions. The work is done by a practiced hand, and its appearance at this stage of the controversy regarding the State and Federal regulation of railways and trusts may be taken as a sign of the times. Mr. Calvert's work is pretty closely confined to the arrangement of judicial decisions in such order that together they constitute something like a treatise. This has been done skillfully, but it cannot be said that Mr. Calvert has added much original thought. However, it is no slight service that he does not leave readers in doubt about the dividing line between himself and his selected authority.

Mr. Calvert's nearest approach to original work is in his chapters regarding Federal police power and Congressional regulation of manufacture. To lawyers both are something like self-contradictions. Police power belongs to the States exclusively, and the Constitution gives Congress power to regulate commerce, not manufacture. Respecting the latter the language of the Constitution is plain, and regarding the former the language of Chief Justice Fuller seems similarly conclusive in these words: "The power of the State to impose restraints and burdens upon persons and property in conservation and promotion of the public health, good order, and prosperity, is a power originally and always belonging to the States, not surrendered by them to the General Government, nor directly restrained by the Constitution of the United States, and essentially exclusive." Yet Mr. Calvert finds support for both Federal police power and Federal regulation of manufacture, as well as commerce.

***

It is the function of the police power to prohibit, while the power of regulation alone is given to Congress. The States cannot "regulate" inter-State commerce, and the regulation of commerce does not extend to prohibition, on the face of the granted powers. "If the power of Congress to regulate does not include in some measure the power to prohibit, there is an abeyance of a high governmental function without a constitutional prohibition. By the adoption of the Constitution, with its grants of power to the National Government, its limitations on the powers of the National and State Governments, and its reservation to the States of all powers not conferred upon the national Government, it cannot be, without specific prohibition, that any of the attributes of sovereignty could have been dropped or suspended." Mr. Calvert supports this position by decisions to the effect that when the Constitution gives Congress power the grant is complete except for constitutional limitations. Congress, therefore, received all the power to regulate commerce which the States possessed, and the States possessed power equaling Parliament's. Hence if Parliament's power to "regulate" included the power to prohibit, so does Congress's. This view will please those who like a strong central government more than those who prefer strong State rights.

***

The line between commerce and manufacture is plainly drawn. Commerce succeeds to manufacture, since there can be no commerce in what has not been manufactured and does not exist. And since Congress has the right only to regulate commerce, it has not the right to regulate the prior process of manufacture. That is a State function. But the new doctrine is that where power is not directly given it may nevertheless be exercised by indirection. Thus Congress by its power to grant or withhold privilege of inter-State transportation is held to acquire power to regulate manufacture, although the latter can be done only by exercise of quasi and extraconstitutional police powers. But this power is as ill-defined as the word "commerce" itself. A National guarantee of quality is indeed desirable in the interests of consumers throughout the Nation and the world. This is the rationale of the pure food and meat inspection laws. But commendable as those laws are in their motive and their practical working, some reserve must be exercised regarding encroachments under cover of the principle. The regulation of hours of labor, the protection of child labor, are admirable objects, but they are attainable only by the exercise of police power. Even if there be a Federal police power, it is exercisable only for Federal objects, and certainly the limitation of women's hours, and the prohibition of child labor serve no distinct Federal purpose. Neither is the regulation of such matters the regulation of commerce. Sweat shops and cruel child taskwork may produce perfectly sanitary goods, which cannot rightfully be excluded from commerce without straining our theories of government. It is indeed a strait and narrow path between State usurpation of Congress's right to regulate commerce and Congress's usurpation of the right to exercise police power properly the State's.

AMERICAN FINANCE.

AN English work on "American Finance" that is to be brought out next week by the Macmillan Company promises to be an important addition to the few noteworthy interpretations of our life and our politics that have come from abroad. The author, W. R. Lawson, has been known through his "American Industrial Problems" and books on British and Continental finance. The forthcoming volume is but the first part of his present work, being limited to domestic questions, but the completed work may be expected later. A glance at advance sheets shows a wealth of material handled and the treatment of a writer of literary ability. From the interesting introduction we quote the following passages that are suggestive of the argument of this book:

Economic America has just been discovered, or, rather, it has just discovered itself. Till lately the idea prevailed that it was to grow in the ordinary grooves and was to be like other countries, only much bigger. But that is not to be its prosaic destiny. It is to be a country of its own—a nation by itself—a republic of a wholly new and peculiar type. * * * But it does not follow that the United States is to rule the world simply because of its being the strongest and richest world power. * * * The United States may be economically strong at home without being proportionately formidable abroad. It may, and most probably will, have an economic sphere of its own in which it can secure itself against foreign competition. But the more exclusive that sphere is made, and the more impenetrable it may be from outside, the more closely will the United States be shutting itself up inside it. Nations that would be industrial world powers cannot have it both ways. They cannot hope to dominate home and foreign markets at the same time.

MILLARD FILLMORE MSS.

THE Buffalo Historical Society is endeavoring to repair the loss to history of many of the writings of Millard Fillmore, thirteenth President of the United States, by the collection from all remaining sources of material still in existence for a volume of his letters, addresses, and miscellaneous writings. The society is desirous of learning of Fillmore manuscripts that might be used by it, and requests that any possible informant will write its secretary, Frank H. Severance, addressing him care of the Buffalo Historical Society, Buffalo, N. Y.

Millard Fillmore was a resident of Buffalo and died there, and he was an organizer and the first President, in 1862, of its historical society. There are no members of his immediate family living. The loss of his correspondence with Webster, Clay, and others concerning the great issues of his day, was caused by his son's willingness that it should be destroyed after his (the son's) death. The many papers that were in the son's possession were accordingly destroyed. The Buffalo Historical Society is gathering what material is to be found in the various Government archives, and hopes to obtain the use of any important papers privately held.

ESPERANTO.

FAMILIARITY with the new universal language which is obtaining so formidable a support, will be helped by an excellent little Esperanto grammar published by Messrs. A. S. Barnes & Co., and written by C. S. Griffin, editor of "Our Times." This book is entitled "Esperanto in Twenty Lessons," and so attractive and easy are its lessons that we believe it could be done. For the roots from the component languages, French, Spanish, and Italian, besides English, that can be guessed at when not known, and the rules for uniform and regular endings make the learning distinctly easier than the ordinary learning of a new language and easy, even, as it is its intent to be, for one who does not know any foreign language at all. The printed page is puzzling in appearance, for the use of many ks, js, and signs of accent and elision presents the appearance of a cross between Russian and Scandinavian. The biggest matter is, doubtless, the vocabulary to be learned, and it seems surprising that the vocabulary given at the back of the present book covers but twenty-three pages. The book is a thin 12mo, price 30 cents net.

A TALE OF THE SEA.

Morley Roberts Has the Authentic Tang of the Brine in "The Flying Cloud."

IN spite of a tortured vocabulary and a grammar at times sorely strained—an effect as if his narratives, like his own good ship with her opium-mad skipper, were caught with too much verbal canvas aloft in the raging cross seas of a hurricane of fancy—this new marine tale by Mr. Morley Roberts has the tang of authentic brine and the swift pulse of life in it. Aboard "The Flying Cloud" (L. C. Page & Co.) Mr. Roberts returns to the great deep of his early love, after showing what he could do on the solid land, tensely as in "Rachel Marr," airily yet keenly and with cruel touchings upon the raw of humanity as in "The Idlers," skittishly, satirically, larkishly as in "Lady Penelope."

Rachel was Hall Caine material, provincial, which takes life hardly—a woman undisciplined, passionate, somewhat hysterical. But the hysteria was in the nature of Rachel herself—not in the nature of Mr. Roberts. "The Idlers" was Anthony Hope stuff, with a dash of Kipling's own, looking life squarely enough in the eye but smilingly, taking the serious with the gay, the good with the bad, jauntily, lightly, as is the cue of gentle folk and cosmopolites. "Lady Penelope" belonged to the cheerful region of ironical audacity staked out by Mr. Robert Chambers. Now on the stanch old hooker Flying Cloud, Glasgow built of iron, full ship rigged, 1,500 tons register, outward bound for Australia, with green Connemara emigrants and nondescript wastrels between decks, and forward a crew of brown men out of the East, you have another turn. The game is human nature stripped naked, by salt-water alchemy reduced to its rudiments, as Mr. Joseph Conrad, the greatest master of English speech that was ever born a Pole, loves to paint it.

In this tale young Jack is cast into the midst of a shipload of all sorts and takes his chances. He drinks (must you cry shame?) with the wastrels and learns from them other matters than the usage of tremendous and ornate oaths—he is apt at oaths. He talks open eyed with the brown men out of the East and learns from them tags of bad Hindustanee and more things besides, strange, curious, and uncanonical. He adventures by dizzy way of ratlines and shrouds and various rigging of hopeless nomenclature loto the maintop, and so, by "swarming" to the skyssil yard, whence one may see far and get great thrills. He comes to know a breeze from a gale of wind (which is no landsman's knowledge); he is instructed in knots of cunning simplicity and rare properties by the ancient Malay serang or bo'sn; he learns sea-wisdom from many things, and sea manliness from the mates—two strong men, brave, faithful, masters of their craft, but in articles no better than they should be.

Also he watches the tragedy of the "old man," the Captain, victim, the wise brown men whisper, of afyim—which is opium—by the evil magic of the drug changed under the outraged eyes of his handsome brave wife. In the ribald gaze of his motley ship's company, into a log, a swine; and by the lack of the same magic into a yellow faced, palsied madman who sends all the canvas aloft on the edge of a fullgrown hurricane on the meridian of Cape Leeuwin—where the sea is evilly notorious. Thereat the mates in disgust, with the fine folly of human and sailor nature, get roaring drunk, and there is the devil to pay and chaos "black as the Earl of Hell's riding boots." So it is written. Mariners likewise call him sometimes "the Vicar."

Obviously it is not the sort of training Jack would get on the SS. Bethel (the name is the invention of Mr. Roberts) or the sort of thing Jack generally may read of he can only be persuaded to try in books written especially and solicitously for him by those theologically or puritanically bent on bolstering his morals. But it is a corking story—a ripping story, barring only the word-storming which is worst at the very beginning, and trails off into quite smooth linguistic weather as the Flying Cloud casts off her tug and bears out under full sail into the broad Atlantic.

WORRY.

THIS disease of the age is what C. W. Saleeby calls worry in his book entitled "Worry," that now comes to us from the press of the Frederick A. Stokes Company. Dr. Saleeby has not given this a sentimental treatment, but a profoundly serious medical consideration with much that is philosophical in the most practical and helpful way. Dr. Saleeby is a retired practitioner of Great Britain who devotes much time to writing against the quackeries of the day as well as developing his own themes, and he has previously come to us with a set of popular science primers on heredity, evolution, psychology, sociology, and ethics.

MOLTKE THE MAN.

A CERTAIN simplicity in the biographer who supplies the more intimate view of a great man's life is no mean warrant of truth in the picture. And it is just such simplicity which lends interest and value to the little book called "Moltke in His Home," written by Friederich August Dressler, the musician, and published in an English translation by Mrs. Charles Edward Barrett-Leonard, by E. P. Dutton & Co. Dressler was in a manner, and among other things, household music master to the famous Field Marshal's family, and as the old soldier was devoted to the art, as it was his custom to entertain himself with little home concerts every evening, the music master was one of a very inner circle. Dressler's attitude toward Moltke is, indeed, perfectly that of a dog utterly attached to its master. Admiring everything that his beloved hero did, he sees no reason for concealing anything. Thus the amiable weaknesses of the most scientific of modern commanders are as frankly set forth as his virtues, with a most pleasing result.

For the picture of life in the Moltke home is full of the homeliest German flavor, the quaint figure of the Marshal himself as fresh and vivid and human as possible. You see him listening while Dressler and the members of his family (a musical lot) play Mozart to him, or Beethoven or Mendelssohn, or Haydn, or Schubert. You learn that the Field Marshal detested Brahms, disliked Wagner, and was annoyed by Chopin—except the noble Funeral March. He had a professional passion for funeral marches, and, like Bismarck, preferred above all other funeral marches that in Beethoven's A flat major sonata. "It is," he said, "as if I heard the sobs of the mourners and the muffled drums."

LOUIS TRACY.

Little is known of Louis Tracy, the author of "The Captain of the Kansas," a brave tale of the sea, "The Wings of the Morning" and other widely read books. Here is his likeness autheoticated.

After the fashion of Germans he liked even in extreme old age to play with the children of his kinswoman, Frau Helmuth von Moltke, who presided over his house. And his "game of whist was a necessity." Usually the members of his family played with him, sometimes the Emperor. More than once, says Herr Dressler, with simple pride, "when an extra player was required, I have myself had the honor, and the Field Marshal used to be highly amused at my bad playing. When the game was over he dismissed me with the remark, "You play Beethoven better."

Also Moltke "disliked losing at cards, so the family used to manage as far as possible that the game should go as he wished it to go. His wife thought it quite fair to cheat a little to attain this end, so the family were trained to let him win if they could without his noticing their manoeuvre." Then Herr Dressler tells about the Christmas ceremonies and the distribution of gifts in the Moltke household, and how the old soldier always traveled light. "He never took a trunk, only a handbag, which he carried himself. He always traveled in mufti, and as he looked quite different in mufti he was rarely recognized at the station."

Herr Dressler tells also about Moltke at Creisau, his country place, where he occupied himself pottering about, nursing his trees, and mentions the circumstance that the Field Marshal "always" put on a clean shirt every morning, and hated to change afterward for any purpose. Having a saving disposition—acquired during a youth of the narrowest poverty—in bad weather he would never use his own horses, but went in a cab—the shabbiest available.

The little book closes with Moltke's death, which occurred suddenly one night just after Dressler had been improvising for him on the piano. The music of that improvisation, with the title "Die Letzte Melodie," (The Last Melody,) serves as finis to what is at once a monument to the musician-author's harmless vanity and his deep affection for the great man in whose glory he sunned himself.

PHILOLOGY.

THE HISTORICAL STUDY OF THE MOTHER TONGUE. An Introduction to Philological Method. By Henry Cecil Wyld. Pp. ix.-412. 12mo. Cloth. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.

THIS is a purely technical work, designed as a textbook for students who propose to make a systematic study of the science of philology. It does not in any way appeal to the general reader, nor is it intended so to do. The aim and scope of Prof. Wyld's volume cannot be more tersely stated than in the following words from his preface:

The object of the book is a modest one—to give not the history of our language, but some indications of the point of view from which the history of a language should be studied, and of the principal points of method in such a study. * * * I have hoped, in the following pages, to prepare the way for the beginner to the study of at least some of the great writers who have been the pioneers of our knowledge of the development of our own tongue, and of its relations to other languages as well as the chief framers of contemporary philological theory. Thus the present work aims at no more than to serve as an introduction to the more advanced scientific study of linguistic problems in the pages of first-hand authorities.

THE CAVE BOY.

MESSRS. D. APPLETON & CO. have added to their series of Stories of Primitive Life, planned as supplementary reading for children in primary grades in schools, and already including stories of the Lake Dwellers and Cliff Dwellers, a book on the Age of Stone entitled "The Cave Boy." It is a small volume, with attractive pages of large print and many text illustrations—decorative but crude drawings by Miss I. Dérêmeaux. The author is Margaret A. McIntyre. The matter is all excellent and her book, in scheme, most acceptable.

Primers of Art.

With the publication this week of Prof. Edwin A. Barber's monograph on "Pottery," Messrs. Doubleday, Page & Co. inaugurate an educational series of Primers of Art. Each volume will be complete in itself and will treat of various branches of industrial art. The present one studies the Majolica wares of Italy, Spain, and Mexico, Delft of Holland and England, the Stanniferious Palence of France, Germany, and other European countries. Prof. Barber is Curator of the Pennsylvania School of Industrial Art.

A LOVE IDYL.

THIS pretty little tale is a book for lovers, whether they be in love with human beings, like themselves, or merely with the great Earth Mother, their hearts warmed by only so much of human passion as all the world is said to get by reflection. It is an idyl of the way of a man and a maid with each other, and of the springtime, and of the always beautiful earth. Its story is of the slightest, being a narrative of how a young author, on a holiday tramp through Southern England, stops at a wayside inn and encounters a charming young woman, with whom he promptly falls in love. Unguessed by him, it happens that the girl's uncle is his publisher, and, as he does not give his full name, nobody knows that he is the young author who is beginning to attract attention. Some complications result, out of which everybody concerned gets more or less amusement. But events march in turns with throbbing hearts, and the complications are all straightened out without so much as a single frown to mar anybody's happiness.

It is a very happy sort of book, indeed, for none of its characters suffer a moment of doubt or pain or sorrow or distress. And so it is a very excellent book to read on a day of Spring sunshine, when little white clouds are floating across the blue, or on a Summer day out of doors in the shade of a big tree, or on a cold night in Winter in front of a crackling fire. For it is full of the beauty of earth and the beauty of love and the beauty of happiness. Its story is next to nothing; there is almost no incident; there is little attempt at character painting—except that one gets a rather good idea of the heroine—and the dialogue is often trivial. Nevertheless, it is a pleasant book to spend an hour over, because it leaves the mind full of impressions of beauty and of happiness. The author is evidently an ardent lover of out of doors, and there is a live, singing quality about his accounts of the outdoor excursions of the man and the maid that make them very charming.

THE CAESARS.

ILL-HEALTH compelled the author to spend two successive Winters in Rome, and to this fact we owe a biographical work of great intrinsic value and of marked literary charm and distinction. The volume is divided into seven sections, treating respectively of Julius Cæsar, Mark Antony, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, and Nero. Many other figures are presented—Cicero, Seneca, Livia, Julia, Agrippina, &c.—but the attention is chiefly directed to the seven names just mentioned. The book seems to have been largely the result of a study of the portrait busts and statues in the Roman museums, and one of its most important features is the reproduction of considerably more than one hundred of these portraits. The volume begins, appropriately, with an essay on Roman portraiture, clearly setting forth some fundamental canons by which the authenticity of portraits may be determined.

This volume has one unpardonable fault, the lack of an index. The loss of time and temper caused by this omission is not to be calculated, and can scarcely be mentioned with moderation. We earnestly wish that all publishers could be convinced, once for all, that no saving of expense is so futile, and so really uneconomical as that accomplished at the expense of an index. It is to be hoped that we may some day reach a stage of civilization in which public opinion can be trusted to regulate this matter. In the meantime, a little intelligent legislation would have a salutary effect. There might also be a Board of Decision, composed of properly qualified scholars, whose function should be to determine what books require indexing, and to pronounce upon the adequacy of the indexes prepared.

No attempt has been made to write a history of Rome; such an intention, indeed, is specifically disclaimed. In these familiar, Boswellian biographies we are brought into close contact with those gowned and togaed folk who lived so long ago: these men and women who, for most of us, have a somewhat vague and unreal existence. We learn that Tiberius reproved a young Prince for despising cabbage; that Agrippina had a pet white nightingale; that Augustus every day kissed the bust of a lost grandchild; that Germanicus could not hear to hear a cock crow; that "the mightiest Julius" was capable of the rare courtesy of eating rancid oil with a good grace, so as to do honor to a friendly host. These are the details which make past lives vivid to our minds; like that supreme descriptive touch of Mark Antony's, in the funeral oration, when, pointing to Cæsar's mantle, he tells the throng that he remembers the first time when it was worn, and adds:

"'Twas on a Summer's evening in his tent;
That day he overcame the Nervii."

S. Baring-Gould is, perhaps, best known by his work upon "Curious Myths of the Middle Ages," but he has been a versatile worker in the varied fields of history, biography, booklore, and fiction, besides having written some of our best-known and most popular hymns. He says in his introduction:

With the faces of the Cæsarian house before me, I thought of the men and women themselves, their individual lives, their characters, their sorrows, their joys, their trials, and their triumphs. I, so to speak, lived among them for two Winters, spending day after day looking into their faces, comparing them, and I felt as though I had made a personal acquaintance with them, and had come to understand them in a way none could apart from these galleries of speaking likenesses. To read Tacitus, Suetonius, and Dio in England, and to read them looking up into the eyes of those whose acts are recorded, are two very different things. It seemed to me that the study of those faces helped me to understand the character and personal histories of these Julians and Claudians in a way impossible apart from them, and that it enabled me to correct many a partial judgment and explain many a psychological puzzle.

Escoffer's Cookery.

M. Escoffer, recently called by Kaiser Wilhelm "the Emperor of chefs," has "yielded to urgent solicitations" and prepared "a monumental work," entitled "A Guide to Modern Cookery." His work will make a book of 1,000 octavo pages, it will contain his most famous recipes, sum up his knowledge acquired during a lifetime of catering to the elite of the world, and give practical suggestions to interested readers. The acceptance of this book seems assured because of the unique reputation of the author. He has been in turn chef at the Moulin Rouge (during the First Empire), the Grand Hotel, Monte Carlo, and the Grand Hotel National, Lucerne. Then he went to the Savoy Hotel, London, for eight years, and is now known as the inspiring genius of the Carlton and Ritz. In 1870 Escoffier was chef of the General Quarters of the Army of the Rhine, and was taken prisoner by the forces of the grandfather of the present Emperor. Referring to this, when the Emperor of Chefs served the Emperor of Germany on the ship Amerika at Cuxhaven, the latter said "if I had only known you at the time, I should have had you set free."

*THE TRAGEDY OF THE CAESARS. A Study of the Characters of the Cæsars of the Julian and Claudian Houses. By S. Baring-Gould. Illustrated. Pp. xii.-412. 8vo. Cloth. New York: Charles Scribner's Sons. $3.75.

EVOLUTION.

DARWINISM AND THE PROBLEMS OF LIFE. A Study of Familiar Animal Life. By Conrad Guenther, Ph. D. Professor at the University Freiburg in Baden. Translated from the third edition by Joseph McCabe. New York: E. P. Dutton & Co. $2.

THIS rather ponderous work of more than 400 pages is essentially a study of the theory of evolution, defending the doctrine of "natural selection," to the exclusion of all other explanations of individual and collective development in men and animals. The method of the author is at once explanatory and argumentative, expounding the correct theory, as he sees it and demonstrating what he considers to be the fallacies of various other theories, says the author in his preface.

The present work has its origin in an attempt to appreciate the range, the foundation, and the value of evolutionary theories. The information gleaned from these fields had then to be appraised and put together, and an effort made to reduce it to a harmonious system. In doing this the various theories had to be examined with discrimination, enlarged, and built into a structure. It is therefore hoped that the reader will meet many new thoughts in the work.

Though the book is a prolonged and detailed study of one theory—and certain other conflicting theories treating of the same subject—it is not written in too technical a manner. The presentation of the ideas is simple, and the reader who is animated by a real desire to understand the subject in hand should have no difficulty in mastering each step as he proceeds. The more philosophic and general deductions in the final chapters are less readily to be grasped, but are not necessarily beyond the reach of the comparatively untutored mind that has had the energy and endurance to proceed so far. The bulk of the book treats in detail of the manner of development of the many species of living creatures, from the original protoplasm or unicellular being to the complex and mysterious physiology of man.

The main basis for natural selection, in accordance with the Darwinian theory, is described as the survival of the fittest. Though the author adheres to this idea with consistent pertinacity, he has the wisdom to admit the difficulty of explaining certain phenomena, such as the variations in coloring of certain birds, as due to the choice of the female exerted in certain directions.

The first part of the work has been divided not into problems, but according to groups of animals. Plants have been dealt with in so far as needed to show their relation to the questions of animal life. The three final chapters of the work, treating the subject in a wider vein than that of specific observation alone, deal, respectively, with "Extensions of the Principles of Selection and Other Involuntary Theories," "The Mechanical Conception of Life and Its Limits," and "Nature, History, and Morality." The one theory against which the author especially directs his lance in refutation is that of the Lamarckian principle—the theory that organs, instead of being developed by natural selection, are developed by use and degenerate through disuse, these organs as more or less exercised in one generation being thus inherited in the next.

Though the nature of the work would at first seem to presuppose an extreme naturalistic and mechanical philosophic view of life, the author's conception is too broad to exclude psychologic and spiritual elements. He explains that reality contains two separate provinces, the material world and the psychic life—and that the scientific method may be applied to either. He explains that "it is consciousness that incloses in itself all existence," but that, as consciousness can never become the subject of empirical science, one must finally abandon the scientific method and turn to philosophy.

Quoting the "last men" of Nietzsche, the author shows how untenable is the idea of a scientific ethics as deduced by some of the Darwinists and leading to an "intolerable mediocrity" devoid of individuality. His final conclusion is to be found in one sentence: "These last considerations have shown us that we are justified in believing in a sense of life and that there must be duties, since the idea of duty precedes all knowledge."

SOME DRAMATISTS WHO WRITE BOOKS.

OTIS NOTMAN.

MR. BRONSON HOWARD is back from his trip in the South, and the other day I had the pleasure of calling on him and we had a long talk on the drama, and the relation of the stage to literature. It was so very interesting that it occurred to me that it might be worth while to get the opinion of several of the well-known dramatists on this subject.

Mr. Bronson Howard began by saying: "It is very curious, the relation of the stage to that 'general literature' which we associate with the printing press. As a rule, plays in England and America have been printed merely for convenience of production in the theatre, and the readers have been so extremely few in numbers that they have never been estimated as a source of profit to the authors. Even collections of plays merely go into special libraries, and special editions of single plays have never been profitable to English or American publishers, with the single exception of Shakespeare. With this single exception, you can sum up the situation as to the readers of plays by the story of the celebrated lecture on Snakes in Ireland—the shortest lecture on record, you remember—'There are no snakes in Ireland.'"

"But what about Ibsen?" I asked. "Isn't be pretty generally read?"

"By the general public? No, I don't think so, though he is a Scandinavian, and his plays, published in English, have a certain exotic interest for general readers. But I am sure that his works as literature have not a great influence over the mass of the people. Even the number of times they are produced on the stage in America is very small. One of his plays will barely keep a house crowded for a week. He wrote as the representative of a country that had ceased to fight, and had therefore become pessimistic, as all peaceful nations do, and consequently he does not appeal to any large extent to a progressive, fighting, aggressive country like America. But he has a great influence over our dramatists, and in that indirect way over our people. It is a case of pure science and applied science. He is the pure science, and we try to apply that science."

"Why has he so much to give the English-writing dramatist? In what respect is he so wonderful?" I asked.

"In his construction. He does something that none of us can do. Mr. Howells says Ibsen is wonderful because he is so natural, but as a matter of fact he is at the pinnacle of artificiality. He is so perfect in his art that we fail to see his artificiality. To my mind he represents the crowning point of the French drama of the middle of the nineteenth century."

"Could you point out to me in what respect he is artificial?"

"Well, take any one of his plays; you cannot cut out one sentence or even a half of a sentence without affecting the plot or the subject. Everything that is said, everything that is done, every character brought in, all bear immediately on the story or on certain social views, and cannot be dispensed with without injury to the work. This is absolutely artificial, for can you imagine in real life a scene, say in some flat, where every character, everything said and done, deals only with a great crisis about to happen, or with a particular social subject? Yet Ibsen has so mastered his art that his artificiality in construction passes for being absolutely natural. None of us, none of the dramatists I know, would dare to write a scene without bringing in extraneous matter, such as is natural and happens in real life. Without doing this we should be called artificial. We have not, you see, brought our own art in the perfect to the perfection of Ibsen. His influence on us is limited at best, of course. English-writing dramatists are of a different school, and we can never fully adopt Ibsen's methods. It is impossible to get the English or Americans to trim their trees in a garden as the French do, and so it is impossible to get the playwright to mold our free barbaric English drama into the French form, and Ibsen got his inheritance through the French from the Greeks. I do not mean from the Greeks as they actually wrote, but as the French and Italian pedants imagined them to have written."

"What about Shakespeare's construction? Many things in his plays could be left out without injuring the plot."

"Because his construction has no relation whatever to the Greek school, he was developed from the splendid barbaric freedom of the Middle Ages. He excelled in getting down to the heart of things and in the diversity of his characters. Have you ever noticed how absolutely distinct in method of expression each one of his characters is? Most other poetic dramatists make the conversation a sort of unified whole, as if it were a simple poem, but each one of Shakespeare's people is totally different from the others in his speech. The pompous King speaks like a pompous King, the buffoon like a buffoon, and one will follow on right after the other."

"Why is it?" I next asked, "that plays of 50 or 100 years ago that were great in their day are no longer of interest?"

"It is because of the change in the motives. We do not understand what the motives were then; a play, however great, that deals with questions of interest only to its own day will not last. We must get beyond that, go down deep to make a thing last, but if we have a big enough keel it will take the boat over any sea. 'The School for Scandal' has shown no signs of dying, nor will it, because the subject, scandal, is a vital one for all times, and it makes no difference that the setting is not a modern one. That, also, is where Shakespeare's greatness lies."

"I should like to ask you if you would not mind telling me how you came to make the writing of plays your profession."

"As a young man just starting out I did not know what I wanted most to do. I had studied the art of sculpture, and was very devoted to it. I had also studied law, in Detroit, was working in a law office in the daytime, and in the evening modeling a mass of wet clay in my room. At the same time I was interested enough to write a weekly article for a paper about the stage."

"You really had three professions, then?"

"Yes, as we do when we are young, before we have really decided on our life work."

"How did you come to write your first play?"

"That was rather amusing. There was a little stock company in Detroit, as there was in every city at that time—1864. I had just read 'Les Miserables,' and was tremendously impressed with it, particularly the first part about Fantine. So I went to the manager and asked him if I dramatized it if he would produce it. He said he would if the leading lady were willing, so I next consulted her. She was willing. My next step was to get the paper I wrote for to let me write an announcement of the coming production. They consented. I wrote a column about it, and all this before I had put pen to paper to find out whether I could make the dramatization or not. Somehow I never asked myself that question, though I had never done anything of that sort before."

"Was it a success?"

"They produced it to crowded houses for a week, and that was considered a great success. It seems comical now."

"That is rather a hard question to answer," he replied, and added with a jolly smile, "it is like asking a father which child he likes best. There are different things in each play that one likes. I put the ideas that meant the most to me in 'Aristocracy,' and 'The Henrietta,' in construction, like a well-worked-out Chinese puzzle, is probably the best; while 'Old Love Letters' is my particular pet baby. Then, as Boucicault said, 'One always likes the last thing he has done the best, because he remembers it most clearly,' and the last play I have written is 'Kate.' That I wrote for Harper's to publish, and no arrangement has been made to produce it. It is the only one of my plays that I have ever had published in book form. This brings us again to the subject of the relation of the stage to printed literature. It is not only true that most of the best plays in the English language have no reading public, but also that few of the biggest print-literary men have been great as dramatists. Even Goldsmith, for instance, as playwright, or Bulwer Lytton could hardly rank more than in a third class according to any classification I can make, while many great dramatists have been lawyers, doctors, clergymen. Gen. Burgoyne and Judge Talfeurd wrote plays, their only form of literary expression, and the last great classical tragedy in the English language was by the Rev. Mr. Home, a Scotch Presbyterian."

***

MR. AUGUSTUS THOMAS readily agreed that it was true that most plays were not published in book form, and that if they were it would not be a profitable business for the publishers.

"But why is it that so few of us care to read plays?" I asked.

"'Because most people lack in imagination,' he replied. "The novel writer must be a narrator, a describer. He tells the reader the color of the hero's eyes, the setting of the scene, the action, his motives, antecedent training, inherited disposition, and other influences, and all this must be supplied in reading a play by the reader himself. Few of us have enough imagination to be able to do that."

"How do you account for the fact that almost no great novel writers have been also dramatists?"

"For the reason that the mind of the dramatist is of an entirely different order. The dramatist is chiefly concerned with construction. If he were not a dramatist he would be a bridge builder or a clock maker, or engaged in the construction of a subway, or be in a similar occupation, while the author is concerned with a narrative, in which the form has by no means such importance."

"What interests you most in your dramatic work?"

"It is the quality of effect that the play produces on the audience. By that I mean the kind of effect."

"What do you want that effect to be; in other words, what is the purpose of the stage?"

"The purpose of the theatre to my mind is to realize ideals. In real life we usually fall short of those ideals, and the stage, it seems to me, is a place where ideals are to be realized. When one has written a play that leaves a good taste in the mouth of the audience he may feel he has succeeded."

Mr. Thomas wrote his first play when he was only 16. That indicated plainly what his bent was. He has been engaged in various occupations, but always the thing he has cared most about was his dramatic work. He studied law, and for some years was a writer and illustrator for St. Louis, Kansas City, and New York papers. Then he became editor and proprietor of the famous City Mirror.

As might be expected from what has already been said, only two of Mr. Thomas's plays have been published in book form. Mr. Thomas found his play, "Mrs. Leffingwell's Boots," perhaps the most interesting to write, because of the intricate construction. "Arizona" he thought was his best melodrama, while "Alabama," which he speaks of as a pastoral, he said best presented his ethical ideas.

"Why is it," I asked him, "that so few plays survive the day in which they are written?"

"I think that is due," he said, "somewhat to change in phraseology and diction, and also because of the difference in customs and mode of life."

Mr. Thomas did not seem to be a great admirer of Ibsen. He had seen but one of his plays. He felt that the purpose of the stage should be constructive rather than destructive, and so he did not take much interest in Ibsen's plays.

Mr. Thomas did not at all agree with Mr. Howard in his theory that much is put in a play that is not necessary, merely for the purpose of making it seem natural and like real life. He thought that every character introduced had some vital connection with the plot that would develop later on, even though it turned out to be only the carrying of a message.

EDWARD HENRY PEPLE is a Southerner; he comes from Richmond, Va. He goes about his literary work in a manner quite different from the methods employed by other authors; that is to say, he always writes a play first, then from this play his novel is built, additional scenes sketched in, and the whole work enlarged to the requirements of a story in book form. But his central idea is ever for the play, only, unlike many playwrights, his plays all appear also as novels. At present, however, Mr. Peple is reversing his method in a new novel which is just completed and which will be published in the Fall. It will be called "Semiramis." Of this piece of work he says:

"Of course it has been in my mind all along to dramatize the story, although the production would necessarily be a most expensive one, owing to the large cast, ancient Assyrian costuming, and elaborate scenery. The work has given me a great deal of pleasure, not only because of the character study, but because of the research it required among ancient historians. All modern writers consider 'Semiramis' merely as a myth, and even with Herodotus and Diodorus her history is so interwoven with legend and religious superstition that the untangling of the skein has proved an interesting, though difficult, task. Heretofore the character of Semiramis has been treated from a standpoint of advanced age and advanced wickedness, as in the opera of 'Semiramide' and a drama in the French; there-

Dramatists Who Write Books.

Of the novel "Richard the Brazen," which Mr. Peple wrote in collaboration with Dr. Cyrus Townsend Brady, he confesses to no keen satisfaction in it, in view of the fact that, while it has proved a splendid seller, its creation required no intellectual effort, but was rather a machine-made story from start to finish.

"Was 'The Prince Chap' originally a story?" I asked.

"No; portions of it were in one of my first plays, which was called 'The Tutor,' and which was never completed. I used the material in the 'Prince Chap' when it was suggested to me to present a heroine at three different ages. I then completed the play, but, while waiting for a producer, the novel was written directly from the lines in the play."

"You must be very fond of children, aren't you?"

"Yes, indeed, I am," he replied. "They are a constant delight to me, and when I lived in Richmond the 'kiddies' of the neighborhood used to pay me formal and informal visits every day. Of course there were games and fairy stories and tales of 'whigmaleeries' and 'fibbermagibbits,' and through my fondness for these very children was gleaned much of my material for 'The Prince Chap.'

"Are you an admirer of Ibsen?"

"Well, yes, in a certain way; though, candidly, I prefer to read both him and Shaw rather than see them played—that is, with the exception of 'Hedda Gabler,' which, when well done, is absorbing in every line and move. 'Peer Gynt,' which I had never read before seeing it played, I did not enjoy until after I left the theatre and could digest the beauty and the meaning of its mysticisms at leisure. I find Ibsen morbid, and, while artistic morbidity has always appealed to me personally, I believe it does little for the stage from an ethical point of view. The general public seems to demand a wholesome story, with a heart interest, a few thrills thrown in to keep the pot a-boiling, and a happy ending—and I dare say they are right."

I HAD a short note from George Ade the other day, who said: "In answer to your question as to how I got into my line of work, there is really little to tell. I began publishing little books, and soon learned that the very public which prided itself upon its irreproachable English was exceedingly fond of a heathenish kind of parlor slang, and so I served it up for a while in allopathic doses. I began writing plays because, like Mr. Clyde Fitch, Mr. Richard Harding Davis, and some others, I discovered that a man armed only with a fountain pen could make more money writing for the theatrical managers than he could get out of the publishers. I have slacked up on writing plays because the game is a wearing one, and the fame to be achieved as a playwright is not always of a most satisfactory kind."

Mr. Ade went on to say that he was not doing any work at present that the public would consider important. He is doing some newspaper syndicate articles, and rewriting and elaborating a story called "The Slim Princess," and as he expresses it "backing up" to get a good start on one or two new plays.

AN ENGLISHWOMAN IN MOROCCO.

LIFE in Tangier must have a great charm of novelty for the busy Occidental who first gains experience of its drowsy, languorous ways. This unassuming volume is the work of a lady, an English officer's wife, who has been a resident of Tangier for the past eight years, and has therefore had ample opportunities to observe and to study the picturesque Moorish life which she describes so pleasantly. Life in Morocco must be subject to constant surprises, some of them of a disagreeably startling kind. For instance, while enjoying a paper chase, gotten up for the benefit of one of the children who was about to return to England, the merry party was suddenly confronted by a band of grimly ferocious Moors, and learned that they were on their way to attack a neighboring village, in order to settle an ancient feud; once, while camping out for a week, the whole party was very nearly kidnapped, with a view to obtaining ransoms; one morning the authoress was disturbed by loud sobbing and weeping, apparently that of a child in great distress, but she found that it proceeded from her own Moorish manservant, whom she discovered lamenting with clinched fists, contorted face, and streaming eyes because he had been detected in the act of stealing a neighbor's apples. A fanatical sect of the Moors observe an annual festival called the Great As-Sowl. They sacrifice a sheep, sprinkle the children with its blood, and daub the foreheads of the grown people with it. Then follows a procession, headed by the sheep, to the tents of the Sheik, where there is feasting, and dancing. Then a sheep is killed and thrown to them as a fox might be thrown to a pack of hounds. Whereupon these objectionable savages fall upon it and tear it to pieces, eagerly devouring the flesh. On one occasion five sheep were thus disposed of.

Pig sticking is one of the chief field sports of the country, and Mrs. Pleydell, by her coolness and skill, had the good fortune to kill an unusually large and formidable boar. There is a detailed account of a Moorish wedding, which the writer considers far more impressive and beautiful than the corresponding ceremonies of her own land. There is a somewhat unusually large number of typographical errors, which should be corrected in a second edition. The success of this little volume has encouraged Mrs. Pleydell to continue her work, and she is now preparing a larger book upon the same subject.

AMERICAN HISTORY.

IN this latest addition to the host of brief accounts of American history the author sets out to answer various questions, such as "How did the United States become a Nation?" "Why did our ancestors make this Government so unlike all others?" "What is the secret of its phenomenal success?" Individualism is his broad answer to the last inquiry, the universal presence of opportunity, equality of all before the law, and freedom of business and enterprise from "the curse of governmental interference." As a sufficient corrective of the evils incidental to our industrial life, he regards "the steady growth of an enlightened and responsive public conscience and a natural evolutionary adjustment induced by the ceaseless play of inherent forces." Remedial legislation he deprecates as "doubtful." Apparently in our civilization, where original equality of opportunity has resulted in the greatest inequality in power, he does not seem to think governmental control necessary to protect the weak against the strong.

The book is not a good one to put into the hands of students whom it is desired to instruct in the facts and principles of American history. There are too many errors of fact. For example, Portugal did not send out a fleet about 1501 "under the command of Americus Vespucius." The London Company did not send out its colonists "under the command of Capt. John Smith." On Page 37 it is stated that "the Dutch colonists were governed by 'patroons.'" Such examples could be multiplied.

Nor is Mr. Prince always happy in his generalizations. What is the student to make of this, for instance? "Governments have no just powers in the accurate and philosophical meaning of the term. They have necessary powers, since the constant presence of recognized authority is essential to the integrity and safety of the social structure, but these powers are usurped and in no sense delegated." It seems to say that all Governments are of necessity unjust.

Few will agree with him that slavery was not the fundamental cause of the civil war, and while it may be true that "the magnificent popular enthusiasm which swept and surged like a tidal wave North and South for four long and bloody years" was not occasioned by the desire of the North to free the negro, Mr. Prince's further statement that the desire of the South to perpetuate his servitude was not a main cause of the war is scarcely tenable. He looks to the opposing constitutional theories of the North and the South to explain the conflict. That the two sections came to bold divergent theories about the nature of American government is true, but why were the theories in the free and the slave-holding sections different? Instead of saying that slavery was merely the "concrete issue" over which hostile theories came into conflict, it would be more correct to say that Southern political leaders invoked their constitutional theories, sincerely held, no doubt, to defend their institution. State sovereignty as a school of political philosophy was the legal justification they employed for secession—but the "concrete issue" was the real and ultimate cause. The South seceded, not to test any abstract theory, but because she believed the control of the Government by the Republican Party meant the beginning of the end of slavery. It is not strictly accurate, moreover, to say that the South was resorting to the "right of revolution," for the South maintained that secession was legal.

TOPICS OF THE WEEK

IN the University of Chicago, where the curriculum is as broad as the continent, and, perhaps, as deep as the Atlantic Ocean, they study the short story. One of the aims of this institution of learning seems to be to develop a nation of writers. Every struggling writer, conscious of his own inherent ability and the cold neglect of a world full of readers, knows that there are more than enough writers now, but the number is constantly increasing, and it is well that people who will write, whether or no, should have the means of learning how to write properly. You cannot invest an unfinished writer with the creative talent by means of college lectures or literary handbooks, but you can teach him, if he be susceptible to learning, not to fill his plays with long narratives of past events, not to try to turn polemical discussions into novels, not to confuse the short story with the novel. Evelyn May Albright of the Ohio Wesleyan University has written what seems to us a very useful book on "The Short Story: Its Principles and Structure" (Macmillan.) A novel feature is a reading list of noteworthy short stories, including many of the accepted master works in this form of literature, and "a fairly representative selection from recent magazines." These stories are used as examples, and classified with the various divisions of the subject treated of by the author. The stories of Hawthorne, Poe, Manpassant, Bret Harte, T. B. Aldrich, Stockton, Kipling, James, Stevenson, and the other masters are thus analyzed, as well as those of Mary Wilkins Freeman, Hamlin Garland, Ruth McEnery Stuart, Edith Wharton, Robert Chambers, and a host of lesser writers. The writer considers motive, plot, mechanism, dialogue, setting, the "emotional element," and "the spirit of the author."

A WEEK that brings forth a new book by Maxim Gorky, a new collection of short stories by Israel Zangwill, and a new work of fiction by William Dean Howells cannot be called barren of literary production. The week ending April 27, 1907, therefore, is worthy of remembrance. We do not doubt for a moment that the ability of Maxim Gorky has been greatly overestimated by many of his admirers. But with all his self-consciousness and morbidity he is still a writer of uncommon force who has seen strange things and described them well. "Mother" (Appleton) is a powerful story, which may be too sentimental and overwrought, but deserves serious attention. Mr. Zangwill's "Ghetto Comedies" (Macmillan) contains some tales with which many of us are already familiar through their publication in periodicals. We have already noted the existence of Melchitsedek Pinchas, the Yiddish Hamlet, more than once. He is a comparatively new development in the wonderfully composite society of our own big metropolis, but he is as real as the Americanized Irishman, or the German east sider of the last generation ever was. In Mr. Howells's new novel we come again upon the violent contrast of our manners and policies and those of Altruria. "Through the Eye of the Needle" (Harper) involves the romance of an American girl and an Altrurian. Reviews of these books, of course, will follow in due season. Meanwhile their advent is worthy of note as literary news.

A BOOK of the hour that deserves and shall receive more extended consideration later on is "Efficient Democracy," by William H. Allen, long associated with the charitable work of improving the condition of the poor in this city, and Secretary of the "Committee on the Physical Welfare of School Children." (Dodd, Mead & Co.) Mr. Allen begins with a vigorous, coherent exposure of the prevalent "goodness fallacy." "Good men will administer well" is the popular idea. A good man without administrative ability, "which is most rare," will do nothing of the sort. We may admit that much without following Mr. Allen so far as to admit that "goodness, good, upright, conscientious, honorable, and sterling are among the words that justify Talleyrand's definition of language—'a means of concealing thought.'" But Mr. Allen explains himself. There is no generally accepted standard of "goodness." A man who plays golf on Sunday is considered by many worthy folk a deplorable sinner. Mr. Allen is eloquent in this respect. He dips into history, as far back as primitive man, who had no ideal of mere goodness. "Efficiency" is his motto. He discusses also the comparative worthlessness of statistics, and proceeds with a rational argument in favor of ideas, energy, knowledge properly acquired, in public administration, public education, and charitable work.

THE increased interest in Swinburne and his work, due to the ceremonious celebration of the seventieth anniversary of the poet's birth, leads The London Academy to a pleasant discussion of the early editions of his "Poems and Ballads." The first bore the title of "Laus Veneris" and was privately printed. A few copies of this are jealously guarded by lucky collectors. The first public edition was brought out by Moxon in green covers. It was received with acclaim, and aroused great and heated discussion. There is a story that Tennyson compelled Moxon to withdraw the book, threatening otherwise to change his publisher. This may not be true, but the book was withdrawn from the market, and copies of the Moxon edition are now highly prized. The "Poems and Ballads" afterward appeared with the imprint of Camden Hotten. The Academy's bibliophile says that a number of copies of this edition were bought up by some enterprising person, who inserted in them a forgery of the Moxon title page. He asserts that many collectors cherish this fraudulent compilation as a "first edition." But the real Moxon bears the publisher's cipher on the green cover, and on page 222 these two stanzas of "Félise" are printed in a type different from that used for the rest of the poem:

O lips that mine have grown into
Like April's kissing May,
O fervent eyelids letting through
Those eyes the greenest of things blue
The bluest of things grey.

If you were I and I were you
How could I love you, say?
How could the rose-leaf love the rue
The day love nightfall and her dew
Though night may love the day?

MANY American visitors to London this Summer will be inconvenienced by the closing of the spacious reading room of the British Museum. It will doubtless spoil well-laid plans of many students and writers. The reading room is undergoing renovation and repairs, and will not be reopened until October or later. In England it is generally later. The English artisan is sure but slow. While the reading room is closed a limited number of tickets will be issued, entitling the holder to use the library for reading and research, but there will not be more than 200 of these. It is understood, however, that the Directors of the museum will help to the best of their power all students who have pressing work in hand. The facilities of reading and research will be available for all who are engaged in actual editorial work which cannot be postponed. Others must do the best they can in the reading rooms of other libraries.

IN "Thucydides Mythistoricus," by Francis Macdonald Cornford, published here by the Longmans, we have, to be sure, a study of the Greek historian who was a contemporary of Pericles, a study full of literary grace and charm, but we have also a theory of history, a study of the historian's art from the modern and sophisticated point of view. Thucydides, this scholar believes, must be read with caution. This simply means that he must be understood. The historian had the Greek mind of the Periclean age. "The mind of any individual," says Mr. Cornford, "however little he may think himself to be in sympathy with his contemporaries, is not an insulated compartment, but more like a pool in one continuous medium—the circumambient atmosphere of his place and time." Instead of "the furniture of thought," which every modern student inherits, Thucydides, in common with his Athenian contemporaries, had the cast of mind induced by the study of the poets exclusively. Aeschylus was his master. He never understood the origin of the Peloponnesian War, "because his mind was filled with preconceptions which shaped the event he witnessed into a certain form." We shall not attempt to follow further this argument of a scholar with scholars, but readers who have the mind for such things will find "Thucydides Mythistoricus" an inspiriting and commendable book.

IN Lippincott's Magazine for May Mr. George L. Knapp treats of the German legend of Tannhäuser (not Wagner's version, but the original,) as "the earliest piece of Protestant literature on record." He finds in it "a medieval protest against the manner in which the Church administered its trust." This may not be a new idea, but it is certainly not a familiar one. The original twelfth century Tannhäuser wasted a joyful year at the court of Venus in the Horselberg, and then came forth and sought absolution of the Pope. The head of the Church told him forgiveness was impossible. Until the staff the Pope carried brought forth green leaves the curse must rest on the knight. But no sooner had the discomfited Tannhäuser returned to the court of Venus, than the Pope's staff put forth leaves and blossoms, and messengers were sent after the knight—too late. Clearly the Pope was mistaken, and missed a good chance to save a soul when he refused absolution to Tannhäuser.

Kipling Maligned in a French Novel, but He Does Not Seem to Care —Forthcoming Books.

LONDON, April 26.—Rudyard Kipling has recently been the victim of that intangible creature Rumor, whose freedom for distorting truth it is needless to point out. Here are the facts: A few months ago a wonderfully interesting and successful novel was published in French by Tharaud. The book was called "Dingley, l'Illustre Ecrivain," and the character of the illustrious author in question was to the least astute of readers plainly founded on Kipling. The imaginary portrait, moreover, which described Dingley's, or Kipling's, supposed actions, thoughts, feelings, and relations to his wife and child at the time of the Boer war was not altogether a pleasant one. The book attracted much attention in England, and not long ago a rumor began to get about in London, and repeated by folks who seemed to speak with authority, to the effect that Kipling was highly indignant at the bold adaptation of his career and personality. It was even said that he intended protesting to Tharaud against what was certainly an impertinence, though an immensely clever one. Scenting an interesting literary scandal I investigated the matter, and this is what Mr. Kipling, just back from a trip to South Africa, tells me in all seriousness: "I have neither seen nor heard of the book." The manifest deduction is that somebody has been cruelly overworking his imagination in this matter.

WHAT is described as a kind of "Arabian Nights" of India is about to be issued with the title of "Storia do Mogul." The tales, which have a bearing on historical events, are translated and edited under the supervision of the Royal Asiatic Society and published by John Murray. The same publisher announces "The Letters of Robert Schumann," the composer; "The Licensed House," a book about the British public house by Edwin A. Pratt, who stands up for "honest English beer" against so-called temperance drinks, and "The Prayer Book," in the making of which the Rev. F. H. Weston traces the history of the English Prayerbook from the earliest Jewish days.

Benson Books.

London Daily Chronicle.

Mr. Arthur Christopher Benson has accustomed us to what is beginning to be known as the Benson book. Here is its recipe! Take a lonely man—widower for choice, or, failing that, a middle-aged bachelor—let him be consumptive or otherwise threatened with early death, place him in a country cottage, give him an ample supply of pens, ink, and paper, with the faculty for expressing beautiful unoriginal thoughts on all manner of subjects. Provide an italicized preface, an ample margin for pencilled comments, and then serve rapidly—and frequently, but not at a rate of more than two volumes a month. Mr. Arthur Benson is the past-master of the craft; much practice has made him perfect; his youngest brother now follows suit, and is at once adept. In ten years' time a section of the British Museum Reading Room will be labeled "Benson Books." And a very good thing, too.

E. P. Butler Writes Again.

A new book is to come from Ellis Parker Butler, author of "Pigs Is Pigs" and "The Incubator-Baby." It will be called "The Confessions of a Daddy," and will be issued some time during May by the Century Company.

BOOKS ON ART AND ARTISTS.

MICHEL ANGELO, Correggio, and Delacroix are the subjects of the three latest additions to Newnes's Art Library of volumes illustrative of the work of the great artists. The books, it will be remembered, are principally made up of half-tone reproductions of between sixty and sixty-five of the most representative of the artists' paintings. Each volume, too, has a photogravura frontispiece. The half-tones and photogravures are carefully made, and show every detail, and for these reasons are of aesthatic interest. The essays, too, are interesting, and are by well-known writers. In the present instance Dr. Georg. Gronau provides that on Michel Angelo, and speaks particularly of the master's "Last Judgment," painted on the ceiling of the Sistioe Chapel in the Vatican, begun in May, 1508, and completed in October, 1512, with which Pope Julius II., the nephew of Sixtus IV., for whom it was done, was said by the painter to be "quite content." This ceiling, which was divided by Michel Angelo into several parts,)in each of which the Creator appears, has been regarded as a sort of "artistic error." But this attitude, Dr. Gronau asserts, suffers from the fact that it is based upon "general ideas in part of a mera literary character, and not out of the special circle of formal art." It shows the master as he was—natural- and in examining his "Last Judgment" one should strive to recognize him and understand him and not to look for one's own ideas. The tragedy of the painter's own life. Dr. Gronau says in conclusion, "imperiously demanded immortalization in his art," and if we follow up this thought can we, he asks, look at the "Last Judgment" without deep emotion instead of horror? The illustrations in the volume are entirely from photographs of various parts of the "Last Judgment."

Correggio's art and its later influence are discussed by Selwyn Brinton in the "Correggio" volume. Mr. Brinton speaks briefly of the master's work from the time he was commissioned with the consent of his father to make the altar piece to decorate the high altar of the church of the Franciscans of Correggio, near Parma, where lived Antonio Allegri and his parents. This altar piece presents a Virgin in the same position as Andrea Mantegna's "Lady of the Victory," but instead of blessing a warrior Correggio's Virgin extends a hand toward an adoring St. Francis. Among the pictures of Allegri mentioned by Mr. Brinton are "The Repose in Egypt," the "Zingarella," the "Madonna della Cesta," the "Madonna del Latte," the "Vision of St. John tha Divine," the "Sleeping Antiope," down to the works known as the "Leda," "Io," and "Danaë," some of which are presented in the half-tone reproductions in the book. The location of Allegri of Correggio's principal works and a description of each are given in a separate list.

Among the pictures of Delacroix in Henri Frantz's book in this series are: "Desdemona Cursed by Her Father," some scenes from "The Massacre of Scio," details of "Liberty Guiding the People," as well as some of his interpretations of Scott and Shakespeare, and also pictures of Eastern life. Although Delacroix has been accused of lacking calm impassibility and detachment, which is proved by his numerous paintings of strife, dramatic episodes, murders, &c., still he also shows a serenity of mind in his decorations of the Palais Bourbon and the Senate.

ENGLISH ENGRAVERS.

THE OLD ENGRAVERS OF ENGLAND IN THEIR RELATION TO CONTEMPORARY LIFE AND ART, (1540-1800.) By Malcolm C. Salaman, author of "Woman Through a Man's Eyeglass," &c. 12mo. Numerous illustrations. Philadelphia: The J. B. Lippincott Company. $2.

MALCOLM C. SALAMAN is very enthusiastic about "old prints," and, as he hints in the preface to his volume on "The Old Engravers of England," they "stir" him with vivid passages of history, "quicken" his imagination with the social sidelight, while they also bring him "at once eye to eye with the people themselves." Looking upon his old engravings, he sees what these people actually saw, "the very faces and persons of their contemporaries, the costumes they wore, the attitudes they affected." And he goes on to trace the art of copperplate engraving in England through a most interesting period of its history, from the middle of the sixteenth century to the end of the eighteenth.

Elizabethan England was a period of discovery and strenuous doings, so that all that appealed to a person's emotional temper was demanded, and art was hardly encouraged when William Rogers issued his "Eliza Triumphans" in 1589. This is the earliest known example of engraving by a native artist devoted to portraitnre. Bot it was nearly half a century before then that copperplata engraving first appeared in England. Naturally, the mapmakers and "describers of countries" gave the art its real impetus in "Merrie England." Among these was Augustine Ryther, Benjamin Wright, Humphry Cole, Theodore de Bry, William Rogers, Thomas Cockson, and others more or less accomplished and ingenious.

It is with the line-engravers of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries that Mr. Salaman first concerns himself. Following these he tells "The Story of Mezzotint," which takes up the largest part of the volume. Of comparatively recent importation in America, having been introduced in the first half of the last century by the late John Sartain of Philadelphia, mezzotint engraving went out of fashion with the development of photography and the growing cheapness of the half-tone, but it is again being revived. It was through Prince Rupert that the mezzotint became known in England. Shortly before giving up everything for love of beautiful Mistress Hughes, a Drury Lane actress, he initiated William Sherwin in the art. The first work [illegible] was a portrait of Charles [illegible] dedicated to Prince [illegible] that there will ap[illegible] from a careful study of Evelyn's "Executioner's Head." The art kept on in its development until its climax was reached in John Raphael Smith, William Ward, Robert Laurie, down to Samuel Cousins, T. G. Lupton, and David Lucas, who carried on the great traditions of the art into the nineteenth century. Following the revival, of line engraving came stipple engraving, with an account of which Mr. Salaman closes his book.

There are forty-eight half-tone illustrations in tha volume, which in themselves tell the story of the development of engraving in England, from the first line engraving by William Rogers after a portrait of Queen Elizabeth, down to the stipple engravings of J. R. Smith and William Ward.

ART VERSUS NATURE.

THE ESSENTIALS OF AESTHETICS IN MUSIC, POETRY, PAINTING, SCULPTURE, AND ARCHITECTURE. By Prof. George Lansing Raymond, Author of "A System of Comparative Aesthetics." 12mo. Illustrated. Pp. 404. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

ALTHOUGH the most careful study of Prof. Raymond's volume on the "Essentials of Aesthetics" may never have the credit of making a painter, sculptor, architect, composer, or poet, yet it can hardly fail to make talent more rational, genius more conscious of the principles of art, and the critic and connoisseur better equipped for impression, judgment, or appraisement.

What is art? What are the fine arts? Some years ago Prof. Charles Eliot Norton attempted a definition which satisfied most people, while it left the relation of nature to art as a matter for ingenious speculation. Prof. Raymond is more concise and draws his analogies from everyday examples. A child who charms with grace of movement and sweetness of voice we call artless; in a grown woman who produces similar effects we admire her art. A prisoner unjustly accused may bring the court to tears; an actor surrounded by an imitation of the same environment may produce the same affect upon his audience. The photograph of a landscape or person may be a marvel of accuracy, and yet no one can say that it produces the same effect as a painting or portrait of the same subject by a great artist. Wherein lies the difference? While artlessness and art may move the observer to similar emotions, the same is not true of nature and art. The method concealed in the former instance is obvious in the latter through the very material employed. Art, therefore, amounts to method, and Prof. Raymond's whole book is devoted to an exposition of the fact that this method has nothing to do with copy or imitation, but is based, develops, and finds inspiration through essentially different principles.

While everybody recognizes that these principles are based upon the finest mathematics, one may know the entire range of this science from arithmetic to calculus without being able to produce a single artistic work. Knowledge is not sufficient for the artist, although its presence may prevent him from producing bad art. He must have something more—imagination, inspiration, and an eye not merely to see things as they are, but an eye to see them when he has attempted to give an illusion of them. Prof. Raymond emphasizes one essential point among many others of less importance. The literary or plastic artist, while serving his apprenticeship, should early be weaned from the error that his adherence to nature is the end of his endeavor. He should study nature or the work of great artists only that he may become familiar with his tools and that he may discern the difference between nature and art, and from the, former learn to grasp the qualities and principles of the latter.

The whole moral of Prof. Raymond's book may be summed up in the following words of Blake: "I do not see in the sun a round ball of fire, something larger than a guinea, but the glory of the universe, as I hear angels singing, 'Glory to the Lord Almighty.'" But what artist has yet painted a picture which can call forth such an expression of emotion? Art, after all, has its limitations. Often it transcends nature, only to be conquered by her at last.

VIEWS OF READERS ON CRITICISM

Mr. H. H. Harrison Reiterates His Theories—Admirers of Miss Hawthorne and Mr. Cawein.

I.

New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

BEG leave to trouble once more your editorial ear. While I have no quarrel either with "admirers" or with charming writers I must demur to all sentimental considerations in the matter of literary criticism. Criticism may be regarded either as a science or as an art. In either case it has its laws and methods which must be followed if any good results are to be obtained. From the days of Longinus, the uoknown Alexandrian, to our own time critics have agreed that literary criticism involves an estimate of literary productions. All criticism is judgment of one sort or another. Even in the darkest period of English criticism—from Colley Cibber to Jeffries of The Edinburgh Review—when laws were thrown to the winds and dogmatism was supreme, even then criticism was held to be judgment. Let us remember this that we may not stray too far. Now there are several sorts of criticism. The first and lowest is impressionism. In this the critic consults no general principle of the art, (or science,) but receives an impression. The method is subjective; it is the method of the man in the street, the "admirer," the essentially uncritical mind. Then there is comparative criticism. In this the critic compares one literary production with another, (usually one already acknowledged by time and common consent to be good,) and depends on the results. Again we have interpretative criticism, in which the critic expounds the work of an author, gives that which is written between the lines, and helps the reader to understand more readily. The highest of all is creative criticism, which—to crib an expression from Matthew Arnold—creates new currents of thought to act as points of departure. There are others, but these are enough for our purpose. And now I shall give an example of each kind: (1) Ingersoll's Lecture on Shakespeare; (2) Longinus on the Sublime, e. g., chapters on Sappho's poetry; (3) Carlyle's essay on Burns, and (4) De Quincey on The Knocking at the Gate in "Macbeth."

In THIS NEW YORK TIMES SATURDAY REVIEW or BOOKS we often meet one or other of the first three (it would be unfair to expect the fourth) in letters, in notices, and reviews. Are we forbidden to judge these by the same standard which we elsewhere apply? I think not. And here, as elsewhere, charm of style is an inadequate substitute for criticism or reviewing. And what are the characteristics of a competent review of any book? These: It must explain the purpose of the author, tell whether he attains it, it must reproduce his thesis in little, or the plot, if a novel; it must tell in what spirit the author's work is done—in short, it must tell what the book is so that the casual reader may know whether it is worth his while to read it. These are the essentials which a good review must have.

If it has them not it is not a good review, no matter what else it may have. In our day ignorance sits enthroned in high places, and as long as this world approximates to Carlyle's contemptuous estimate of it so long shall she so sit. But in the meanwhile there are still some of us who, to use Mommsen's phrase, "stand aloof from all ideology and everything fanciful," and dare to make known our belief that there is nothing essentially sacred or immune in feministic criticism.

HUBERT H. HARRISON.

II.

New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

Mr. Harrison scolds. Scolding is never criticism. In the literary work of Miss Hawthorne there has always been a noticeable absence of assertion, affectation, or hysteria. Miss Hawthorne's criticisms and reviews remind me of some simple but superior outline drawings her grandmother, Sophie Hawthorne, used to make. I like her criticisms for their atmosphere of sound, normal, youthful mentality. They say something sweetly wholesome and good to me. Much of the criticism reads like paid copy, flattery, incompetent judging, unfair comparisons, and too often an attempt at atmospheric effect. Hildegarde Hawthorne's criticisms and reviews are free from any of these defects.

Mr. Harrison can learn something about criticism by reading Miss Hawthorne's articles with less heat and more judgment. In law the rule is "subordinate your feelings to your intellect." A reliable critic is a judge, and not a carper nor a scold.

New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

Both the strictures and praise of your correspondent concerning the Spring Book Number seemed in the main well taken, particularly the commendation of Mr. Bradley's admirable critique on Cowley, but one cannot pass unchallenged his comment upon the review by Madison Cawein.

"Review" is, however, a misnomer in connection with Mr. Cawein's work, for, if I mistake not, THE TIMES had already had both an editorial and a signed review of "The Far Horizon," and it would have been banal to add a third formal analysis of the plot and characters. An impression was precisely the thing demanded if the book were touched upon at all, and the artistic way in which Mr. Cawein gave this impression, the charm with which he suggested the atmosphere of the book, and the intuitive delicacy of discrimination by which he emphasized its finer motives and essentials rendered the criticism, to my thinking, not only delightful, but illuminating as well. The very charm of the work was its impressionistic character, which seems to have offended your practical correspondent.

JUSTICE.

New York, April 25, 1907.

Books Annotated by Coleridge.

New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

You refer to the sale at Sotheby's, in London, of an interesting copy of Southey's "Life of Wesley," with the marginal annotations of Samuel Taylor Coleridge. May I ask the courtesy of your columns to remind your readers that I am still anxious to secure the titles and to learn the present whereabouts of all books thus annotated by Coleridge? When I first undertook this task some six years ago the only useful list of such marginalia was the British Museum Catalogue, which enumerated the seventy odd titles of such books in that great library. In my "Bibliography of Coleridge," (published in 1903,) I brought together a list of 341 marginalia, and in most cases I was able to record where the books were then to be found. Since then enough new titles have been brought to my attention to bring the total close to 400. There are still astray, however, a number of books from the libraries of Lamb, Wordsworth, and others, which are enriched by S. T. C.'s scribbled comment. Moreover, most of the 39 volumes of marginalia from the library of Coleridge's disciple, Dr. Joseph Henry Green, which were sold in New York (1884) by Scribner & Welford, have not been traced.

I need not dwell upon the usefulness of this material to future editors of Coleridge. The day cannot be far distant when the literary world will demand an adequate critical edition of Coleridge's complete works. Surely no other distinguished writer of his day has been so sadly neglected in this respect. The fact that the only attempt at a "complete" edition of Coleridge was that of Prof. W. G. T. Shedd (New York, Harper, 1853,) reflects little credit upon British publishing enterprise. Students of Coleridge realize the many and peculiar difficulties that will beset the task of the aspiring editor. Among these difficulties, that of the elusive marginalia is not the least; for the editor cannot possibly neglect those random comments inscribed by S. T. C. in his own books and in those borrowed from his friends and acquaintances, teste De Quincey and Lamb.

Duke Lita.

New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

Galbraith last Saturday mentioned among forthcoming new books "The Soul of a Priest," by the Italian Duke Lita, suggesting that he "may have been helped by his American wife in the difficult task of writing a novel in English." While the Duchess Lita-Visconti-Arese is a charming and accomplished woman, who worthily keeps up the tradition of Charleston's brave and beautiful women, the Duke, her husband, needs no help from any one in writing or speaking English, of which language he is such a master that it is difficult to believe that it is not his native tongue; and while "The Soul of a Priest" may be his first novel in English, he has before written on scientific subjects. Duke Lita-Visconti-Arese devotes his estate near Milan largely to silk culture, and Miss Kelly, who has interested the United States Government in introducting it as a Southern industry, has for several years studied the cultivation of silk worms on the Duke's estate, and in having the benefit of his experience in the enterprise will be sure to make it a success.

In sociology Duke Lita is in advance of his co-patriots, and has abolished on his estate the accustomed go-between, who makes bargains between the peasants and proprietor in portioning out the land. As related by Duke Lita to the writer, this was precipitated a few years ago when the peasants were in revolt at existing conditions. It being impossible at the time for the Duke to visit his estate, the brave Duchess returned alone to face the ignorant and enraged mob, bearing to them the promise of dealing directly with the Duke, captivating them so completely by her gracious presence and gentle words of sympathy and justice that she henceforth became their idol, and there is not so contented and happy a peasantry in all Italy as that on the estate of the democratic Duke Lita-Visconti-Arese.

Defends Mrs. Wharton.

New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

Some of your correspondents have declared that Edith Wharton's work is lacking in heart. This seems a very unjust criticism, especially so of "The House of Mirth." It is true, the heart, in this work, does not beat a loud tattoo in the public ear; instead, it throbs quietly in the breast of the story—what can be more pitifully human than the dying Mrs Bart's appeal to her daughter: "Get out of dinginess if you can. Do not let it creep in on you and drag you down"? This is only one of the many heartbeats that one may feel in this masterly piece of fiction. The anatomy of Mrs. Wharton's work is as perfect as is her literary taste and technique.

A. C. Benson's "The Gate of Death."

New York Times Saturday Review of Books:

Will you let me say through your columns to the lovers of good books that I have found a gem in the form of a very unpretentious anonymous book, named "The Gate of Death," and published by the Putnams?

The title would lead one to expect mail-loyed gloom, but the predominating influence of the book is anything but gloomy. I have not often found more vivid descriptions of beautiful landscapes and natural beauty in general. And the especial charm of the book is its simplicity and absolute sincerity of feeling. I think most readers will be inclined to give the writer a higher place than in his humility he claims for himself. But besides its charm it has a very distinct ethical value. Here is a man who has suffered, and is striving to help all other sufferers.

THE WORLD'S PLAYGROUND.

SWITZERLAND. The Country and its People. Written by Clarence Rook. Painted by Effis Jardine. Pp. x-270. New York: G. P. Putnam's Sons.

AUTHOR and artist have combined to make a readable and beautiful book about Switzerland. The history of the country is rapidly sketched from the earliest legends, through the Roman occupation, and down to our own time. Of course only the salient points in the long struggle against oppression are touched upon. In several well-considered chapters the Government of Switzerland is very adequately treated, and there are some suggestive comparisons between Swiss methods of government and those of other nations. Perhaps the most interesting of these chapters is that upon "Popular Control," in which it is said:

Switzerland has evolved two methods of popular control which are worthy of special note. They are called the "referendum" and the "initiative." If I may put it with a certain rough accuracy, these two very important rights amount to this: In the first place, when there is a dispute about a new measure, when it is uncertain whether the majority of the nation wishes it to pass into law, when it seems good that the whole capable community should have a definite measure placed before it, and be invited to say "Yes" or "No"—that is done in Switzerland. That is the referendum. Again, it sometimes happens that the Central Government is out of touch with the people. * * * Switzerland has its remedy for that. The people have the means of making their voice heard. There comes a time when many people want a particular thing done—50,000 in Switzerland. If they want it done, they sign their names, and the question must be set before the voters of the nation. If the majority says it must be done, the Federal Assembly must do it.

The literary associations of the country lead the author to some reminiscences of the many distinguished writers who have lived in Switzerland. The Winter sports and the flowers and fruits of the Alpine Spring furnish matter for comment. Four chapters are devoted, respectively, to the Swiss as soldier, engineer, schoolmaster, and host.

Handbook of Aeronautics.

The Macmillan Company has issued a compact volume, with diagrams and other illustrations, under the title "Pocket Book of Aeronautics," that appears to the editorial layman to be a promising handbook for those interested in the art of flying. The book is by Hermann W. L. Moedebeck, Major of Artillery in the German Army, with several collaborators, and translated by W. Mansergh Varley. No small handbook upon aerial navigation has hitherto been available for English readers. The present work aims to review the history of aerial navigation and its present development and to give scientific information on the physics of the atmosphere. The chapter heads are as follows: 1, "On Gases"; 2, "The Physics of the Atmosphere"; 3, "Meteorological Observations in Balloon Ascents and the Computation of Results"; 4, "Techniqns of Ballooning"; 5, "Kites and Parachutes"; 6, "On Ballooning"; 7, "Ballooning Photography"; 8, "Photographic Surveying from Balloons"; 9, "On Military Ballooning"; 10, "Animal Flight"; 11, "Artificial Flight"; 12, "On Airships"; 13, "On Flying Machines"; 14, "On Motors"; 15, "On Air Screws"; 16, "Aeronautical Societies, Appendix, Tables, and Formulae."

"Family Secrets."

Messrs. Macmillan have published "Family Secrets," by Mrs. Marion Foster Washburne. This is a story of people who suffer financial reverses and are obliged to retreat to poor quarters in a suburban town. There is announced a new edition, furnished with additional illustrations, of Ernest Ingersoll's book, "The Life of Animals."

BOSTON NOTES.

THE misunderstood child of fiction is too often so angelic as to be beyond the comprehension of readers, but the heroine of Mrs. Olive Thorne Miller's "What Happened to Barbara," issued by Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., is emphatically of this world, and her unhappiness comes from naughtiness, innocent because proceeding from temperamental faults, but real naughtiness nevertheless. Her story teaches a good lesson to those clever but silent, self-isolated girls who rather plume themselves on not being beloved, and do not, until well advanced into girlhood, perceive that knowledge has not fully unrolled her ample page to their keen young eyes. Parents who examine the book before giving it to their children will find in it many quaint incidents of travel forty-odd years ago, when Eastern folk still asked Minnesota guests for stories of Indians.

***

Messrs. Houghton, Mifflin & Co. will issue this book to-morrow, and also Mr. Arthur Stanwood Pier's "The Young in Heart," seven essays, of which the titles are: Lawn Tennis, Work and Play, The Smoking Room, Cynicism, The Quiet Man, In Swimming, and Brawn and Character.

***

Students of English literature and of Tennyson in particular will find pleasure in "The Arthur of the English Poets," by Mr. Howard Maynadier. From the nursery days when the child hears of the King, his long hanging sleeves and the three belted serving man, up to the man's reading of the latest expounder of the legend, Arthur has fascinated most readers of English, and Dr. Maynadier will be read not only by those for whom he especially writes, the students of comparative literature, possibly it may interest those, who like Mr. Henry James, believe that words should be properly pronounced, to know that, although strictly speaking, there are four syllables in Mr. Maynadier's name, the last two are pronounced as trippingly as the "dier" in "brigadier."

***

Mr. Bliss Carman's volumes of essays have come to be counted among the literary events of the year by those fond of prose, careful but not affected, strong but not rough, and his volume for 1907, "The Making of Personality," will be found uncommonly interesting and indicative of familiarity with many of the new branches of science bearing upon the formation of character. The chapter titles, "The Power of Personality," "Personal Vibrancy or Magnetism," "The Value of Impulse," "The Guidance of Reason," "Rhythms of Grace," "Modern Heroism," prepare the mind for a book in which both the physical and the practical side of human nature are considered.

***

Messrs. L. C. Page & Co., Mr. Carman's publishers, will this year issue "The Castles and Chateaux of Old Navarre," by Francis Miltoun, who includes Gascony and the Basque Provinces among the regions to which he makes pilgrimage. Fiction writers have attached at least one novel to all the chief places of the land of Jeanne d'Albret" and Henry, her son, but the country has been but little described in detail, and between Daudet and Mr. Janvier, readers have learned to desire minute acquaintance with the Midi. Miss Blanche McManus's light-colored plates and fifty drawings, excellent although they must be, are not needed to attract readers.

***

"The Castle of Doubt," Mr. John H. Whitson's novel, to be published next Saturday by Messrs. Little, Brown & Co., is as puzzling as a detective story, and almost to its very end maintains the mystery into which the reader and the hero plunge together at the moment when, innocently walking the street, he is snatched into the chariot of two bewitching ladies and borne away as wedded, the husband of one of them, although he is a bachelor. The book is to have a four-color frontispiece by Mr. I. H. Caliga.

***

Kentucky seems to be awaking to the possibility of recalling a much-advertised neighbor, and Mr. Madison Cawein now comes forward to speak a good word for Eliza Calvert Hall's "Aunt Jane of Kentucky," the scenes and portraits of which he thinks will be readily recognized as truly representing that humbler life lived quietly and beautifully, "not wildly and wickedly, as so many Northern and Eastern people would rather believe that it is, in the rural districts of our State."

***

The inevitable has come to pass in the case of "The First True Gentleman," a "clippings" bureau having sent Mr. Thomas Dekker, care of Messrs John W. Luce & Co., a neat postcard, offering to supply him with newspaper notices of "his book." Perhaps, considering that the addressing of these cards is left to boys, it is rather surprising that a card was not also sent to the person mentioned in the title. Meanwhile the Boston Herald brings forward Sakya-Muni as the person to whom Dekker's phrase should be applied.

***

Thanks to Mr. John Lane, London has discovered the "Letters and Journals of Samuel Gridley Howe," published in this country by Messrs Dana Estes & Co., and issued in England with a preface by Mrs. Lane. "A Great American" is the heading which The Chronicle bestows upon the book, with a good word for its probable influence upon the excellent understanding between England and America, and "the work done in the good cause by the charming American writer and hostess whose home is in England"; and who, by the way, is American only by her first marriage. "The disclosure of a fascinating personality, and a valuable contribution to Greek history" is The Chronicle's summary of the book.

***

"Our Lady of the Beeches," in its venerable American old age of four seasons or so, has just been issued in London in the Kit Cat Series, and is hailed by The Spectator as an "illuminative and entertaining study of that most wonderful product of civilization, the American woman." The Spectator writer says that the province of the novel reviewer is "to stimulate rather than to gratify curiosity." Alas for us poor Yankees in our blindness who have contented ourselves with trying to determine the merit of new books by the standard of their best predecessors!

GERMAN IDEALS.

GERMAN IDEALS OF TO-DAY AND OTHER ESSAYS ON GERMAN CULTURE. By Kuno Francke. Pp. 341. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

IN this volume Prof. Francke has gathered together a number of his essays which have appeared in various magazines during the last few years, and several public addresses, and to these has added an article on "The Future of German Literature" which has not hitherto been printed. The title is taken from the initial essay, but is equally fitting for the entire volume, since all the contents deal largely with the trend of German social and intellectual life of the present day, and with the ideals and inspirations by which it is being influenced. The author says frankly in his preface that he hopes by means of these papers to arouse sympathy with German views of public life, education, literature, and art. However much one may disagree with some of his premises, such as his convictions on the effect of militarism and monarchy upon the German people, his presentation of what is going on in the German higher life of to-day—the ferments, the tendencies, the achievements—will appeal very strongly to American readers.

Through the entire book there rune the intense conviction that idealism is the dominating influence in the social and intellectual life of modern Germany. And along with this, running through all the essays, an equally strong belief is evident that there is between this country and Germany an affinity of national character, a mutual need and response of social temperament that ought to bring and in time will surely bring the two nations into close sympathy and understanding.

Notwithstanding the material prosperity which he has found evident in all parts of his native land and the era of national self-assertion upon which the country has entered, Prof. Francke believes that in both national and popular life there has been also a reawakening of spiritual striving that is bringing about another era of idealism. He finds social justice to be the ideal which is influencing the political life of Germany, social efficiency the ideal of educational reform, and universal sympathy with life the guiding principle of literature and art.

In the paper on "Emerson and German Personality" the author develops with especial care his belief in the native sympathy between German and American character. For, as he analyzes German character, both national and individual, he parallels its manifestations with Emerson's philosophy, and finds between Emerson and the German character a temperamental affinity. "In addition to this," he adds, "he derived his highest and best thought to a large extent from the bountiful store of German idealism of a hundred years ago, and he enriched this thought and gave it still wider significance by applying it to the needs of a free and youthful Nation." And he goes on to declare that "now the time has come for him to restore to Germany the idealism of her own thinkers in a purified, saner, and more human form."

In art, and especially in sculpture, Prof. Francke sees in Germany the beginning of a new era in which the effort will be to express the inner life of man, to give spiritual significance to whatever is done. He declares that the German people in general are now keenly and seriously

The Cruise of the "Shining Light"

By Norman Duncan

"When I add that no modern novel has so gripped me for years, you will appreciate this book's triumph. If readers of fiction have not lost a taste for 'style' in writing, poetry in description, and life-like characterization, The Cruise of the 'Shining Light' should take rank at once as the finest novel of recent years.—Henry C. Shellcy, Literary Editor, Boston Herald.

Through the Eye of the Needle

By W. D. Howells

Done in this great master's most delightful style, this novel tells the whimsical story of how a certain kind of what might be called socialism really works. A traveller from Altruria falls in love with, and marries, a charming American woman, takes her to Altruria, where she has an interesting time learning how to live in a country which has no money, and where one can get things only by working three hours a day—a country where cooks and lords, farmers and poets are all alike.

The Long Trail

By Hamlin Garland

A tale of adventure, which, like Treasure Island, will please older readers even more than young folks. It is rich in outdoor adventures, perils and bravery—a thoroughly enjoyable book, describing a lad's overland trip to the Klondike gold fields.

The Mystics

By Katherine Cecil Thurston

Like Mrs. Thurston's former novel, The Masquerader, this new story mingles romance and mystery in the same ingenious fashion, and with the same persistent excitement and suspense. It discloses a strange and almost mediæval situation in the heart of London to-day.

Nature's Craftsmen

By Dr. Henry C. McCook

A marvelous account of the picturesque and unusual sides of insect life. It points out unsuspected wonders at our very doors.

THE May magazines are rich in articles on "timely" subjects. Both The Century and Scribner's have papers on railroading—an uppermost topic just now. George M. Stratton's "Railway Disasters at Night," in the first-named magazine, is noteworthy. B. B. Adams writes for Scribner's on "The Railway High-Speed Mania." Sidney Lee's "Call of the West" is begun in this number, and there is an interesting installment of Mrs. Wharton's serial. Frances Hodgson Burnett's "The Shuttle" approaches its conclusion in The Century, and Miss Robins's "Come and Find Me" develops entertainingly.

The Atlantic has an article on "Railroad Accidents," by Frank H. Dixon. Prof. Lounsbury's "Confessions of a Spelling Reformer" also appears in this number. "The Fight of the Copper Kings" is a "timely" article in McClure's. In Putnam's Olivia Howard Dunbar writes of the new Colony Club and M. H. Spielmann has an article on the newly discovered portrait of Shakespeare. In The American Magazine Ray Stannard Baker's "Following the Color Line" is significant, while Arthur Train's review of the Patrick case is masterly. Joseph L. Stickney's "First Squadron Cruise of the Naval Militia" and John S. Barnes's "With Lincoln from Washington to Richmond in 1865" are among the notable articles in Appleton's.

Charles H. Caffin contributes to Harper's an expert article on the mural decorations of John W. Alexander, Capt. Mahan writes on "Our Navy Before the War of Secession," and Dr. Frederick A. Cook describes "The Conquest of Mount McKinley." A fairly complete list of the contents of the principal American monthlies is given herewith:

QUERIES.

To secure attention in this department every communication must be signed with the full name and address of the inquirer, which will not be published unless the inquirer so desires. Trivial questions will not be heeded. Queries will be answered in the order of their receipt, and as the number received weekly is very large, and the pressure upon our columns is always very great, inquirers must be prepared to await their turn.

R. R. G.—Will you kindly give a short sketch of George Sand, and a list of her best books? Can you also tell me anything about Dickens's wife? I can find very few references to her in biographies of Dickens, and would like to know whether they were at all congenial or whether his married life was unhappy.

Armantine Lucile Aurore Dupin, born Paris, July 5, 1804, died Nohant, Indre, June 8, 1876, married in 1822 Baron Dudevant, a retired army officer, by whom she had two children. Her marriage was not happy, so she formed a liaison with Jules Sandeau, a writer, and lived with him in Paris. Together they wrote, in 1831, a novel, "Rose et Blanche." On St. George's Day Sandeau urged her to write on her own account, which she did, using the pen name of George Sand. She mingled in politics, wrote plays, and published a newspaper, La Cause du Peuple. Her best works are "Indiana," "Valentine," "Lélia," "La Société Intime," "Jacques," "Manprot," "Consuelo," "François le Champi," "La Mare au Diable," "La Petite Fadette," "Les Maîtres Sonneurs," "Mont-Revêche," "Elle et Lui," "L'Homme de Neige," "Jean de la Roche," "Mlle de la Quintinie," "Pierre qui Roule," and "Annon."

Charles Dickens on April 2, 1836, married Catherine Thomson, eldest daughter of George Hogarth, a Scotchman, who was Dickens's colleague on The Morning Chronicle, and a noted musical critic. Hogarth's wife was the daughter of George Thomson of Edinburgh, biographer of Beethoven. The Hogarths had fourteen children. One of them, Georgina, is mentioned in Dickens's will as "the best and truest friend man ever had." She lived in his home from 1842 until his death. She still dwells in the home of Dickens's son, Henry Fielding Dickens, K. C.

Mrs. Dickens accompanied her husband to America in 1842. They separated "by consent" in 1858, after she had borne him ten children, all of whom, except the eldest, remained with the father. Dickens allowed her £600 a year, and in his will directed that she should receive the annual income from £8,000 during her life. Dickens published a statement about the separation in Household Words June 12, 1858, and also wrote a letter, defending himself, to his lecture agent, Arthur Smith. It was published in The New York Tribune without Dickens's consent. Mrs. Dickens died Nov. 22, 1879, aged 65.

SUBSCRIBER.—Will you please inform me if the following book is of any value: "Sam; or, The History of Mystery," by C. W. Webber, Cincinnati, 1855, and where did the author reside?

The book has no especial value. Charles Wilkins Webber was born at Russellville, Ky., May 29, 1819, died in Nicaragua, Central America, April 11, 1856. He was one of the famous rangers in the fight for the Indepsndence of Texas. For several years he was associate editor of The Whig Review in this city. He took part in William Walker's Central American filibustering expedition, and was killed in the battle of Rivas. He wrote many stories, including "Old Hicks, the Guide," "Wild Girl of Nebraska," "Shot in the Eye," and "Adventures with Texas Rifle Rangers."

L. M. T.—Will you kindly tell me where I can obtain English translations (with some literary merit) of the great Greek dramatists, and if they can be had in an inexpensive form?

An Aldine edition of the Greek dramas is published by Appleton & Co. It is in the World's Great Books Series. This series is sold by subscription.

Agamemnon of Aeschylus, translated by Walter Headlam, is sold by the Macmillan Company for 30 cents. The same company sells the Prometheus of Aeschylus translated by Janet Case for 45 cents. They also publish at $1.50 "The Tragedies of Sophocles," translated into English prose by R. C. Jebb; "Theatre of the Greeks," by J. W. Donaldson, may be obtained from one of the second-hand dealers for a small sum.

F. A. L.—Please let me know if the following has any special value: Longfellow's "Evangeline," published by Ticknor, Reed & Fields, Boston, April, 1863.

The first edition of "Evangeline" is dated Boston, 1847, and is a 12mo, in boards and uncut. This has fetched at auction from $17 to $137. A large paper 8vo edition was published in Boston in 1848. This is worth about $7. There is a London 4to edition, published by Cassell, and undated, which fetches about $7. The 1850 edition does not appear to have brought as high as $5 in any auction sale from 1901 to 1907, although an 1847 edition fetched $5.75 at the Brandon sale in Philadelphia in 1903.

LUKE SUTDAM.—In reading a very interesting book on South Africa by J. C. de Vaal, published some time ago, I find that in speaking of the battle of Isandlana "That some one had blundered was too evident, and a scapegoat must be found. A five officer was at first selected, but was found to be a little too much alive, so a dead one was chosen, Col. Durnford. But now that the battlefield has given up its secrets and the dead has told their own tale, the blame rests where it belongs, with the Commander in Chief." Who was the Commander in Chief?

The Commander in Chief of the British forces, in the battle of Isandlana or Isandhlwana, Jan. 22, 1879, where the British were disastrously defeated by King Cetywayo of the Zulus, was Frederic Augustus Thesiger, Lord Chelmsford. Lieut. Col. Durnford's column, consisting of 1,774 British and 650 natives, attacked the camp of the Zulus at this place. The result was the annihilation of half of their number. A convoy of supplies—102 wagons, 1,000 oxen, 2 guns, 400 shot and shell, 1,000 rifles, 250,000 rounds of ammunition, and 60,000 pounds of stores—fell into the hands of the Zulus. Thirty officers were killed, including Col. Durnford, Col. Pulleine, and Major White.

R. N. CONRAD.—Some forty years ago J. F. Smith was a popular English novelist. He wrote novels of a melodramatic type, full of incident and movement. He was a somewhat better writer than his American contemporaries of the same general class—Emerson, Bennett, and Sylvanus Cobb, Jr. He seems to have dropped out of remembrance. I have not seen any of his works or heard anything of him as an author in many years. Will you please give a brief account of him and his work?

J. Frederick Smith was an English novelist and a prolific contributor to The London Journal. He wrote a great many melodramatic novels which were published in paper-covered volumes. Among them were "Minnie Grey," "Gus. Howard," "Woman and Her Master," "The Freemason's Daughter," "Stanfield Hall," "The Will and the Way," "Alice Arran," "Dick Tarleton," "The Banker's Secret," "Redmond O'Neil," &c. Many of these novels were published by Dick & Fitzgerald, 18 Ann Street, New York. Smith died in 1890.

M. I. MITCHELL.—Will you kindly inform me where and at what price I may procure a story entitled "A Leaf in the Storm," by "Ouida." Louise de la Ramé? I have been told that it is a short story, and is included with other stories in a volume given over to classics.

"Leaf in the Storm" was published in paper by the J. B. Lippincott Company, East Washington Square, Philadelphia, at 50 cents.

HENRY T. GILBERT.—On Page 8 of THE NEW YORK TIMES for March 2, 1907, is to be found the poem "Library Musings," by Thomas R. Ybarra. Can any one tell me who Mr. Ybarra is, whether he has published anything, and, if so, what?

Mr. Ybarra is a young writer on the staff of THE NEW YORK TIMES. He has not as yet published anything in book form.

Answers from Readers.

F. H. M.—The song "Jeannette and Jeannot," for which "O. H." asked, was written by Charles Jeffries, (1807-65,) and was set to music by Charles W. Glover, (1807-63.) There are but two stanzas, and they are as follows:

There is no one left to love me now, and you, too, may forget.
But my heart will be with you wherever you may go;
Can you look me in the face and say the same, Jeannot?
When you wear the jacket red and the beautiful cockade,
Oh, I fear you will forget all the promises you have made.
With your gun upon your shoulder and your bayonet by your side,
You'll be taking some proud lady and be making her your bride
Or, when glory leads the way, you'll be madly rushing on,
Never thinking if they kill you that my happiness is gone.
If you win the day, perhaps a General you will be;
Then I'm proud to think of that, what will become of me?
Oh! if I were Queen of France, or, still better, Pope of Rome,
I would have no fighting men abroad and no weeping maids at home;
All the world should be at peace; or if kings must show their might,
Why, let them who make the quarrels be the only ones to fight.

A reply to the song was also written by Charles Jeffries, and is as follows:

Cheer up, cheer up, my own Jeannette, though far away I go,
In all the change I may see, I'll be the same Jeannot;
And if I win both fame and gold, ah! be not so unkind
As think I could forget you in the home I leave behind.
There's not a lady in the land, even though she were a queen,
Could win my heart from you, Jeannette, as true as you have been;
There must be gallant warriors, chance hath cast the lot on me
But, mind you this, the soldier, love, shall ne deserter be.
Why, ever since the world began the surest road to fame
Has been the battlefield, where men might win themselves a name,
And well I know the brightest eyes have ever brightest shone
When looking on some warrior bold return'd from battle won!
And would you put an end to deeds which ladies love so well,
The soldier's is a noble trade, Jeannette, then rail no more,
Were only Kings allowed to fight, there'd be an end of war.

We are under obligations to a number of our readers who have sent us copies of the song, which was popular fifty years ago. It can be found entire, with music, together with the story of its origin, in "Our Familiar Songs and Those Who Made Them," published by Henry Holt & Co.

MARIA DENNIS.—In reply to the request of W. L. I send a copy of the verses asked for, which are as follows:

"How pleasant is Saturday night,
When I've tried all the week to be good;
Not spoken a word that is bad,
And obliged every one that I could.

"To-morrow the Sabbath day comes,
Which our merciful Father has given
That we may have rest from our work,

The author was Nancy Dennis, one of the Newport Dennis family, a descendant of Robert Dennis, who married Sarah, daughter of Henry Howland of Plymouth Colony. Nancy Dennis was born in 1766 in Newport, R. I. Her family moved to Taunton, Mass., during the Revolutionary War. She married the Hon. James Sprout, Clerk of Courts of Bristol County. Had a large family of children and a delightful home. Her house is still standing near St. Thomas's Church in Taunton. She died in 1826. Her poems, "The Blackberry Girl," "How Pleasant is Saturday Night," and others were written for her children. "The Blackberry Girl" was a great favorite, and was printed on handkerchiefs and aprons. She published two books, "Short Songs for Little Children" and "Stories for Children."

We are indebted to a large number of our readers for answers to the query propounded by W. L. and for copies of the verses. Julie H. Beers writes that "the artists in the old Bodworth Studio Building in this city used to sing the verses every Saturday night away back in the early seventies."

W. DELVALLE.—I inclose verses of "The Slave Ship," asked for by "B. W. P." I have written them from memory and they may not be altogether correct. I remember in the good old days when we were young I used frequently to visit a "free and easy," a place after the manner described in Pickwick, where Lawyer Perking's head clerk was the distinguished Chairman. Songs, recitations, long pipes and tobacco, "church wardens," and liquid refreshments were the ingredients of enjoyment. Some of the songs were special favorites and well sung, such as "Sally in Our Alley," "Wapping Old Stairs," "Tom Bowling," "The Slave Ship," &c., and they linger in my memory yet.

Major Rudolph Fitzpatrick writes: "The Slave Ship" was composed by the late Henry Russell and sung by him, about fifty years ago, in his entertainment, "The Emigrant's Progress from the Old World to the New." It was printed in London, and doubtless could be obtained from Boosey & Co., 295 Regent Street, or Duncan, Davison & Co., 244 Regent Street, London.

W. E. GORDON.—In reply to Bessie G. Reid concerning the quotation, "For time at last sets all things even," &c., she will find it in Lord Byron's "Mazeppa," Paragraph 10, as the closing lines.

We are indebted to a number of our readers for information about these lines.

V. L.—A. B. will find these lines in "The Lost Galleon" by Bret Harte.

Never a tear bedims the eye
That time and patience will not dry;
Never a lip is curved with pain
That can't be kissed into smiles again.

The other lines given are not in the poem.

W. H. S.—The poem for which "Donald MacIntosh" asked is called "Speak the Good Word," and the author is William J. Lampton.

If Donald MacIntosh will send his address to this office a copy of the poem requested will be mailed him.

Appeals to Readers.

E. K. H.—I would like the words of some verses published in The Atlantic Monthly about 1878 or 1879, entitled "Ghost Land," after Jules Verne's "A Long Way." The verses were in the back part of the magazine in what would be "The Drawer" in Harper's.

G. W. S.—Can any one help me to name of author and where these lines occur?

"Good fortune this; long hours of labor blest

H. B. A.—Can any of your readers tell me where I can obtain the words and music of the old song beginning:

I came from the mountains of the old Granite State,
Where the hills are so lofty, magnificent, and great?

It was very popular fifty years ago.

H. B. PHILBRICK.—Can you or any of your readers inform me where I can find a copy of a poem published about 1860, called "The Fairy Legend of Bottle Hill," describing in rhyme the adventures of a poor Irish farmer who could not pay his rent and started to sell his cow, but on the way to market met a fairy who bought her, and for pay gave him a bottle. What the bottle would do is a sample of the rhyme? In and out of the bottle, then in livery dresses came two little men, marvelous little and marvelous quick, they bowed to Kate and they bowed to Mick, &c. I have the story in prose, but am anxious to obtain it in verse.

C. F. REED.—Can you place me on the track of a short verse on "Woman," of which the closing lines are:

"So first from her man learned he was a man,
And first from her he learned he was a god"?

What do you know about your country?

The GREATER AMERICA

By RALPH D. PAINE

Author of "The Praying Skipper," "The Story of Martin Coe," Etc.

WHAT do you know about your country? Its great merchant marine, its ships, and sailors of the Great Lakes, its copper mines (the richest in the world)?

¶ What do you know about your country? Its scores of towns that are literally springing from the bare prairie over night, its new breed of farmer whom Uncle Sam has taken into partnership, its lumbermen of the Pacific slope, its gold dredgers of the Sacramento Valley and its "gold stampedes" of the Nevada desert?

¶ If you want to know the spirit of The Greater America, obtain a wholesome antidote to the lament of the Muck-Raker, and get away from the view point of the "Little Easterner," read Ralph D. Paine's latest book, The Greater America, and you will believe in Your Country and its Destiny.

WOOD-CARVING.

PRACTICAL WOOD-CARVING. A Book for the Student, Carver, Teacher, Designer, and Architect. By Eleanor Rowe. Pp. 214. Fully illustrated from photographs and drawings. New York: The John Lane Company. $1 net.

ENCOURAGED by the reception of two small handbooks on wood-carving, Eleanor Rowe, the author, has been moved to carry her subject to a still further and more practical, more artistic development. In doing so, however, she has not lost sight of the fact that her readers may not be acquainted with her previous works. She, therefore, begins with a discussion of the wood-carver's outfit—the bench, tools, grindstone, &c., with instructions for "fixing" and sharpening the tools. The various woods that may be used for carving are then described. And so, by degrees, Miss Rowe leads her student on to the construction of beautiful objects, from the making of simple pieces of furniture to the carving of pillars, vases, &c., lettering, pierced carving, &c. The various English styles of carving are also dealt with—the Gothic, Renaissance, Jacobean, and other periods.

The examples presented are fully analyzed in simple words. And, to further help the student or teacher, diagrams and other illustrations, with the measurements, have been included. Careful attention is also given to the correct tools to be used for certain work and certain details in a piece in hand. The author makes a plea for the study of old work, but a knowledge of Nature, she says, is also helpful. Drawings should first be made of flowers, birds, &c., before making the design on wood. And when a design has been made the designer should rely very much on his memory in transcribing it. Pictorial wood-carving should be avoided, for the absence of color and atmosphere, Miss Rowe aptly points out, distorts the original. Furthermore, the student should bear in mind "that if a thing is worth doing at all, it is worth doing well." The book has been supplied with a glossary of technical terms and a bibliography of works on architecture, design, &c.

Higher Prices.

Henry Holt & Co. announces that "Alice for Short," by William De Morgan, author of "Joseph Vance," will be ready about May 25. The list price will be $1.75 instead of the usual $1.50. The new novel, like "Joseph Vance," contains some 230,000 words, and this fact at the present high prices for labor and materials, justifies the increased price. Another strong reason for the departure is the hope that it may be a step toward a closer relation between value and price in fiction. The publishers have had large advance orders for "Alice for Short." The fourth edition of "Joseph Vance" is in press, and this will be sold at the same price.

Indian Captivities.

The H. R. Huntting Company announces a series of reprints of some valuable old narratives of Indian captivities in New England, original printed copies of which have become scarce. The books are to be carefully edited, furnished with introductions and notes, and handsomely manufactured. The editions are to be limited to fifty copies at $5 and three hundred at $3. The first book of the series is "The Narrative of the Captivity of Mrs. Johnson." This readable record, which contains many notes on the manners and customs of the Indians, was first published at Walpole, N. H., in 1797. The new reprint is taken from the third edition, published at Windsor, Vt., in 1814.

Books In Demand.

The circulation department of the New York Public Library gives us the following list of books most in demand for the week ended April 23: Adult Fiction—Nicholson's "Port of Missing Men," Chambers's "Fighting Chance," Mason's "Running Water." Juvenile Fiction—Lang's Fairy Books, Aldrich's "Story of a Bad Boy," Burnett's "Sara Crewe." Non-Fiction—Ibsen's Plays, Benson's "Upton Letters," Eddy's "Science and Health."

Lothrop Books.

Two new manuscripts have been obtained by Messrs. Lothrop, Lee & Shepard. Sam Walter Foss has promised them a fifth volume of poems, to be called, "Songs of the Average Man;" George Cary Eggleston has delivered his manuscript of a story of historical interest entitled "Long Knives," based on the famous George Rogers Clark expedition, from the hero of which Mr. Eggleston is indirectly descended.

Lippincott Books.

The J. B. Lippincott Company publishes this week "Four Seasons in the Garden," a book for the amateur gardener, by Eben E. Rexford. It is illustrated in color and tints, and promises to be one of the most popular "out-of-door" books.

The Lippincott Company also issues a "Primer of Skat," by A. Elizabeth Wager-Smith.

FORTHCOMING BOOKS

A New French Dictionary—Books of the Week from Different Publishers.

THE Baker & Taylor Company announces for immediate publication "A New Dictionary of the French and English Languages," by J. McLaughlin. This is a fat duodecimo, with an enormous number of definitions and of a quality that its publishers hope will win for it a clear field among dictionaries of its size. The same house announces for early publication an artistic book, quarto size, of "The Story of Joseph," taken literally from the Old Testament. This has pictures in color by George Alfred Williams, and an introduction by the accomplished writer, Dr. Fletcher Harper Swift.

Messrs. A. S. Barnes & Co. will publish shortly an English story for very young readers, entitled, "The Adventures of an Exmoor Pony."

In connection with their publication just now of "Worry," by Dr. C. W. Saleeby, the Frederick A. Stokes Company announces that later in the year they will present an important book on cancer by this author.

The John Lane Company announce that they have gone to press with the second edition of Dolf Wyllarde's novel of society life called "As Ye Have Sown," the first edition having been exhausted on the day of publication. Oscar Browning, author of "The Boyhood and Youth of Napoleon," recently issued, is about to publish through this house "The Fall of Napoleon." The author will take occasion to differ with former biographers of Napoleon as to his character and conduct during the last years of his power. The book will be illustrated with a dozen reproductions of paintings and engravings depicting the last scenes of Napoleon.

The Macmillan Company is publishing this week: "A Victor of Salamis," by William Stearns Davis, author of "A Friend of Caesar" and "God Wills It"; "Her Own Way," a play, by Clyde Fitch; "Engines of Social Progress," by W. L. George; "The Wisdom of Sir Walter," compiled by Owen Redfern, with an introduction by the Rev. John Watson, D.D. (Ian Maclaren); and "Jesus in Modern Criticism," by Dr. Paul W. Schmiedel, translated by Maurice A. Canney.

"Langford of the Three Bars" and "The Iron Way," the former a story of streuuous ranch life in Dakota and the latter a romance of the building of the Central Pacific Railway, are among the most successful books of A. C. McClurg & Co. this Spring. The first edition of "Langford" was 15,000 copies. Of "The Iron Way," a fourth edition has just been put to press.

The publication of Myra Kelly's first novel recalls her experience with her first short story—an experience in amusing contrast to that often heard concerning successful stories which went begging for a while. For the stars have been with Miss Kelly. She submitted copies of her first short story simultaneously to four different editors, and, to her surprise, it was accepted by them all.

The publication of "Clementina's Highwayman," Robert Neilson Stephen's posthumous novel, has been intrusted to L. C. Page & Co. Mrs. Stephens, after a residence abroad of six years, has returned to America to live here and to attend to the dramatic productions of Mr. Stephen's plays.

Messrs. L. C. Page & Co. issued this week a new edition of the Rubaiyat containing five versions. The volume is furnished with twelve illustrations in color by Blanche McManus.

A practical work on labor problems entitled "The Industrial Conflict," by Samuel A. Smith of the Department of Sociology in the University of Minnesota, is announced by Messrs. Fleming H. Revell & Co. for May 15. The basis of Dr. Smith's book is letters that he has obtained from laborers and employers, representing, therefore, both sides of questions. These letters are for the most part unsigned, and the more valuable because they are the freer in expression. Dr. Smith's deductions from these statements form the original part of the work.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons have now issued Volume II. of George Haven Putnam's "Censorship of the Church," as previously announced.

Edith Harwood, through E. P. Dutton & Co., follows her former volume, "Notable Pictures in Florence," by an excellent handbook, with discursive text, on "Notable Pictures in Rome." The book is furnished with many text illustrations in half tone. It is to be issued next week—12mo., pp. 306; price, $1.50.

A book from Messrs. Charles Scribner's Sons this week is "Experimental and Theoretical Applications of Thermodynamics to Chemistry," by Dr. Walther Nernst of the University of Berlin. This book is from the author's contribution last Fall to the Silliman Memorial Lectures at Yale University. Dr. Nernst's chief theme is the development of a new theorem concerning the relation between chemical energy and heat.

American Gymnasia, the magazine published in Boston in the interest of physical training, issues this week a book entitled "May-Pole Possibilities," by Mrs. J. E. C. Lincoln. This book is designed by Mrs. Lincoln for the use of teachers, and is part of her propaganda toward the adoption of the old English May-Pole dances as a picturesque and excellent training for college women in grace, poise, precision, and harmony of movement sought in dancing generally, and the more healthfully and pleasurably practiced upon green lawns. The practice has, in fact, already been adopted in the University of Illinois, modified so as to meet conditions of American dancing and costume.

The John C. Winston Company is to publish shortly a drama in five acts, a tragedy of American life, entitled "The Double Love," by Arthur D. Rees. This will be followed by another drama, "Columbus," by the same author. Mr. Rees is one of the younger lecturers for the University Extension Society of Philadelphia, the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences, and the New York Board of Education. Throughout the past Winter he has been lecturing on "Russia, Past and Present."

"Baby Dear," a diary to be used by parents, will be issued by the Saalfield Publishing Company, Akron, Ohio, May 15. The book has been arranged by Adah Louise Sutton, who has placed appropriate selections from the poets on alternate pages, leaving blanks on the opposite pages to be filled in with the superior and original matter to be inspired from day to day by the baby chronicled. Illustrations and decorations are done by Miss Katharine Hayward Greenland. The book is for the baby's first year. It is to be a 4to, bound in boards, price, $1.25.

A book for juvenile readers, published this week by Messrs. E. P. Dutton & Co., is Dr. Gordon Stable's "War on the World's Roof," the "World's Roof" being, of course, Tibet.

The Dreamer's Press of New York will shortly put forth a "book of poetic thought," entitled "Mystery and Truth," by Louis M. Elshemus. The publisher's announcement says: "The contents exhibit a literary curiosity, inasmuch as the author, during his twenty-third year, while in Paris, willed himself to write fifty sonnets during twelve hours' time, distributing the hours during three days—four hours each day. He divided the subject-matter into seven groups, viz.; 'To Childhood,' 'To Youth,' 'To the Wrongs of Love,' 'To the Stars,' 'To the Mystics,' 'To Truth, and 'To Fancy.' The book will bear a cover-design by the author, and contains a fac simile of the author's handwriting.

The Burrows Brothers Company has advanced the price on their remaining sets of "The Jesuit Relations" to $5 per volume. The same company is preparing an inexpensive edition of the Lincoln-Douglas Debates.

Mrs. H. M. Lothrop (Margaret Sidney) has placed in the hands of her publishers, Lothrop, Lee & Shepard Co., the manuscript for an eleventh volume of the "Famous Pepper Books," to be entitled "Five Little Peppers in the Little Brown House."

The publication by Messrs. Lothrop, Lee & Shepard of "Heart Melodies," by Mary Aletta Ayer, and "Fifty Flower Friends," by Edith Dunham, announced for this week, has been unavoidably delayed, but the volumes may be expected by the middle of next week.

Baroness Von Hutten's recent novel, "Our Lady of the Beeches," which has gone through nine editions in America, has just been published in Great Britain by William Heineman of London. Another American book just issued on the other side is "The Psychology of Beauty," by Miss Ethel D. Puffer, which has been added to the list of Archibald Constable & Co. These books are published in America by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

Margaret Potter, who is but 26 years old, has written "The Princess," her eighth novel. Mr. W. D. Howells, who is 70 years old, has written over sixty books. The work per year for their working years figures the same.

Current Literature Moves.

Current Literature, under the editorship of E. J. Wheeler, has outgrown its offices at 34 West Twenty-sixth Street, this city, and is moving to-day to the new Mitchell Building, 41 and 43 West Twenty-fifth Street, where its editorial rooms will occupy the tenth floor.

Du Chaillu.

Messrs. Harper announce new editions of Du Chaillu's "Lost in the Jungle," "Stories of the Gorilla Country," and "My Apingi Kingdom."

Consolidated Exchange.

S. A. Nelson, author of "The A B C of Wall Street," "The A B C of Stock Speculation," &c., has written and published "The History of the Consolidated Stock Exchange of New York." ($1.) It is appropriate in that the publication comes at the time when the Consolidated Exchange is about to change its home from Broadway and Exchange Place to the new building on Broad Street. The book is illustrated, bound in green flexible leather, and printed on Japanese deckle-edge paper. It may be obtained from Mr. S. A. Nelson, care of the A. B. Benesch Company, 116 Nassau Street, or from T. J. McBride, 71 Broadway.

Fiona Macleod.

New editions of Fiona Macleod's early books, "Pharais: A Romance of the Isles," and "The Sin Eater, and Other Tales and Legends," will be issued shortly by Duffield & Co. Since the death of William Sharp revealed the identity of this mysterious author with the Celtic name there has been a great reawakening of interest in the writings signed Fiona Macleod.

Motor Mart of New York
62d Street and Broadway

TO THE AUTOMOBILE FRATERNITY, UNITED STATES AND EUROPE.

Dear Sirs:---

On behalf of the Motor Mart of New York---a corporation—I offer you the most commodious, most complete automobile salesrooms in America.

The property, a cut of which is shown above, was designed and built for automobile purposes, especial attention being given to the important item of light. The facade of glass, with steel and concrete construction throughout the building, and floors capable of sustaining a weight of 450 pounds to the square foot, enable the corporation to present an absolutely fireproof structure where every department of the trade can be carried on.

It is not intended that a public garage will be maintained---but space in the basements (of which there are two) will be allotted each tenant whose business demands it.

The corporation intends to make the building the best of its kind in the city and so attractive that prospective buyers will be drawn to it because of its importance and its perfect location, being, as it is, in the acknowledged centre of the automobile trade.

My present mission is to bring to your notice the announcement of a project in which the automobile interests everywhere are interested; and to call to your attention this fact---that the Motor Mart of New York is the only building in the Metropolis equipped with electric light, gas, freight and passenger elevators and everything which combines to make up an ideal building for offices, salesrooms and shop.

Leases have been made with some leading manufacturers and agencies in the trade. Applications for space will be attended to in the order of their receipt.

POWER, irresistible power, is the keynote of its design and construction. The best that France can devise and produce is concentrated in this car. The C. G. V. 50 H. P. or 75 H. P. Touring Car will carry seven people, not merely comfortably, but luxuriously, attaining easily a speed of 70 miles an hour, utterly unaffected by road obstacles serious to most cars. That is why C. THE

At $2,300, with Imported Magneto

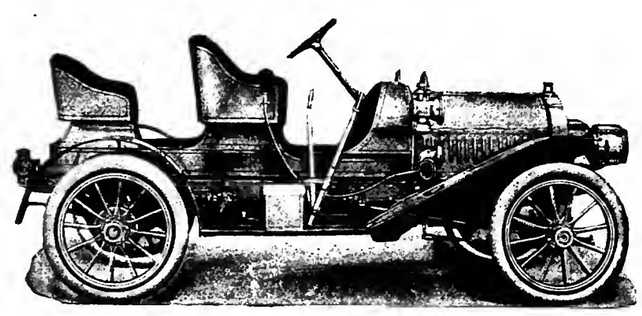
Demands Consideration

Compared with the average cars of its speed and type, the economical features of the Mora Racytype demand consideration before the purchase of any speed car.

It is the only car of its speed with so low a motor rating and so light a body. It is the only car that will give to the purchaser the speed, the endurance, the life and service at so low a cost of maintenance and upkeep.

The Mora Racytype 24 horse power is delivered through the gears to the axle with less waste and friction than is obtainable in any other American car. This is due to the simplicity of its mechanism, its long bearings, and the celebrated Mora Pan support.

The Mora Racytype does not carry a single pound of unnecessary load, nor a single atom of power save that necessary to drive the car at as high a speed as the average car whose rating is much higher than the Mora.



MORA RACYTYPE, $2,300, WITH MAGNETO.

The Mora Pan Support is a metal pan that extends from crank to gear case, to which is bolted the entire driving mechanism. Motor and gear set are bolted to this support, which is then bolted to the frame as a single unit. There is no working loose of any part of the Mora construction, there is no vibration to rack and deteriorate the car, but a steady, even torque that makes every fractional horse power help drive the car.

Why the ELMORE beats any car in the world up hill

IF we can show you a car that beats all other cars in hill climbing we show you a car that will take you further in a day than any other car of its power, provided both travel at a SAFE speed, say average express train speed of 40 or 50 miles an hour. That is our contention: that the Elmore will give you more TRAVELING value than any other American car, even those costing $4,000 and upwards—double the honest Elmore price. Now, then:

IN going up hill you MUST, to get the full advantage of power, and to get your full quota of speed, progress by a series of short, sturdy steps. You CANNOT climb a hill by long, swinging steps. The man on stilts gets along very well on a down grade and not much worse on the level, but he is NO GOOD at HILL climbing. The Elmore takes the short, sturdy steps. Its two-cycle engine gives a forward impulse: a swift, short advance with EVERY stroke of the piston. The other cars, the four-cycle engine cars, get a forward impulse with only EVERY OTHER stroke of the piston. The force of gravity checks their advance up hill between these forward impulses, and the next stroke of the piston must overcome the backward pull and start them forward again.

THAT is WHY the Elmore is without a peer, at ANY price, for touring; why it fulfills PERFECTLY all the requirements of a car; going as fast as you can go with safety at ANY TIME, on ANY ROADS, on ANY GRADE.

35 H. P. 4-Cylinder Elmore. Price $2,500.

There is only one way to appreciate the advantages of the Elmore simplicity. Come in and try it. We will show you all the speed you can use; more power than you can use; a freedom from motoring troubles of all sorts and a car that has NO up-keep expense attached to it. The Elmore at $1,750 or $2,500 is a far better car in every way than many cars selling at from $4,000 to $5,000. Come in and we will SHOW you that this is so.

THE MARTINI

COUPE-LANDAULET is an Exclusive Model

The Martini Coupe-Landaulet is without exception the most fashionable and exclusive motor car made. It combines the advantages of a touring car, Coupe and Landaulet. The Coupe may be entirely enclosed against cold and inclement weather. Two seats placed just forward of the coupe give the advantage of an open car; the driver's seat is wide enough to accommodate the footman or an additional passenger. The Coupe-Landaulet seats comfortably six people and chauffeur.

The chassis is the famous Martini 40-50 h. p., with low-tension magnets. It will climb any hill any car can climb. Before a Martini car leaves the factory it is given a 100-mile test over the mountains, then thoroughly overhauled for signs of strain or imperfections.

Every MARTINI CAR IS GUARANTEED FOR A YEAR. It is a safe guarantee, because the car has been tested more severely before delivery, over a harder route than ordinarily it will ever be called upon to travel in the hands of the owner.

The Martini Coupe-Landaulet body is built by Geisberger of Zurich—Europe's most famous builder—and is the handsomest car ever made.

The prospective purchaser ought to see this car. Demonstrations may be had at any time.

QUINCY SOON KNEW ROBBED CO.'S NAME

Guessed It, He Says, After First Hearing from Dennett of a Bond Theft.

SQUIRE, QUINCY'S FRIEND

Said to Have Told Dennett the ex-Mayor Was Just the Man to Handle His Case.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., April 27.—Further matters of intsrest came out to-day concerning the acquaintance of Josiah Quincy, former Mayor of this city, with the persons concerned in the great bond robbery in the Trust Company of America. They helped to explain certain parts of ths story obtained from him on Friday, which at timc he was unwilling to divulge, as Mr. Quincy then said, "in his own interests and those of justice." It developed to-day:

First—That Mr. Quincy has been for years an acquaintance of Frank O. Squire of this city, who was in business relations with Oliver M. Dennett, the broker under arrest with Douglas, the bond clerk of the trust company, as late as ten days or two weeks ago. The authorities for this statement arc Mr. Quincy himself and a well-known Boston financial man, who has had reason to follow Dennett's career because of associations in the Beacon Trust Company here.

Second—That Dennett told Mr. Quincy when the two first met in tho conferences about the Trust Company of America case, that Frank O. Squire had recommended him as "just the man to handle the case."

Third—That Mr. Quincy learned enough from Dennett at their first two interviews on the Wednesday preceding the crisis to be able to satisfy himself before he saw Dennett again on Saturday that the Trust Company of America was the institution involved, and not later thun Saturday morning Mr. Quincy knew that William F. Sheehan would be interested in the matter when exposed, on behalf of the trust company.

Fourth—Tbat Mr. Quincy was the only lawyer consulted in the matter by Dennett and Douglas, so far as his knowledge is concerned, up to Sunday morning, when Mr. Quincy called in Robertson Honey, his brother-in-law. This was long subsequent to the arrest of Douglas, of which Mr. Quincy had been informed by Dennett; whether or not it was subsequent to Mr. Quincy's interview with a representative of the trust company on Sunday morning, he did not say.

These additional facts throw mucb light upon the story obtained from the Boston lawyer politician on Friday, and particularly upon his declaration in the early conversations, that Dennett and Dennett's story of the hypothetical hond robbery by his bypothetical friend interested bim deeply. The interest was sufficient to prompt Mr. Quincy to figure out from a compilation of Directors of several New York trust companies prepared in his office a week ago on Friday, which company it was that was likely to be involved in the matter, and his information from Dennett obtained from the two interviews on Friday was accurate enough to enable Mr. Quincy to hit upon the right company on his first and only guess.

The substance of this conversation with Dennett on Wednesday lay largely within bis list of prohibited topics, which he would not discuss with the newspaper men on Friday. He did say, however, that on Wednesday Dennett told him that the theft involved $1,000,000, and that a substantial block of the bonds were where they could be returned. Dennctt did not say, of course, nor did Mr. Quincy suggest, that a very large amount of bonds be taken for the purpose of negotiating for immunity after escape.

Mr. Quincy and F. O. Squire.

In the days of the old Broadway Bank, when Mr. Quincy and Frank O. Squire were co-Directors, Mr. Quincy was Mayor of Boston. He resigned as Director for personal reasons prior to the failure of the bank, which failure has been attached in the public mind to that of the Globe National Bank as a part of a famous financial episode in this city. Mr. Quincy's acquaintance with Squire continued.

Frank O. Squire was one of the sons of John P. Squire, of packing house fame, whose failure was an important factor in the Globe Bank affair. The acquaintance of Mr. Quincy and Frank O. Squire has continued down to recent times. It did not terminate abruptly like the acquaintance of Mr. Quincy and Dennett, which the ex-Mayor described in his interview of Friday.

Squire, it now develops, also got acquainted with Dennett in the days when Dennett, as Treasurer of the Beacon Trust Company here, was hailed as a rising young Boston financier, and this acquaintance did not terminate as did that of Mr. Dennett and Mr. Quincy, for, after the failure of the Squire concern and after Dennett had left his post in the Beacon Trust Company, the firm of Dennett, Blanchard & Crane, brief members of the New York Stock Exchange, endeavored to handle the securities of the new corporation of John P. Squire & Co. before the absorption of the Squire business by Swift & Co. of the Beef Trust. It was in connection with matters still pending from this negotiation that Frank O. Squire saw Dennett in New York ten days or two weeks ago, according to the assertion of the Boston financier already referred to.

When reporters went to see Mr. Quincy to-day his attention was called to the long lapse between his original acquaintance with Dennett, eight years ago, and its renewal on the Wednesday preceding the flight of Douglas. He had no further explanation to make.

He was asked if he knew Frank O. Squire. The reply was in the affirmative, and Mr. Quincy added that their acquaintance had been of the casual order. Mr. Quincy was then asked when he undertook the practice of law in any active way. He said that it was within the last three years. He was Mayor of Boston from 1895 to 1899, and for four or five years thereafter spent much of his time abroad.

HURT IN RUNAWAY CAR.

A thirty-foot Newark trolley car containing sixty passengers and with both platforms crowded, ran away on the steep hill leading from Washington to High Street on West Kinney Street yesterday afternoon. About a score of persons were injured, one of whom may die.

The car had turned the curve at Washington Street and ascended the hill until about 200 yards from the top, when the crowd on the rear platform, by pressing against the rops connscted with the trolley wheel, pulled it from the wire, thereby shutting off the power. William Rooney, the motorman, at once applied the brake, but it failed to check the car, which had already begun to slide backwards. Owing to the big load on the car it gained momentum at every foot.

When the passengers realized tbat ths car was running away they became panic-stricken. Women and children screamed, while men climbed over them in a frantic effort to reach the platform, from which those who had been standing there were jumping to the pavement, only to be thrown heavily and cut or bruised.

When the car reached Washington Street, where there is a safety switch installed for just such an amergency, it luckily took the switch, ran along about 100 feet of dead rails to the pavement, hit the curb, and stopped. The car could never have rounded the sharp curve at the speed it was going, and had it turned over there would certainly have been great loss of life.

The most seriously injured is Meyer Wolfson, 30 years old, of 485 Hunterdon Street, Newark. His skull is fractured. He is in St. Barnabas's Hospital in an unconscious condition and may die. The others received cuts and bruises.

DARLINGTON CLEARS PATH.

Farmers Who Refuse to Have Dairies Inspected Are Blocked.

Special to The New York Times.

MIDDLETOWN, N. Y., April 27.—The men sent out by Dr. Thomas Darlington, President of the Board of Health of New York City, to inspect the dairies of all farmers sending milk into New York City, do not find their path strewn with roses. Recently O. W. Mapes, head of the Dairymen's League, which hopes to soon control all the milk sent into the city, advised the farmers not to submit to having their farms inspected by Dr. Darlington's agents, and to resort to the use of the "toe of a cowhide boot," if necessary, to prevent it.

For a week Dr. Darlington's inspectors have been in Orange County working for the cause of better milk. They bave been coldly received by the farmers, but met with little opposition. One of these inspectors, K. L. Dewolf, struck a snag on Friday in the town of Goshen which for a time threatened to result seriously. Farmer John Loring refused to allow Inspector Dewolf on his farm—not because he feared the consequences, as his farm is one of the best in the county, but because he did not believe the inspector had any right on his farm.

After a long and heated argument the inspector drove away without inspecting the farm. As soon as he could get to a telephone the inspector called up Dr. Darlington and explained the situation. Dr. Darlington learned that the obstreperous farmer sold his milk to the Borden Milk Company in this city and immediately telegraphed to the office of the company that if they took Loring's milk they would he shut of the New York market.

This startled the Borden's superintendent, Mr. Schoonmaker, who drove to Loring's. After a long conference the farmer admitted that he had been hasty and would receive the inspector. To-day Inspector Dewolf went to the farm again and made his inspection.

ALCYONE STUCK IN THE WAYS.

The Launching of Henry W. Putnam's Schooner-Yacht Postponed.

BOSTON, April 27.—The big three-masted steel auxiliary schooner Alcyone, built for Henry W. Putnam of New York, was to have been launched at Lawley's yard at 10:20 o'clock to-day, but after sliding down for four feet, while the daugbter of the owner had the baptismal bottle of champagne poised for the christening blow, the vessel stuck fast and would go no further. The workmen sought to find the cause of the trouble, and discovered that the grease had "set," and that it would be necessary to rewedge the schooner before she would move. After several hours coaxing the men gave up the task, and the launcbing was postponed until Monday.

Mr. Putnam, who had come over with a party, was on the launching stage, and was sorely disappointed. This ocean-going pleasure craft was designed by Tams, Lemoyne & Crane of New York. She is a magnificent vessel, and the largest of her type in the world.

The Alcyone is intended for deep-sea cruising, and her owner will make extended voyage in her. She will be commanded by Capt. Alexander Olsen, who was Captain of the auxiliary schooner Ariadne, also owned by Mr. Putnam. The Alcyone will fly the flag of the New York Yacht Club.

NEW AFTERNOON NEWSPAPER.

Herman Ridder Plans to Publish One at a Date Not Yet Set.

At a luncheon of the Principals' Club at Delmonico's, in Fifth Avenue, yesterday, Herman Ridder, editor of the Staats-Zeitung, announced his intention of publishing a paper in English on every evening and Sundays, which would be patterned after the Staats-Zeitung.

The announcement came as the sequel of a discussion of "yellow" newspapers. One of the speakers at the luncheon criticised some of the newspapers for their reports of the Thaw trial. When it came Mr. Ridder's turn to apeak he said:

"I do not stand here to protect the newspapers. If 'yellow' journals exist, it is all your fault. Those who do not publish 'yellow' newspapers do not have to defend them."

Then Mr. Ridder discussed the character of the Staats-Zeitung and made his announcement about the new journal. He explained to a TIMES reporter later that his newspaper in English waa merely one of his plans for the future. He had set no date for putting hia intehtion into effect.

MISS FLOWER'S CAR KILLS SIX-YEAR-OLD

CRIES FOR VENGEANCE

Miss Flower Declares It Was an Unavoidable Accident—The Chauffeur Locked Up.

While hurrying to the West Forty-second Street Ferry yesterday afternoon an automobile in which rode Miss Mary A. Flower of 611 Fifth Avenue, knocked down and ran over six-year-old Michael Mooney of 563 Eleventh Avenue at Forty-third Street and Eleventh Avenue. After the accident the automobile raced with the injured lad to Roosevelt Hospital, but the little chap died almost at the door of the Institution.

Miss Flower is a daughter of Nathan M. Flower, a Wall Street broker, and a niece of the late ex-Gov. Flower. The chauffeur, Paul Keller, 33 years old, of 123 West Forty-sixth Street, after making the run for the hospital, was locked up on a technical charge of homicide at the West Forty-seventh Street Station.

The Mooney lad had been playing in Eleventh Avenue with a number of companions. The other boys left bim and Michael continued to frolic alone. The automobile approached at a fast clip, according to Patrolman Mee, and the boy started to run across the street, getting in front of the machine, according to the chauffeur.

As he heard ths tooting of the horn the youngster turned and ran back toward the curb. Confused, he again whirled rapidly and ran in the path of the car.

Miss Flower screamed as she saw the boy's danger. The chauffeur swerved the machine toward the middle of the street, but not in time to avoid striking the lad. He was knocked down and the front wheel passed over his body.

Keller stopped the heavy machine almost in its own length, and both he and Miss Flower climbed out and hurried to the unconscious victim. Miss Flower lifted the boy's head in her lap and rubbed his forehead, trying to bring him to consciousness. Patrolman Mee, who was a short distance away, arrived just as the boy was being carried into a near-by drug store.

Miss Flower, who realized that the youngster had been seriously injured, suggested that the automobile be pressed into ambulance service, and Patrolman Mee gave his consent.

Just as the boy was being carried to the car his frantic mother, who had learned of the accident, arrived at the drug store. She literally tore her way through the crowd which had gathered, using her fists and finger nails on those who were in her way. She snatched the little fellow from the patrolman's arms and strained him to her breast.

With a white face and blazing eyes she turned upon the crowd.

"May God punish whoever did this," she cried.

Patrolman Mee pointed out to Mrs. Mooney the necessity of getting the boy to a hospital. Mrs. Mooney refused to surrender the lad to any one else, and with Keller at the wheel and with Patrolman Mee and the mother holding the boy, the race to the bospital began.

Patrolman Mee finally climbed over to the front seat and took his seat behind the chauffeur to prevent any other patrolman from stopping the speeding car. Just a block away from the hospital the unconscious lad's form grew limp. At the hospital the first glance showed Dr. Johnson that the lad was dead. Mrs. Mooney fainted at the news, but was revived and went home.

Miss Flower, who had gone back to her home in a cab, returned later seeking to furnish bail for Keller. She was accompanied by several members of the family, but was informed that she would have to see the Coroner about bail.

"It was an unavoidable accident," said Miss Flower, when questioned.

Later Miss Flower, accompanied by friends and Coroner Shrady, went to the West Forty-seventh Street station. The Coroner paroled the chauffeur in the custody of Miss Flower.

BRIDGE TO COST $18,000,000.

Outlay on Blackewil's Island Structure $6,000,000 Beyond First Estimates

Controller Metz's Bureau of Municipal Investigation and Statistics has furnished to the Controller a detailed report of the progress made in the construction of the Blackwell's Islang Bridge to date, which shows that the bridge will cost the city not less than $6,000,000 more than was originally estimated.

When the Board of Public Improvements decided on the construction of the bridge the estimate of the cost was set at $12,548,500, which sum included the purchase of the land necessary for the approaches. The Controller's men now report that the bridge will cost the city from $18,000,000 to $20,000,000, and they say that there is practically no chance of diminishing this estimate by changing the plans or specifications without materially impairing the value of the bridge.

In the original estimate the land required was valued at $3,148,500. The report to the Controller says: "From present indications, the land to be taken by the city for this bridge may cost $6,000,000, and perhaps $8,000,000." It is asscrted that the speculators have been very active and have bought up the land which the city will have to acquire.

The report includes a thorough history of the building of the bridge and a detailed description of the structure, which is to be double-decked, with trolley tracks on one level and the elevated tracks and foot path above.

STOP BINGHAMTON CARS.

Company Fears Violence from Strikers After Nightfall.

BINGHAMTON, N. Y., April 27.—To avoid trouble from strike sympathizers, which was feared after dark, General Manager Clark ordered all cars of the street railway company run into the barn at 6 o'clock to-night.

During the day the company succeeded in maintaining from a sixth to a quarter of its regular service. One car was stoned in Upper Chenango Street just before noon, the only strike disorder reported during the day.

Manager Clark this morning announced that the pay of all men who stand by the company will be raised to $2 a day, or 20 cents an hour, the price demanded by the strikers. The company refuses, however, to recognize the union in any way.

WALL ST. DYSPEPTIC—FISH.

He Says It Is Suffering from Acute Fiscal Stomach Trouble.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. LOUIS, April 27.—"Wall Street bit off more than it could chew," said Stuyvesant Fish to-day. Mr. Fish, who is now a member of the Executive Committee of the Missouri Pacific Railway and a close adviser of George J. Gould, is making an inspection trip over the Missouri Pacific & Iron Mountain system, and arrived in St. Louis this morning from Texarkana. His said:

"Some of the Wall Street financiers havo been suffering from acute fiscal stomach trouble lately, much to their discomfiture, if not surprise, and they must recover before they can renew their feasting. Tbeir dessert was served rather late. Some other operators bcame ill previously.

"Ths financial strain has made the postponemsnt of railroad improvements compulsory. Much work is being done, as much as possible, snd there will be no cessation of operations for betterment. Still, considerable important work is dslayed until moncy is easier. Conditions point to the advisability of practicing a little conservatism."

Mr. Fish in discussing his trip over the Missouri Pacific & Iron Mountain system said the system was preparing to begin general reconstruction.

Mr. Gould proposes to expend about $100,000,000 for improving the system. The intention is to invest about $10,000,000 a year for at least ten years.

Mr. Gould and several railroad officials departed to-night for Kansas City and Denver.

SEVEN MINERS ENTOMBED.

JOHNSTOWN, Penn., April 27.—Seven miners have been imprisoned in Mine 38 of the Berwind-Whits Coal Company, at Foustwell, near this city, since yesterday afternoon, by a flood of water caused by an inflow from an abandoned working.

It was supposed that the entire party had perished, but late this afternoon signals were exchanged between the entombed men and the rescuers by means of rapping on a water pipe.

To-night, however, the rapping from within has ceased, and it is feared that the men are dead from drowning or suffocation. It is believed that it will be several days before the water is pumped out, and hope for the men has almost been abandoned. Through some mistake, it is said, the accident was caused by a blast being fired in the thin wall which divided Mine 38 from an old working which was filled with water.

The accident happened some time yesterday, but it did not become known until after 2 o'clock this afternoon. No official advices were then received, and that an accident had occurred was only discovered when the families of the entombed men gathered about the shaft. All of the men are foreigners and have large families.

GET "GENTLEMAN BURGLAR."

CHICAGO, April 27.—Edward Tate, known as the "gentleman burglar," who escaped from St. Francis Hospital in Peoria, Ill., was arrested here to-day. A detective, who had been on his trail, made the arrest as the alleged safe-blower was about to enter the residence of a friend. Tate was under arrest recently in Peoria, for safe blowing, but owing to illness was confined at the hospital under police guard. By a ruse he escaped the guard, and until to-day has been at large.

A clue to Tate's whereabouts came to the police in peculiar shape. They learned that Tate was trying to obtain an interview with Theodore Smith, whom Tate is said to have beaten and robbed three years ago. What Tate wished with Smith is not now known, although it is supposed that he wished to arrange that Smith should not press his charges, and to make restitution of the money of which Smith was robbed. It was at Smith's house that the detectives were waiting when Tato appeared.

Tate tried to run, but fell to the walk from weakness.

THREATEN TRAVEL TO CONEY.

The cars on all the lines of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company's system were running as serenely and uninterruptedly as usual last night, although a strike of power house firemen had been "on" since Monday.

General Manager John F. Calderwood and the other officials of the road did not seem to be a bit disturbed over the situation. They said they did not regard the strike seriously, and had found no lack of men to take the places of the strikers.

The strikers have eatablished headquarters at Third Avenue and Fourth Street, from which they issued circulara yesterday, requesting firemen not to seek employment in the plants. Last night the strikers, who demand an increase of pay, were asserting that if their demands were not acceded to they would call out all the men employed in the power houses to-day, and that there would be a sympathetic strike of other employes of the road which would result in tying up the expected heavy Coney Island travel, as well as all other traffic on the road.

TO REPAIR LIBERTY.

Plans Approved, Too, for an Elevator Inside the Statue.

WASHINGTON, April 27.—Quartermaster General Humphrey has approved the plans for the repair and completion of the gigantic atatue of liberty on Bedlow's Island, New York Harbor, but the contract will not be placed until early in June, $62,800 being available for the work.

It is the purpose to make the statue conform to the original designs of Bartholdi, which will involve for the first time the lighting of the great bronze torch with eight powerful arc lights. An electric elevator and winding stairway also will be fitted inside the statue.

TELEPHONING THE DEAF.

An Electric Discovery Makes the Deaf Hear.

NEW YORK, April 27.—The end of imperfect hearing devices and ugly ear trumpets is in sight. It has been demonstrated that an electric device, called the Acousticon, enables the deaf to hear, and that its use improves and sometimes restores the natural hearing. It is small and is worn as part of the dress. It gathers the sound, magnifies it 400 per cent., and transmits it to the ear. A very small electric battery, carried in the pocket, supplies a sufficient current. On a large scale the invention is being installed in the leading churches and theatres, with great success. The Acoustic Co., of 1,267 Broadway, has the sole right to distribute the Acousticon. They will be glad to have any who are interested call and test it thoroughly, or write for full details.—Adv.

RICH WIDOW WEDS A FANCY SKATER

SURPRISE FOR PITTSBURG

Bratton, Whose Home Is in Flatbush, Has Been Employed aa a Skating Instructor.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURG, April 27.—Mrs. Ida Wainwright, 40 years old, widow of Edwin Z. Wainwright, a millionaire brewer of this city, and Willard Hay Bratton, 30 years old, a professional skater, employed as instructor at Duquesne Garden, went away quietly to New York and were married last Saturday by the Rev. Dr. Charles Edward Locke at his residence, 11 Hanson Place, Brooklyn, in the presence of Mrs. Jesse L. Dippold of this city, a friend of Mrs. Wainwright, and another witness, who was called in. At present Mr. and Mrs. Bratton are at the Jamestown Exposition on their honeymoon.

It waa not until to-day that relatives of Mrs. Wainwright knew of the wedding, they supposing that she was visiting friends in New York. She has one son, about 10 years old, who is at the Wainwright home, 5,701 Rippey Street, this city. This afternoon the lad refused to say anything about his mother's wedding.

Mrs. Wainwright, who is a beautiful brunette, inherited $2,500,000 at the deatb of her huaband. Her son has an independent fortune of $250,000, which was also left to him by his father. Mrs. Wainwright was formerly Miss Ida Moore of this city.

The bridegroom is the son of W. H. Bratton of Flatbush, Borough of Brooklyn, N. Y. His father is in business in New York City. The young man comes of an excellent family, his motber having bsen one of tbe wealthy Hay family of Philadelpbia. For some time Bratton traveled for bis father's bouse, but two years ago he settled in Pittsburg as instructor of skating at Duquesne Garden. He is an expert skater and tennis player, and took tbe place because of bis love of skating more than for the amount of money he received for the work.

All of this Winter Mrs. Wainwright has been a constant attendant at Duquesne Garden. She was aeen constantly in the company of young Bratton, but none of her friends attached any importance to the matter on account of the difference in their ages and positions.

Last week Bratton signed a contract for the coming season as manager of a park which is run by the managers of Duquesne Garden, with the understanding that he was to return to the Garden next Winter, to resume his work as skating instructor. He suddenly disappeared, however, and nothing was heard from him until the report of his marriage reached Pittsburg to-day.

The relatives of Mrs. Wainwright were so surprised when they heard of the marriage that at first they doubted the truth of the report, and telegrams were sent to Dr. Locke. He immediately sent word back confirming the fact that he had married the couple. Mrs. Dippold, who is at her home there, also confirmed the report this afternoon.

A. M. PELL SUED FOR DIVORCE.

Papers Filed, but Kept from Public—Couple Parted Two Years Ago.

Suit for divorce has been instituted by Mary Hutton Ecclesine Pell against her husband, Alexander Murtha Pell, member of the well-known Pell family of this city, and a brother of Archie and Duncan Pell.

Justice O'Gorman, it is known, appointed Charles F. Bliss as referee yesterday, but nothing further about the case developed at the Court House. Neither W. J. A. McKim of 320 Broadway, Mr. Pell's attorney, nor Luther G. Billings, representing Mrs. Pell, will discuss it. Papers in the case have been filed with the clerk in Part I., Special Term of the Supreme Court, and no one has been permitted to see them.

The Pells, both of whom are thirty-four years old, have been married for nine years and have one child, a boy. Their relations first became strained a little over two years ago, and their friends were soon afterward surprised to learn that the couple had separated. Since that time Mrs. Pell has maintained a residence in London, only returning to this country recently to conduct her suit.

Mr. Pell, who is wealthy, has spent most of his time on his estate at Richfield Springs.

COMPANIES QUIT TEXAS.

25 Inaurance Organizations Withdraw Because of New Law.

Special to The New York Times.

GALVESTON, Texas, April 27.—Gov. Campbell admits that when he refused to veto the Insurance bill, in response to petitions from the leading financial institutions of the State, he did not believe the life insurance companies would carry their threat to withdraw from the State into execution. Twenty-five of the biggest life insurance companies in the country, however, have given notice to the Texas Commissioner of their withdrawal and have issued instructions to their agents to notify their policy holders.

The new law imposes many objectionable restrictions, chief of which is that which requires the life companies to keep on deposit in Texas 75 per cent. of the amount of the premiums collected on Texas policies. By the withdrawal of the insurance companies, the State will lose nearly $500,000 in taxes annually. They declare that the Eastern life insurance companies have now $10,000,000 invested in Texas, in loans to railroads and other developing institutions, and that they were willing to invest more capital if the new law had not been passed.

KILLED IN A MOCK DUEL.

Edward Belcher, 22 years old, of 456 Humboldt Street, Brooklyn, accidentally killed Charles Murphy of 285 Devoe Street last night in a mock duel with paper cutters. Murphy waa pierced to the heart and died before an ambulance could come from St. Catherine's Hospital.

The two young men and a party of friends were spending the evening at the home of Charles Welatold at 327 Devoe Street. Songs were sung and atories told till finally the talk turned on duels, and then the conteat waa begun. The young men were friends and all concerned said it waa an accident.

Capt. Evans of the Herbert Street Station waa notified and arrested Belcher. He found him leaning over Murphy's body. Belcher waa locked up in the station house on a charge of murder

GIANT BALLOON ASCENDS.

PARIS, April 27.—A giant aerostat named "The Eagle," with a capacity of 4,150 cubic meters, made a successful ascent to-day from St. Cloud.

There were in the car ten of the best-known aeronauts of Paris, including M. Santos-Dumont. The ascent was witnessed by a large and fashionable gathering. The balloon vanished to the southwest before a fair breeze.

HEAVY SNOW IN NORTHWEST.

Railroads Affected and St. Paul Car Lines Blocked.

Special to The New York Times.

ST. PAUL, Minn., April 27.—The most furious snowstorm that has occurred in the Northwest has prevailed for twenty hours. All over the Dakotas, as far west as Montana, the ground is covered with from six to ten inches of snow. Railroad traffic is delayed from five to fifteen hours. Farmers have been delayed in their seeding, and will be forced to replant.

In Minneapolis and St. Paul the street-car system has been blocked all day, cars being pushed through intermittently.

TELLS OF PITTSBURG GRAFT.

President of the Tube City Road Gives Names of Councilmen.

PITTSBURG, April 27.—President C. S. Cameron of the Pittsburg & Tube City Railroad this afternoon made good his promise and turned over to Attorney John Marron, special counsel for the city, the list of members of the Councilmanic graft combine which held him up for $70,000 before it would consider the passage of his railroad franchise ordinance. President Camcron was on the stand for an hour in Magistrats Brady's court.

Attorney Marron declines at the present time to make public the names contained on the list, asserting that besides those of the combine members, the names of several Councilmen who supported the railroad ordinance for legitimate reasons are included in the list. He declares, however, with the list in his possession, he expects to bring criminal charges agalust several members of the combine.

CUBA FREE SEPTEMBER, 1908.

Secretary Taft Expects to End Intervention by That Time.

CINCINNATI, April 27.—That the United States Government would withdraw from temporary control of Cuba in September, 1908, was declared in an interview by Secretary of War Taft to-day.

Briefly referring to that country and his recent visit there, tbe Secretary said the Cuban settlement had proved so unexpectedly satisfactory, and that Gov. Magoon had so completely succeeded in winning the confidence of all parties, that he felt that the United States could withdraw and give those people another opportunity for self-government not later than the date specified.

While the Cuban parties had not agreed among themselves, he explained, still they had agreed with him.

Mr. Taft also said that he expected to sail for the Philippines on Sept. 1, to be absent about eighty days.

SAME OLD CHICAGO.

Stead Can't See That It Has Improved in Fourteen Years.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, April 27.—"It looks like the same old Chicago." William T. Stead, world critic, who, fourteen years ago, took a trip through Chicago's under world and then wrote some blunt and uncomplimentary things about it in a book he named "If Christ Came to Chicago," came back to-day and gave vent to the above opinion. He made a slight qualification.

"That is a purely superficial observation," said Mr. Stead, smiling, "but what I have seen does not impress me with the fact that Chicago has greatly reformed."

About the prospects of world peace, Mr. Stead was particularly anxious to talk.

"The Peace Congress at New York was a dismal failure," be said. "It accomplished practically nothing. It was hopelessly parochial."

EDWARDS'S WIDOW SUES.

Seeks to Prove That Her Husband Was Not a Suicide.

NEW HAVEN, April 27.—Affidavits were taken here to-day in the suit of Mrs. Charles A. Edwards, of New York, against a casualty insurance company of New York to prove that her husband, who was found dead in the Hiller homestead in this city in January of last year, was not a suicide.

Among those who gave affidavits as to Edwards's mental condition were Mrs. Timothy Dwight, wife of ex-President Dwight of Yale University, and Mrs. Samuel Harris, widow of the late Prof. Samuel Harris of Yale, both of whom were cousins of Mr. Edwards, and who were with the latter at Mr. Dwight's home on the evening before Mr. Edwards's body was found. After several weeks of inquiry at the time, the Coroner's verdict was that Edwards had taken laudanum and then shot himself while in the rear of the house, and that then he had gone upstairs and retired, dying in his bed.

The widow sues to recover on an insurance policy in which there is a suicide clause.

DUNLAP SUCCEEDS GILLETTE.

PHILADELPHIA, April 27.—Frederick C. Dunlap of the New York City Water Department was to-day appointed Chief of the Bureau of Filtration of this city to succeed Major Cassius E. Gillette, who resigned hy request. The salary of the office will be reduced from $17,000 a year to $8,000.

Dunlap waa formerly connected with the bureau, but when John W. Hill of Cincinnati, Chief of the hureau, was removed by Mayor Weaver after the political upheaval two years ago, he resigned and went to New York. Major Gillette resigned from the Engineer Corps of the United Statea Army to succeed Hill, and shortly after he came here he charged that the contracting firm of McNichol & Co., of which several leading Republican politicians are members, defrauded the city of large sums of money in the construction of the filtration system.

HUNGRY STATESMEN QUIT JAMESTOWN

Ohio Contingent, Crying for Soap and Food, Reach Washington.

BLOODLESS DUEL FOR DRINK

Buckeye Legislator and a Knight of the Holy Roman Empire in a Tug of War.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, April 27.—The official delegation sent by Ohio to help open the Jamestown Exposition rushed into Washington this morning crying for soap and food. They told a pitiful tale of privations endured by the statesmen and diplomats who helped to celebrate the anniversary of John Smith's landing.

"If John Smith had found that exposition when he landed," declared State Representative S. D. Shankland of Lake County, "he would have been mad at Pocahontas for saving bis life."

"I fought in the Spanish war," said Adjt. Gen. Critchfield, sadly, "but I suffered no such hardships as I have in the last few days."

State Representative Pierce D. Metzger of Cuyahoga County was the hero of the party because of a duel fought with a French diplomat, although it was bloodless, as most French duels. It seems that a luncheon had been prepared for all the visiting dignitaries on ths opening day.

When the famished guests of honor smelled food there was a mad rush for the lunch counter, in which Metzger, as a graduate of the Western Reserve University football team, distinguished himself. The only thing left in sight when he neared the goal, however, waa a cup of lukewarm coffee. He grabbed for it, but so did a uniformed, sworded, gold-laced, and beribboned dignitary with foreign whiskers.

"Beg pardon," said Metzger, clinging to the cup, "this is mine."

The Affront.

"Eet belong to anybody who has heem," declared the Frenchman, also hanging on. "Well, then I've got 'him,' and so it belongs to me," replied Metzger, and jerked the cup out of the other's hand to emphasize possession.

"I am insulted," exclaimed the diplomat in great excitement.

"Well, what are you going to do about it?" demanded Metzger, whose wrath began to rise.

"I will have zee satisfaction, yes," sputtered the other.

"Come outside the tent and I'll give it to you," threatened the Cuyahoga County statesman.

But the Frenchman was digging madly for a card.

"I am one gentleman," he cried, "I do not fight weeth feests. I am one Knight of the Holy Roman Empire," slapping the glittering decoration on his breast.

"You've got nothing on me," boasted the American. "I'm a Knight of the Maccabees myself," whereupon he drank the coffee.

"Barbarian! Cochon—bah—" snarled his antagonist, frantic at the final loss of the coffee, and he snapped his fingers in hostile fashion toward Metzger's face.

Just then a surge of starved State Governors toward the lunch counter drove the two bloodthirsty principals apart.

Appeal to Critchfield.

"What do you think of that? What should I do?" Metzger demanded of Adjt. Gen. Critchfield as an authority on matters of honor and a man of the sword.

"I am puzzled," admitted Gen. Critchfield. "In Cuba during the Spanish war I met many foreign officers, but none who acted like that."

The woes of the Ohio party began with their arrival on the grounds. All carriages were reserved for people wearing glittering uniforms, and money could not secure one for this party wearing the frock coats that constitute the uniform of American statesmen.

Consequently "Acting Gov." James M. Williams of Cleveland, Senator Dick, and Secretary of State Thompson headed a procession, carrying suit cases in one hand and their silk hats in paper bags in the other, that marched the long, uphill way to the botel on foot. Nobody welcomed them or gave them a pleasant smile or asked them what tbey would have. Nor would the harassed clerks or haughty bellbops of the Inside Inn notice them, although Col. Thompson had the money in his fist to pay for twenty-eight rooms reserved weeks in advance.

The dignity of Ohio was jostled about the hotel lobby for two hours, protesting vainly. The weaker brothers subsided into corners and mopped their streaming brows. "If we only had our National Guard uniforms on," sighed Col. Thompson.

Tried It on the Clerk.

"For heaven's sake, Critchfield, turn your reminiscences on the clerk. Maybe they will bring him to time," protested the distracted Secretary of State.

Gen. Critchfield, nothing loath, pushed his heavy weight through the crowd, brought a big fist crashing down on the desk, and, in the voice of a bull moose, began to kick in the language of "our army in Flanders."

They got the rooms. "But such rooms," sighed Sam Flickinger, secretary to Gov. Harris, who loves bis ease. "A hole in the wall, $3.50 per day without meals, and if a man dropped a remark in the lobby, you could hear it in every room."

"And no soap," echoed the whole party. They could not find a cake in their rooms, and no one connected with the botel would give them any.

State Senator Charles Lawyer of Ashtabula County headed a raid of faithful organization men who captured a sliver of laundry soap for the use of Senator Dick.

"Now, in Cuba—" began Critchfield.

"Curse Cuba," muttered State Auditor Guilbert. "What we want is soap."

In their despair they went to the Ohio building, which is one of the few State buildings completed on time. The State Commissioners received them with little formal speeches they had thoughtfully prepared and given to the press in advance.

"Never mind the welcoming ode," cried A. P. Sandles, President of the State Board of Agriculture, testily; "have you got any soap?"

The Commissioners were sorry. They had cases and cases of soap ordered, but it had not arrived.

The party went out on the veranda and

Temperance Man's Regrets.

"I am a temperance man, and voted to raise the saloon tax to $1,000," began State Senator West, apologetically, and the party sat up with reviving interest and began to notice, "but I wish I had a drink," West ended, dejectedly.

The party fell back in their chairs with a chorus of groans. It was the same story with food. Members of the delegation all swore on reaching Washington that they had not eaten a meal since leaving the confines of Ohio. What they saw and heard of the ceremonies depended on the battle they put up or the bribes they offered.

They had to watch the great naval review from a distant wharf. Boats were prohibited from crossing the harbor while the President's yacht lay there. Senator Dick tried all his influence on Admiral Harrington to have this modified for the official Ohio delegation, but there was nothing doing.

"That is the work of Taft," muttered Critchfield, gloomily, and added, "I wish I'd had him in my regiment in Cuba."

Seven members of the party did finally run the guards, buy a boatman and conduct a surreptitious review of the fleet. State Senator Hafner fell in with an officer of the Ohio and discovered, so he says, that the boasted silver service given the battleship Ohio consists of a butter dish and a hern-handled corkscrew. He will ask the Legislature for an appropriation to give the ship a real service.

Finally when the Ohio party wanted to get out of Jamestown the members ran against some more regulations and had to huy another hoatman to circumvent them. Their hoatman was arrested just as he landed the statesmen alongside of the steamer bound for Washington. On this steamer they could get neither food nor drink, nor was there any soap. When they reached the Raleigh Hotel here this morning they ordered twenty-eight baths, breakfast for fifty-six, and there followed the noise of a great splasb and the clatter of silverware.

The party left for Ohio tonight at 11 o'clock. As the train pulled out, Critchfield, who was on the rear platform, was heard to say:

"When I was in Cuha, during the Spanish War—" hut just then other members of the party on the back platform ran inside the car. The Ohio delegation reported that the Exposition is nowhere near completion.

ROOSEVELT SAILS BACK.

NORFOLK, Va., April 27.—After a trip on the James River to Jamestown Island and back, President Roosevelt set sail for Washington on the yacht Mayflower at 9:40 to-night. He is expected to arrive at the capital before noon to-morrow.

The trip on the James River was made on the yacht Siyph. It was a purely private excursion, to give the President and some of his guests an opportunity to see some of the historio spots. Brandon, the estate of the Harrisons, on which is a fine mansion, said to he the oldest Colonial architecture in Virginia; Westover, the estate of the Byrds, and Shirley, the estate of the Carters, were visited. The party also inspected the old church tower at Jamestown, which is all that stands to mark the spot chosen hy the first English settlers to hulld their homes.

The day was far from heing pleasant. The sky was entirely overcast with clouds at daybreak, and there were several drizzling showers during the morning. Inclement weather, however, had no effect upon those on board the yacht, and they insisted upon carrying out their programme. In order to make the trip as much of a holiday as possible, the President insisted that his stops should be entirely informal, and it was announced that if there should be any ceremony he would not make the stops scheduled. At Westover, Branden, and Shirley the President and his guests met only the occupants of the estates.

In the President's party were Mrs. Roosevelt, Miss Roosevelt, Archie and Quentin Roosevelt, Justice Moody of the Supreme Court, Assistant Secretary Bacon of the State Department, William Loeb, Jr., secretary to the President, and Assistant Secretary Latta; Mrs. Ralph Cross Johnson, Capt. Lee, Military Aide to the President; Lieut. Commander Long of the navy, and Dr. Ohnesorg of the navy.

Upon their return late this afternoon they transferred, off Newport News, from the Syiph to the Mayflower, which later sailed for Washington.

The Ohio, Maryland, and Connecticut State huildings on the Jamestown Exposition grounds were formally opened today, and at the Virginia State Building Gov. and Mrs. Swanson received informally for several hours.

The opening of the Ohio Building led off at 11 A. M., with all of the Ohio Executive party present. Miss Blanche E. Cadot of Toledo and Mrs. Theodore Boiling, wife of the Ohio Executive Commissioner, received the guests. The formal opening of the Maryland Building hy Gov. Warfield occurred at noon, and was followed hy a reception.

The Connecticut State Building was opened next with ceremonies more elaborate than at either of the others. There were many Connecticut State officials in attendance, and the guests included the Governors of several States, governmental and exposition officials. Gov. Swanson of Virginia extended Virginia's greetings, and President Tucker spoke for the exposition company. Gov. Woodruff and the Connecticut party left tonight.

The Pennsylvania State Building was not opened to-day. It is hoped to have the Louisiana Building open in a few weeks, but the decorations are yet incomplete, and the date has not been fixed.

The official atatement of the Exposition's opening attendance yesterday shows that there were 54,000 people within the grounds during the day and evening. The turnstile statement shows a total of 38,240 admission tickets, including paid tickets and passes. This statement does not include, however, the people who entered the service and carriage gates and the several thousand who came ashore from the fleet of war vessels anchored in Hampton Roads.

ROOSEVELT AS A CHILD.

Senator Beveridge Hopes There Will Be More Like Him.

GALENA, Ill., April 27.—The hirthday of Gen. Grant was celebrated to-day hy the people of Galena and vicinity. Business in general was suspended. The cornerstone of the Carnegie-Foyt fifty-thousand-dollar library huilding was laid in the morning. Commemorative exercises took place in the afternoon in Grant Park.

"To-day, like Washington, like Jackson, like Lincoln, and like Grant, Theodore Roosevelt is similarly assailed hy similar men. Like them, he has been called a 'despot'; like them, and like all great men of all countries and of all times, he has been called 'egotist' and 'insane.' To little minds the great have always been both vain and mad. But of our President, who is great only because he is hig enough to reflect the purposes of 90,000,000 people, the final charge that he is a 'child' waa made the other day by a brilliant editor in an acid speech.

"If child he he, God give us more such children to serve and to hless thia Nation! God grant that auch stock shall not run out! God grant that for every Washington period there shall be a Washington, for every Jackson period a Jackson, for every Grant and Lincoln period a Lincoln and Grant, for every Roosevelt period a Theodore Roosevelt!"

BONAPARTE PRAISES TAFT.

BOSTON, April 27.—An address was delivered to-night by Secretary of the Navy Bonaparte at the dinner of the French-American Republican Club of Massachusetts.

He spoks in words of highest praise of the course taken hy President Roosevelt in his attitude toward the great combinations of capital. He referred to Secretary of War Taft as "a man to whose character, ahilities, and public service only history will do full justice, although I hope and believe they are appreciated and will be recognized by hia countrymen."

SAN FRANCISCO, April 27.—United States Senator La Follette of Wisconsin, who arrived here to-day, gave it as his opinion that President Roosevelt will be renominated by acclamation at the next Republican Convention.

"SIR JOHNNY" DUNN TAKES HIS NEW JOB

PUNCTUAL TO THE MINUTE

"Sir Johnny" Dunn, 74 years old, and for more than thirty years head of the Wall Street branch of the Detective Bureau, having been caught in the ebh tide of transfers Friday night and washed away down to Canarsie, got up yesterday morning hefore 5 o'clock, took his cold hath, put on his clothes, including his high silk hat, white waistcoat and houtonniere, and started for his new precinct, Canarsie, which is described as having a fishy smell.

Of course "Sir Johnny" had no uniform. He can hardly remember when he wore one. Thirty years and more in Wall Street, and before that a sleuth connected with the main Detective Bureau at 300 Mulberry Street, the last little hlue uniform that he wore has long ago fed the moths. And it would be hard to borrow a uniform for "Sir Johnny"; he is so small.

But Lieut. Dunn in his nearly fifty years of service in the department never has known what it was to be behind time. He does not let small things come between him and orders. He might well have called off his first trip to the lonely precinct hy the sea on the ground of sickness, so that he could get a uniform. His superior officers would have understood that well. But "Sir Johnny" has never looked for excuses to get around immediate and complete fulfillment of orders.

On Friday night his children and grandchildren and great-grandchildren, who had gathered in his house at 995 Lexington Avenue to cheer up the Lieutenant, tried to make a joke out of how hard it would be for him to find his new assignment. They pictured to him how many times he would have to transfer from one car to another to get there, and how if he should make the wrong transfer at any point he would he late. What if he should be late once?

But all this about Canarsie was no joke to "Sir Johnny." He had little idea of how one should get there. He laughed at the jokes, but he wrote down the various routes that were mapped out to him. Though he always gets up at 5:30 o'clock for a cold hath, yesterday morning he was up long before that. His children, who had planned to wake him at that hour, to make sure he shouldn't be late, found his reem empty.

On the Job to the Minute.

"Sir Johnny" reached his post at 7 o'clock, an hour before he was due. The Lieutenant at the desk was shocked when "Sir Jehnny" strolled in at 7 o'clock in the morning, pink of cheek and swinging his walking stick. "It's some millionaire that's hughouse on early morning walks," thought the Lieutenant. The new Lieutenant walked behind the desk and introduced himself. The man in charge gasped.

At 8 o'clock, when the men came in from patrol and others came in to go to work they were all made known to "Sir Johnny." A great many of them knew him already; all of them knew him at least by reputation. He is one of the very few men who can lecture policemen at Headquarters with safety.

He told his troubles about his uniform. The men hustled around through the station, finally locating an old cap that would do and a hlouse that had to do. The sleeves were a hit long for "Sir Johnny," and the coat wasn't a wall-paper fit anywhere. But the new Lieutenant was able to fulfill the utmost letter of the regulations as to dress, and he was content.

Thus, at 8 o'clock sharp, "Sir Jehnny," late chief of the Wall Street Bureau, laid aside his cutaway coat, white waistcoat, and walking cane and silk hat, put on the ancient misfit blouse, and entered upon his new duties on the dot. Orders had been carried out.

When the men had filed out of the station and it took on the customary drowsy quiet of a far-away precinct, "Sir Johnny" contrasted Canarsie and 13 Wall Street, the Steck Exchange Building, where the downtown hranch of the Detective Bureau has always been. He missed the greeting of this or that young or old millionaire whom he was accustomed to greet in the corridors at 13 Wall Street. A fisherman came in to report that some villain had stolen a net and a clam spade, hut that was all.

He missed his visit to the good restaurant he customarily went to at luncheon time. He walked out to a shack and got what he could. Late in the afternoon, instead of standing at Wall and Broad Streets, and, with his men, watching the tide roll out from the Dementia Americana district, he went to watch the fishing boats passing into the hay.

"It's Orders," Says Sir Johnny.

Later in the day a son-in-law of his, D. A. McLaughlin, went down to aee how he was getting on. On Friday night his children and grandchildren and great-grandchildren had pictured him, jokingly, once more in a uniform. They had tried thus to get him out of the blues. They do not conceal their concern over what the effect of this transfer has upon "Sir Johnny." And so when his son-in-law entered the station house yesterday the old Lieutenant braced up bravely, called up a smile, and said:

More than one who sympathized with "Sir Johnny" in his day of trouble aired their indignation hefore him. They said it was "a shame to send out an old veteran to a precinct like Canarsie." They tried to point out politics in the move. Some of them joked him for pursuing that sort of police policy which leaves a veteran with a lean pocketbook, alhelt with practically a stainless record. He let them all talk. He answered nothing except, "It's orders, boys."

And last night "Sir Johnny" had to stay at the Canarsie Station. He had to do a night shift. The record at his home is that last night was the first he had spent away from home in twenty-eight years. One or two of his children, who had not been able to get to see him on Friday night, together with all the others of bis folks and a number of friends, had gathered at his house to cheer him up. But McLaughlin brought back word late in the afternoon that "Sir Johnny" couldn't come home.

"My heavens, then," exclaimed Mrs. E. D. Clark, a daughter who lives with him, "what will he do for his night's cold bath? He'll he knocked out of gear if that is taken away from him."

He Has Trained to Keep Fit.

The family sat around speculating what effect the Canarsie assignment will have upon "Sir Johnny." They are all sure that he will not resign, as was the manifest design of Commissioner Bingham in taking the old Lieutenant out of the Wall Street Bureau. He was eligible for resignation perhaps thirty years ago. His children and his friends say that he has never had a thought except to keep himself fit to remain on the force.

They hold he has accomplished that. They declare that he hasn't been sick in years; that his habit of taking two cold haths a day all his life, of walking and exercising every day, and of abstaining from tobacco and liquors has left him now, old as he is, hale and hearty, almost unimpaired physically and completely so mentally. They argue that the Wall Street Bureau has been used a long time as a berth for veteran policemen with more experience than agility.

They admit that the branch down there is an easy berth, allowing the men, as it does, to go home at night, but they hold that the duty of the head of the bureau is simply to see to it that the few men under him go out and work, exercising his wide experience in their guidance. They argue that "Sir Johnny" has done that well for more than thirty years, and that he is both physically and mentally able to continue doing that. Certainly he can do hetter work there than in some precinct, they say, and if he is to remain on the force, why break the spirit of a veteran with an almost stainless record?

For it is no secret that "Sir Johnny" has had the ambition to die in harness. He has labored to keep himself so that up to the last, no matter how old he might be, he would be mentally and physically fit for the place he held.

Golden Wedding Long Ago.

His family say that for "Sir Johnny" to be compelled to remain at home would kill him. It is not alone that he has gone every day for thirty years to 13 Wall Street, returning every day at the same time, but that some three months ago his wife was burned to death in the big family parlor. She had helped him hold himself up, and three years ago, when he and she celebrated their golden wedding, he was as happy and as sound as any of his six children.

His family and friends fear for the consequences if "Sir Johnny" is practically compelled to loiter away his time at home and away from 13 Wall Street. Once hefore, when Mr. McAdoo was Commissioner, there was a plan on foot to try to force him to resign. It cut into "Sir Johnny's" spirit so deeply that the many big men he knew in Wall Street interceded for him, and the Lieutenant held his joh.

The news that he had been exiled to Canarsie became known early on Friday afternoon, but the underground telegraph that tells men of what has happened to them long hefore the official order is in their hands did not tell "Sir Johnny" anything. Nohody wanted to do it.

How "It" Came to Him.

He reported as usual at 300 Mulherry Street late in the afternoon. The Lieutenant in charge of the orders in the Detective Bureau is also named Dunn.

"Anything for me, Lieut. Dunn?" asked "Sir Johnny."

"A letter, Lieut. Dunn," was the answer. "I'm afraid it's all up."

"Thank you," said "Sir Johnny," and he went home to tell his favorite daughter that "it"—she knew what that meant—had come at last. There was a sort of wake at 995 Lexington Avenue Friday night. "Sir Johnny" has six children, thirteen grandchildren, and four great-grandchildren. Almost all of them were there, as well as friends from all over the city.

On Friday before last, when the first hig shake-up struck the Police Department, "Sir Johnny" went home more than usually happy. "Well, Nellie, thank God, for the first jolt has come, and I am not among the missing." Friday night he said:

"Thank God still, Nellie, but it's all up, I guess. I'm to go to Canarsie."

The thought of being practically put out has preyed upon the mind of the many-yeared Lieutenant. He has wanted to die in harness, and yet he has feared always that the Commissioner in power would consider just the number of years that was chalked up against him, without investigating his peculiar physical and mental fitness. At every big transfer movement in the department he trembled.

A Policeman Since 1859.

"Sir Johnny" Dunn came from Ireland when he was not a year old. He has been in New York ever since. Joining the force in 1859, he has been there since, and hopes to be when his last order comes. In spite of his nearly fifty years in the Police Department, thirty of them being in Wall Street, he does not even own his house, his children say. He has had only two charges against him, and they were apparently for little technical matters. One of them was dismissed, anyway. And for the other, he was only reprimanded.

Though he is not rich, he has raised a fine family. He has three sons—Thomas J., an ex-Deputy Customs Collector; John J., an acter, educated for a musician, and Charles, private secretary to the Assistant Secretary of the United States Treasury. His three daughters are all married. They are Mrs. E. D. Clark, 995 Lexington Avenue; Mrs. D. A. McLaughlin, 99 Lexington Avenue, and Mrs. James Larkin, 240 East Fifteenth Street. All of his children have children, and some of these have more.

Mrs. Clark says that the three things in which "Sir Johnny" has educated all his family to the last generation are punctuality, scrupulous neatness, and the saying of good words about any one who is for the moment under a dark cloud. His favorite comment, says Mrs. Clark, when the conversation is about this or that man in the department being up on charges or dismissed or otherwise in trouhle, is this:

"Oh, well, I don't know what his trouble is. Remember, we don't know the other side. But I do knew he was a good fellow."

His Punctuality.

His neatness is almost a joke in the department. He is a machine in punctuality, and this he has impressed on all bis folks.

"We used te have a certain time to eat," said Mrs. Clark yesterday. "He would not begin until every child of us was at the table. It mattered not how long the table was kept waiting—everything had to stand until the round of the family was filled. The knowledge that everything hung on a tardy one somehow made us get the habit of doing things on time. He considered it a cardinal sin to fail to do a thing at the proper time."

"Sir Johnny" went to Wall Street at a certain time the first day it was opened and since, and unless he got a night assignment he came home at a certain time. He always got up in time for 6 o'clock mass at the Dominican church in Sixty-fifth Street. His family, which was gathered last night to talk about the awful thing that had happened, were sure that "Sir Johnny" would get back this morning in time for late morning church, anyway.

The record runs in the Dunn family that "Sir Johnny's" mother lived to be over 90 years old, and that she was 81 before she lost a single teeth. She swallowed that. The children and grandchildren and great-grandchildren and friends are praying that "Sir Johnny" will be at least 81 before he finally loses his old job at 13 Wall Street, and that it will be equally as sudden and providential as Grandma Dunn's first denticular loss.

J. R. KEENE'S DAUGHTER SUES.

Mrs. Talbot J. Taylor, daughter of James R. Keene, is suing her husband for divorce. They have been living apart for some time, hut, as it had been understood that her father was much opposed to a dissolution of the marriage, it was not known that steps for a divorce had been taken until the matter came into court. Samuel Untermyer, as counsel for Mrs. Taylor, made application last week to the Supreme Court for the appointment of a commission to take testimony outside the State, but made no argument.

The Taylors have been well-known in social circles, and have entertained at their country house, Cedarhurst, L. I., and at their Adirondack camp on Upper Saranac Lake. Talbot J. Taylor was the senior partner of the brokerage firm of Talbot J. Taylor & Co., in which Foxhall P. Keene was a special partner with an interest of $200,000. They were the brokers for J. R. Keene, and as he made their offices at 30 Broad Street his headquarters, they were of much importance in the financial world.

The firm assigned on July 24, 1903, to Philip J. Britt, after the collapse of the Southern Pacific pool, engineered by J. R. Keene, and the decrease in value of United States Steel and other stocks. Their total liahilities were $8,713,476, and they had nominal assets of $21,016,762, and actual assets of $7,410,065. Russell Sage had lent the firm $800,000, and was the largest secured creditor, and it was understood that J. R. Keene was the largest unsecured creditor. His name did not appear in the schedules, but his interest was set down as $1,500,000.

TELLS OF MISSING GIRL.

Police Hear That Elizabeth Grady Was Dragged Into a Downtown Hotel.

A possible clue as to the whereabouts of Elizabeth Grady, the fourteen-year-old daughter of Andrew Grady of 183d Street and Fort Washington Road, who has been missing for a week, was received yesterday. A registered letter was sent to Capt. Kreuscher of the West 152d Street Police Station, written in French, and signed "A Perfect Gentleman."

It said that the writer had seen about 9:30 o'clock on Wednesday a girl, answering the description of Elizabeth Grady, having a dispute with a man in Twelfth Street, near Third Avenue. The man was evidently trying to persuade her to go into a hotel. She refused, and he took her by the arm and dragged her in by main force.

The writer declares that he haa no doubt that it was Elizabeth Grady and that he decided it was his duty to inform the police of the occurrence. Capt. Kreuscher notified the police at the Fifth Street Station, and they are investigating the story.

A careful search of the neighborhood near the girl's home has been made by the police, and her companions have been questioned. One of her schoolmates declared that she fancied she had seen her in an automobile in Broadway, hut the police do not put much stock in her story.

Mr. Quincy was asked if he could explain how Dennett could have known of his practice as a lawyer in order to pick him out as the prospective counsel for a friend who had committed a robbery. No explanation occurred to him. He was then told that Squire and Dennett had been engaged in a financial negotiation within a few days of the time when Dennett communicated with Mr. Quincy.

This suggested an incident to Mr. Quincy's mind, which he had not recalled previously. It was that Dennett, when the two first met at the Manhattan Club, told him that Mr. Squire had suggested his name as just the man to handle the ease.

How Quincy Found Company's Name

This was all on that particular phrase of the subject that Mr. Quincy remembered to-day. The next point of his original story upon which more light was thrown to-day had to do with his activity after his return from Boston on Wednesday night, and before he went back to New York to see Dennett again on Saturday. The understanding had been that Mr. Quincy did not learn the name of the trust company involved until Dennett told him on Saturday. This still remains true so far as positive information from Dennett is concerned, but it also developed to-day that Mr. Quincy was sufficiently informed when he got back to Boston to be able to sit down with a list of Directors of several likely trust companies and decide that the Trust Company of America was probably the one involved. He told reporters that he discovered Mr. Sheehan's name upon this list.

He was asked where he obtained the list, whether from a corporation directory or from a private source. He said that a clerk in his office looked it up. Mr. Quincy was then informed that, inasmuch as Mr. Sheehan did not become a Director of the Trust Company of America until after the merger with the Colonial Trust Company, which has just been consummated, Mr. Sheehan's name could not possibly appear in the board of President Thorne's concern in any of the existing corporation directories. He then went out and got the list of Directors of trust companies which he had consulted. He had been mistaken, he said. He heard Mr. Sheehan's name from some other source; probably Dennett told him on Saturday. He would not say positively about that.

The next interesting thing abeut the talk with Mr. Quincy to-day had to do with the arrival of Mr. Heney as a facter in the case. Upon the inference suggested to him on Friday, that Douglas and Dennett were both present at the meeting with Mr. Quincy on Saturday afternoon, he was still unwilling to cemment, but when asked at what stage of the case Mr. Honey came in he said it was not until Sunday morning, after he had been informed of the arrest.

Concerning his talk with an official of the trust company, Mr. Quincy was still silent to-day. He said that he considered that the public statement of Mr. Sheehan that no blame attached to him made it proper that he should not speak on the trust company side of the case.

Quincy's Bankruptcy.

Mr. Quincy took exception to-day to the statement in THE TIMES that he was "broken in health and spirits." He said that, while he had lost some sleep en account of this case, his health was excellent; in fact, he prided himself on it. His suggestion was that the only change in his appearance was the turning of his hair from black to gray, but there had been many troubles of a financial nature in the past ten years leading up to his bankruptcy in January of this year. The records of that hankruptcy disclose a list of securities of which Mr. Quincy was possessor at the time the petition was filed.

The companies in which he was interested as stockholder or bondholder were, among others, the Colonial Filing Company, the United Mining Company, the Deadwood Quartz Mining Company, the Caltonia Copper Mining Company, the Belanger Spinning Ring Company, the Peepie's Legal Company, the Arizona and New England Consolidated Mining Company, the Consolidated Street Lighting Company, the Pedella Gold Mining Company, the Paraffine Oil Company, the By-Products Paper Company, the Maskell Copper Reduction Company, the La Luz Drainage and Transportation Company, the King Solomon Mines Company, the Don Carlos and Turka Mining Company, and the Constant Dynamo Company.

Thinks Retainer Envelope a Plant.

Mr. Quincy's attention was called to the finding of $2,500 in an envelope marked "Retainer for Josiah Quincy" in Dennett's hed at the Manhattan Club. He said:

"My theory is that the envelope was placed there as a plant. It was natural, however, that Dennett, when he found the crash at hand, should have some money ready to pay a lawyer."

Mr. Quincy went to his home in Weston this afternoon, and denied himself to reporters later.

DENNETT MAY WIN IMMUNITY.

Believed to be Playing for That in Bond Theft Case.

Although ex-Mayor Josiah Quincy of Boston has denied that he has any more knowledge of O. M. Dennett than a slight acquaintance, and has explained that all he knowa of the bond robbery from the Trust Company of America was derived from consultations with him as a lawyer, the rumor that there is a "man higher up" somewhere persisted yesterday. Forbes J. Hennessy, counsel for Dennett, visited him in the Tombs yesterday morning. When he came out he was asked:

"Has any promise of immunity been made to Denentt in return for his statement?"

"When I was in the District Attorney's office," replied Mr. Hennessy, cautiously, "immunity was often granted. I suppose that the aystem is still in vogue."

It is believed that the trust officials made a strong effort, when they first discovered the defalcations, to obtain from Dennett and Douglas some part of the $140,000 which they think the prisoners retain in some place of concealment. The District Attorney's office was not called into the case until Tuesday evening, two days after the arrests.

Now Mr. Jerome is playing for bigger game. Immunity is never promised to a prisoner before he has made his statement, but it is a well-recognized principle in criminal cases that if a prisoner helps on the District Attorney his complaisance will not lose its reward. Dennett talked for four hours to a stenographer, and it is believed that he laid bare a big conspiracy in which out-of-town promoters were concerned. If he had only been telling of his own dealings with Douglas he could have hoped to gain little from it.

Mr. Hennessy, after his interview with Dennett, did not confirm Mr. Quincy's story that he had merely a nodding acquaintance with his client while Dennett was with the Beacon Trust Company.

"That assertion is inaccurate," said Mr. Hennessy. "He had a long and intimate acquaintance with my client, and I do not think he can deny it."

It was learned yesterday that at any rate the Trust Company of America thought enough of Mr. Quincy's connection with Douglas and Dennett to send one of its officials to atop him talking. Immediately after the arrest of Douglas last Sunday this official called on Mr. Quincy at the apartments at 128 Central Park South and urged him to keep silence. Soon after Mr. Quincy went to Boston with his wife and family.

Assistant District Attorney Murphy went up to Lakeville yesterday with the confessions of Douglas and Dennett and went over them with Mr. Jerome. Oakleigh Thorne, President of the trust company, was away fishing at Millbrook, N. Y., and almost the only persons connected with the case in town besides the prisoners in the Tombs were the Pinkertons, who keep watch over Dennett's office on the ninth floor of 42 Wall Street.

Mr. Murphy has the only key. The offices are two small rooms, which could he turned inside out in a couple of hours. Yet they are watched day and night by the detectives. It is understood that some hope yet lingers in the minds of the trust company officials that somewhere there may he found some of the $140,000.

General Overhauling Likely.

At the State Banking Department yesterday it was surmised that the present robbery would lead to a great overhauling of the system in vogue in the trust companies. Whenever a defalcation occurs it always arouses the vigilance of the banking officials of Wall Street, and there is a quiet overhauling of their accounts and a careful inspection of the work of the most trusted officials.

But what strikes the State Banking Department particularly in this case is the ease with which Douglas walked out with the honds.

"In many banks and trust companies," said one of the examiners yesterday, "it is made impossible fer a clerk who handles securities or large sums of money to leave the bank during the day. He enters his cage at 9:30 o'clock, when business begins, and stays there until after 3 o'clock. By that means he has no opportunity to pay surreptitieus visits to stock brokers.

"It seems a curious thing for a clerk to be able to step out to luncheon and take it watching a tape machine. In many institutions luncheon is sent in by the bank to the clerks who are liable to temptation. If the Trust Company of America had gone te the expense ef providing Douglas's luncheen his opportunities to defraud them would have been practically destroyed."

Other cases similar to the present robbery have occurred. Some years ago a hank clerk had "horrowed" $50,000 for use on the steck market. When he found he could not pay it back he went to a lawyer. His advice was to take another $100,000 and use that as working capital te get him out of the hole. He only plunged in further, and when the inevitable smash came the lawyer got ten years for his advice.

A Hoase Douglas Dealt With.

Douglas carried on many of his deals in the steck market with houses of good standing. One house he dealt with was Carpenter, Baggott & Co. of 21 William Street. A member of the firm said last night:

"Dennett had been dealing with us for the last two or three years. I do not remember from whom he received his introduction to us, but I am sure that it was from an unexceptional source. He opened an account, but it never ran to any very high figures. Perhaps as a rule he was carrying from 100 to 500 shares.

"He had the reputation of being a careful trader with good information. He always was conservative in his speculations, and would sometimes let a week or two go by without buying anything. Generally he was ahead of the game, but he got caught in the Canadian Pacific slump a week or two ago and dropped $3,000.

"He has not heen inside our offices for nearly a year, in consequence of some slight treuble which happened there, but he continued to send his orders by telephone. At the present moment there stands to his credit on our books about $5,600."

Carpenter, Baggot & Co. have in their possession $36,000 of the honds stolen from the Trust Company of America, but they have notified the company that it can get them back as seon as it likes to send for them.

WALLS FALL, KILLING FOUR.

Enraged Hungarians Stone Officers of Copper Firm—Try to Wreck Train.

PERTH AMBOY, N. J., April 27.—Four men were instantly killed, three badly injured, and fifteen others hurt this afternoon by the falling of a brick wall at the De La Mar Copper Works at Cbrome, a place about eight miles from here, en Staten Island Sound. Those killed were all Hungarians.

As soon as the news of the accident spread about the village, a crowd of about 700 Hungarians gathered at the gates of the works and demanded admittance. When denied entrance they attacked officers of the company who tried to pacify them. The latter were driven to shelter by volleys of stones.

A special train was made up and run into the company's property to take on board those who required hospital treatment. When the train pulled out of the grounds the engineer discovered a big pile of ties on the track, which had heen put there hy the enraged foreigners.

SMITH WOULD AMEND THE ELSBERG BILL

NEED PRIVATE CAPITAL

In Order to Get It, He Declares, Present Exacting Conditions Must Be Changed.

According to Rapid Transit Commissioner Charles Stewart Smith there is practically no possibility of the city being in a position to accept the offer of the Interborough Company, through its President Theodore P. Shonts, to build certain new subways, no matter to what extent the authorities look with favor on the proposal. The city's debt limit, in Mr. Smith's opinion, effectually prevents such a course being followed, and the only hope for new subways is the repeal or amendment of the Elsberg law.

In an interview last night Mr. Smith said that he considered the proposal made by Mr. Shonts to be a fairly reasonable one from the standpoint of the Interborough, but one that could not be seriously considered, as it practically entailed municipal construction and would necessitate the expenditure by the city of more money than the municipality could afford to spend on subways. He thought, however, that it would be an exceedingly good thing for the officials of the Interborough and the members of the Board of Rapid Transit Commissioners to discuss' "as business men" the possibility of so modifying the conditions in the present contract which the traction company found onerous as to make them acceptable.

Private Capital the Last Hope.

"There is just one thing to be said about the matter," said Mr. Smith; "we've got to attract private capital. That is the one way to get what we want. The conditions under which subways are to be built must be made attractive to private capital, and the first step to be taken in that direction is to repeal or amend the Elsberg law. It is that law which is responsible for the present state of affairs and its passage through the Legislature has simply put off rapid transit for a year.

"Mr. Shonts's proposal to build extensions to the present Subway line with the city's money at actual cost is possibly all that he could offer to do under the circumstances, but the word 'cost' is very elastic, and what Mr. Shonts proposes is practically municipal construction, to which I am opposed. He would be in the position of an agent of municipal construction under the suggested conditions, and nothing else. At the same time the Interborough, Mr. Shonts should remember, would be building lines that would eventually be feeders to their present lines.

"The city cannot build the subways. It is a mistake to suppose that it can, either independently or as Mr. Shonts suggests. The debt limit prohibits such a thing; the city has not got the money, and to have the limit taken off the debt limit as it affects subways would necessitate a constitutional amendment, requiring three years. In addition I am not sure but that it would be a bad thing, for you can never tell what sort of men are going to get into office.

"Controller Metz is conatantly asserting that we have no money to spend. The city has undertaken to build the Subway loop between the East River bridges, which private capital would not undertake or even look at, and which will cost $15,000,000. The Board of Estimate is not going to alow its whole income to be expended on rapid transit lines and to build the really necessary subways would mean that new schoolhouses and many other improvements just as important would have to be abandoned.

"As I said before, the only thing to do is to make the conditions attractive to private capital and then, if the Interborough will not bid perhaps somebody else will. But they won't do it under the Elsberg bill. I knew some men who had intended to bid on subways before that law passed, but when they found the franchise was to be limited to twenty years they shook their heads and would not even consider it. The Elsberg bill was enacted because there seemed to be a belief that Belmont had a fat thing and was making a lot of money. Now I know what the Interborough is making, and they are not making too much, considering the chances they took.

"That first contract was the greatest thing of its kind that was ever drawn up. It was conceived in the Chamber of Commerce, and much of the credit for it belongs to Mr. Hewitt. Think of it: In forty-two years, owing to the 1 per cent. that is paid into the Sinking Fund, the whole city indebtedness for the construction of the Subway is wiped out, and at the end of the lease term the city has the property without its having cost the taxpayers a single cent. There never was a contract like that drawn anywhere.

Would Admit Advertisements.

"Now, I've been on the Contract Committee of the board all the time. When we drew up this last contract, owing to the great public sentiment on the question, we barred all advertising signs. It is my belief that they should be allowed to display advertising signs at the stations, as long as they do not interfere with the easy reading of the name of the station. Every railroad in Europe has such signs at the stations, and there is no good reason why we should not have them here. However, we barred them out.

"Not a member of the board expected to find any bids in the box last Thursday. I knew perfectly well that there would not be any; I knew that no one would come forward to bid under the Elsberg law. We knew what the Interborough wanted, for they had discussed it with us, and we were practically certain that they wouldn't bid, either.

"The Elsberg law cannot be repealed at this session of the Legislature. That means that we will have to wait till next year. In the meanwhile the Public Utilities bill will probably pass in some form or other, and we will be out of office."

Controller Metz, who is also a member of the Rapid Transit Board, took a more hopeful view of the situation, though he declined to discuss the offer of Mr. Shonts at length until he saw the parallel between the present form of contract and that for the first Subway, which is being prepared by former Corporation Counsel George L. Rives, and will be presented by him to the Rapid Transit Commission next Thursday.

"I haven't gone into the matter deeply," said Mr. Metz. "I'm waiting to see the comparison between the old contract and the new one. The city hasn't got any money to build subways with, and anyway the Interborough people could raise the money just as easily as the city, providing the city guaranteed the bonds."

Mr. Shonts is expected back from the South to-morrow, and it is expected that he will elucidate still further the plans that he may propose to the commission if a conference is held. It was learned yesterday that one of the schemes the Interborough has had in mind, and one which was proposed to the commission at an executive session, was the building of a two-track, one-level express subway up Lexington Avenue, instead of a four-track, double-decked line. The express line was to have but two stations, and free transfers were to be given to the Lexington Avenue surface cars, which, it was maintained, would be able to take care of the local travel.

URGE TRI-BOROUGH SUBWAYS.

A meeting of the Presidents of several Brooklyn civic organizations interested in the construction of the proposed tri-borough subways was held yesterday afternoon in the offices of Frank A. Hutson at 150 Nassau Street. It was decided to ask the city to build the road, and if this effort is not successful an attempt will be made to obtain private capital for the purpose.

The proposed route is complete as a franchise, except the four-track line on Manhattan Bridge, known as the Flatbush extension. The Manhattan Bridge route was adopted by the Board of Estimate on Friday, and Borough President Coler, who was present, offered to assist in obtaining the consents of the property owners along the route, and said he would bear part of the expense. The line will run from Hanson Place and Flatbush Avenue, Brooklyn, to Canal Street and the Bowery. The discussion will be again taken up at a meeting late this week.

Those who attended the meeting were Frank A. Hutson, President of the Bath Beach, Bensonhurst, Borough Park and Coney Island Subway Improvement Company; Daniel Moynahan, President of the West End Board of Trade; Edward Stratton, Jr., President of the Taxpayers and Rentpayers' Association of the Thirtieth and Thirty-first Wards; John R. Pinover, President of the Lefferts Park Improvement League; C. E. Weisz, Treasurer of the Bath Beach Park and Coney Island Subway Association; William E. Cleary, President of the Citizens' Association of Bay Ridge and Fort Hamilton; Joseph B. Allee, Chairman of the Committee of Flatbush Avenue Extension of the Myrtle Avenue Board of Trade.

ARTS CLUB EXHIBITION.

Attractive Paintings, Sculptures, and Pastels by Men and Women.

The show of recent work by the artist members of the National Arts Club will close May 4, making room for an exhibition of sketches. Meantime the present showing has been so much admired that there can be little doubt that it will form one of the stated annual exhibitions of the club.

It was assembled and hung by the outgoing Art Committee, of which Mr. Chester Loomis was Chairman. This committee performed the somewhat delicate task of judging and installing the works of fellow-members with a good deal of tact, not to speak of the disagreeable necessity of rejecting some things which were not up to the standard and sending back others which could not be hung for lack of space. No complaints have been heard.

Pictures and statuary not mentioned in the first notice include many excellent works. The exhibit of Mrs. Alice Barnsy of Washington is particularly noteworthy. "Sunshine" is a fine study of figure and sunlight; "Circe," a half length of a wicked-looking girl with a pig; "Lucifer," a Frans-Halsian canvas with a somewhat feminine fallen angel. Mrs. Barney's heads of Bacchantes and of young girls are often sketches, but very powerful ones.

Mr. Chester Loomis has a pleasing "Beach at Tréport" and an excellent American landscape, "On a Green Mountain Golf Course," together with two portraits. Mr. J. William Fosdick sends one of his peculiar decorations, a female figure called "The Reader," carved as well as painted on wood. The surface is incised before painting and much gold is used in the background, so that brilliant mosaic effects are secured. Mr. Arthur I. Keller has a painting nearly in black and white, showing two women in conversation. "Persuasion" is remarkable for the beauty of line in the figures and the intensity of the two persons. "The Model" is a full-length of a girl in a fine costume charmingly painted. "Early Evening" and "Portrait Study" show further versatility.

Paintings by Miss Content Johnson show a broad, easy brushwork and uncommon feeling for color, especially "Habitant Mother," interior of a French Canadian home with the mother leaning over a cradle, light falling from the rear, and "An Old Garden in New France," full of rich gleaming flowers and patches of sunlight. Less successful because kept in too dark a key for the time of day and for outside light is "End of the Day's Work," a farmhouse, orchard, and oxen.

Sterling work is seen in the life-size seated portrait of Mr. William Scherer by Mrs. Jenny Delaney Rice, who is better known by her miniatures than by large paintings. "Little Lady Blue," by Mr. Lester Weller Mable, is the full-length portrait of a comely young woman pulling on a long glove. Exceptionally good landscapes are "Early Summer," "Winter," and "Late Afternoon," by Mr. Bolton Jones. Miss Eugenie M. Heller, Miss Maud Stumm, Mrs. Lealey Bush-Brown, Miss Laura Barrett, and Miss Mary Rogers send landscapes, figures, and portraits. Mr. Taber Sears shows his decorative sense and eye for color in "Fisher Girl" and "Houses in North Holland." Studies of peasants very attractively wrought by Mrs. Emma Lampert Cooper are "Woman Sweeping" and "After the Churning."

Among the statuary are a model for a statue to Edgar Allan Poe by George Julian Zolnay, and his "Kentucky Pioneer," representing a monument erected in Kentucky, also an extremely interesting male bust by Richard F. George, a lovely symbolical head with drooping eyelids, by Daniel C. French; a "Lotus Flower Fountain," by Miss Enid Yandell, a kneeling female figure with garland, by William Brewster, signifying Hospitality, and a bas-relief portrait of a Judge by John J. Boyle. Alfred L. Seligman shows heads of Lincoln and Beethoven, and Victor D. Brenner a number of his attractive medals.

This exhibition will cause an hour to pass with great enjoyment, owing to the effect of alert intelligence and individuality it imparts. Admission is by card from a member or by application to the Secretary; entrance through the Art Club Annex, 119 East Nineteenth Street.

HOW LITTLE FRITZ WENT TO THE ZOO

Denied Visit to the Animals by Mother, He and Three Others Go Anyway.

LEO, THE GOOD, WAS A DRAG

Seven-year-old Fritz Fink sat on his father's doorstep yesterday morning and viewed the Bronx with intense displeasure, the said doorstep being in 217th Street, near White Plains Road.

"Gee, but Wakefield is slow," said he, as an occasional trolley car jogged him out of his reverie.

For Fritz believed he had especial reason to consider it slow.

Here it was Saturday, and he hadn't seen the animals in Bronx Park. All through the week his mother had promised to take him to see the monkeys if he were good. And he had been good—that is, until half an hour ago. But why did his little sister have to have a curl just over her forehead, one that one couldn't resist pulling? It was too bad.

"You bad boy! No visits to the monkeys for you. You act too much like one as it is," his mother had said.

So Fritz sat on the doorstep and didn't want to play, although he knew the time was passing and Sunday school and then weekday school would be upon him before he knew it.

Of a sudden Fritz heard his mother calling him. He knew what she wanted. He had heard her say that morning that she was going to make banburys for his cousin, who was coming to-morrow, and she would probably forget to order something from the grocer. So when she called him Fritz didn't answer for a moment. He wouldn't go to any old grocer's when he couldn't go to the Zoo.

As she continued to call, the tone of her voice reminded Fritz of how he had felt when the visit to the animals was denied him. The boy's eyes filled with tears and in a sudden fit of rebellion he slipped off the doorstep and walked rapidly down Barnes Avenue. In front of the house where the "Buster Brown boys"—so called from their attire, in contradistinction to juvenile fashion in the rest of the neighborhood—dwelt, he stopped.

From the little house at Barnes Avenue and 216th Street two of the "busters" ran out—Alexander, who is 7, and Leo, 4.

"Gee, ain't this place dead?" began Fritz with preface.

"You bet it is, least that's what my father says when he wants to go downtown evenings and mamma won't let him," agreed Alexander Bloch.

"Leo thinks it's pretty nice," said Leo.

The two other boys looked at the four-year-old in deep scorn and in silence unbroken until Fritz had an idea.

"Won't we get lost?" Alexander asked.

Fritz Promises Protection.

"Naw," promised Fritz; "I'll take care of you. I've been most to Mount Hope myself."

The two started off, without thinking further of Leo until he set up a shrill howl.

Alexander ran quickly back to him.

"Now you shut up, will you?" he roared. "Mamma'll hear you."

Between his sobs Leo announced:

"I don't care. If you go I'll tell mamma. Mamma said for us not to go away."

Alexander was considering dire threats that might prove silencing, when Fritz tried his hand with the little boy.

"Don't you want to see the animals, Leo?"

"No," bawled the four-year-old.

"There's monkeys in cages that throw things at each other, and there's anakes and bears—"

"Is there a lion?" demanded Leo, "and does it roar like this."

He emitted a gentle roar.

"Sure," said Fritz, "and there is an elephant."

For answer Leo put his hand in his brother's and the trio set forth. On White Plains Road, while they were toiling up a long hill they met a German driving a wagon full of eggs.

German Gives Them a Ride.

The German said nothing.

"Hey, you!" he shouted, "if you don't give us a hitch, I'll smash your eggs."

On the way down William McCarthy from a house near by joined them. The trip to the Park was without event until after they had been through the monkey house and were viewing the lions. Of a sudden a lion roared long and continuously. His keeper was unable to silence him. Then it was that the sorely taxed conscience of Leo made itself both felt and heard, for his cry was only a little less insistent than that of the caged animal.

"Leo has been a bad boy," sobbed the little fellow, "and the lion wants to get Leo and eat him because he is bad."

The keeper turned to the little group whose members were threatening dire things for Leo. He was a very wise keeper, and he had been in the Zoo a very long time, and had seen other little boys. Also, he was kind to animals.

Carfare Nickels for Candy, of Course.

"Well, run away from home boys?" he asked. "Where do you live, Woodlawn?"

"Here's 5 cents apiece," said the keeper, "now run along and take the Mount Vernon car."

Four palms clutched and closed on four nickels, and in a few moments more their owners were trudging along.

"Are we going home?" asked Leo.

"Naw," said Fritz, leading the way into a little store. "We're going to spend the money."

And spend it they did. With pockets bulging with gum drops they traveled the two miles that lay between them and their home.

"Will the lion get me?" asked Leo.

When they were on the last stretch they heard Leo mutter:

"Lions won't bite you, 'cause they can't get on trolley cars."

Fritz's Luck with Him.

While the boys were walking wearily toward their homes, Joseph Bloch, the father of two of them, had been to the Wakefield Police Station and had sent out a general alarm for the German and the children. So when at last the little procession turned into the Bloch dooryard their parents were waiting for them. Alexander was spanked and Leo was put to bed.

But when Fritz arrived at his own doorstep there was still daylight. He had been seated but a moment when his mother appeared.

"Fritz," said she, "I want you to go to the grocer's and get the things on this paper. Run right along."

"Ain't my luck something fierce," said he. Then he cheered up and took a smarter pace:

"And, gee! I did see the animals," he added.

NITRATE MILL BLOWS UP.

HASKELL, N. J., April 27.—An explosion which could be heard for miles, the nitrate plant of the Du Pont Powder Works was blown up yesterday afternoon at 4:30 o'clock. Foreman Andrew Larson of Pompton Lake and Nicola Gurello, an Italian assistant, were blown to pieces. Nothing remains of the nitrate mill, and only a ten-foot hole in the ground, fifty feet square, marks its former location.

SAY 'CAPT.' WILLIAMS GOT THEIR $80,000

ALL PROFITS ON PAPER

The arrest in Philadelphia yesterday of "Captain" William Plumb Williams, who has been dodging detectives for two years, has resulted in disclosures which show that while the alleged army officer has been arrested on the simple charge of beating a hotel bill in this city, there are scores of people who want him to settle claims aggregating close to $80,000. They say they invested their money in various schemes on the recommendation of the "army" officer, and there never were any returns.

The claims against Williams, it was stated yesterday, come from all parts of New York, Massachusetts, and Pennsylvania. When Williams is arraigned in Philadelphia to-morrow morning a representative of the Wall Street Detective Agency will be on hand with a warrant calling for his arrest for passing worthless checks. Then when the local authorities take the case in hand the officials of the Lincoln Trust Company will go before the Grand Jury and swear that one of the wildcat concerns that Williams used in his schemes was known as the "Central Long Island Electric Light and Railroad Company," and that the name of the Lincoln Trust Company was used fraudulently as registrar to the extent of $100,000 for worthless bonds.

An issue of $50,000 of these bonds was made, and only an investigation will show how many of them have been marketed. The trust company further charges that Williams's wife was associated with him in his schemes. Mrs. M. A. Mackey of 281 Brook Avenue, the Bronx, is one of the known victims of "Captain" Williams, she having invested in bonds to the extent of $4,000.

Williams was enabled to transact his business through the circulation of a printed circular which stated that the capital of the "Central Long Island Electric Light & Railway Company" was $500,000 and that the first mortgage bonds at 5 per cent. were payable in gold and that they were subject to redemption and interest, on any interest day, on thirty days' notice. The Lincoln Trust Company was named as trustee. The circular further stated that the railroad was to run from Port Jefferson to Patchogue, L. I., and that among the officers and Directors of the company were Willard Young, President; the Hon. Edwin Bailey, Director of the Patchogue National Bank, Vice President; William H. Mackey of the Chase Granite Company, New York, Second Vice President; J. H. Williams of New York, Treasurer, and W. H. Jaycox of Patchogue, counsel.

After the Lincoln Trust Company ceased to act as trustee, Williams, according to officials of the Knickerbocker Trust Company, asked that company to act as trustee. He was told to send in a list of officers and Directors of the railroad and informed that the company would then take the proposition under consideration. That was the last the Knickerbocker Trust Company heard of "Captain" Williams. Williams also sent broadcast a prospectus of the "Manhattan-Long-Island Railroad," a scheme that never got beyond the paper stage. This prospectus stated that the road was to be built with funds derived from the sale of $6,510,000 of its preferred stock.

Some of the New York creditors of Williams are the New York Telephone Company, the Longacre Square Hotel, Hugh R. Garden, Montrose, Clarke & Emmons, the New England Engineering Company, the Café Beaux Arts, and many others. C. C. Cook is counsel for these creditors.

Speaking of Williams, Mr. Cook said yesterday that during the Spanish war Williams was the Captain of the army transport Chester. The claims against Williams he placed at anywhere from $60,000 to $80,000.

DEATH FIGHT IN THE STREET.

When Nellie Bruce, colored, of 245 West Sixty-first Street, quarreled with her sweetheart two weeks ago, and saw him leave her side for the companionship of Ollie Garner, a belle of the district on San Juan Hill, she told her friends that some time "she would have her revenge." Yesterday she watched her former cavalier chatting with her rival, and when he left the steps of the latter's home, at 238 West Sixty-second Street, Nellie felt that she could wait no longer.

"I'll be back," she said to Ollie, as she hurried to her own home. "And when I come there'll be somebody cut around here."

"Alabama," as the Garner woman is known on the hill, laughed, but nevertheless she provided herself with a strong knife, whose three-inch blade was sharp as a razor. The Bruce woman was renowned for her prowess with a pocket dirk, but yesterday she chose to arm herself with a bread knife, with an eleven-inch blade.

As she left the house she boasted to her friends, "If you follow me you'll see something doing," and an admiring and expectant throng accompanied her to Sixty-first Street. The Garner woman was still standing on the steps, and as her rival approached the other women ran, but she stood her ground. Straight up the steps went the Bruce woman, and the long-bladed knife flashed through the air.

The Garner girl stepped back. Then she leaned quickly forward and plunged her knife in the other's neck. The victim staggered backward, stumbled forward a few steps, and fell dead on the sidewalk. The police reserves were hurried from the West Sixty-eighth Street Police Station, and they dispersed the crowd of several hundred negroes who had gathered.

The Garner woman had fled to the roof, where she hid behind a chimney. When she learned that the police were already in the house she surrendered.

DIVORCE DECREE FOR MME. EAMES

Extraordinary Care Taken to Prevent the Testimony from Becoming Public.

SINGER MAY WED AGAIN

But the Defendant Is Forbidden to Remarry in His Wife's Lifetime—Papers Sealed by Court's Order.

Special to The New York Times.

WHITE PLAINS, N. Y., April 27.—An interlocutory decree of divorce has been granted by Supreme Court Justice Arthur S. Tompkins to Mme. Emma Eames, the opera singer, from her husband, Julian Story, the portrait painter, and it is now locked in the safe in the Westchester County Clerk's office at White Plains. The name of the corespondent named by the plaintiff will never be known unless the case is reopened at some future date. Extraordinary steps were taken to prevent the evidence from becoming public. Appel & Taylor, representing the plaintiff; Bowers & Sanda, counsel for the defendant, and the referee, Frank M. Buck, were all present when the papers were filed in the County Clerk's office, and they saw that everything except the interlocutory decree was sealed.

Justice Tompkins admitted to-day that he had signed the divorce decree. It was learned that the evidence was sensational in character. After signing the decree Justice Tompkins wrote on the papers: "The County Clerk is directed to seal all the papers in this action except the interlocutory judgment."

Under the judgment granted Mme. Eames must wait three months before a final decree can be granted and then she will be at liberty to marry again, as the decree says: "It is adjudged and decreed that it shall be lawful for the said Emma Story to marry again as though the said Julian Story were dead, but it shall not be lawful for the said Julian Story to marry until the said Emma Story shall be actually dead."

When the three months have expired, the plaintiff may make application to the Supreme Court for a final decree. From the time the referee was appointed all the proceedings have been conducted in secret. The testimony was taken behind closed doors and every means to prevent the facts about the action leaking out were taken. Mr. Story married Mme. Eames in Paris when he was a struggling young artist. His greatest work is said to be a miniature of his wife. The couple have two homes, one in Italy and the other near Paris.

DEPEW AT 73 DEFIES OLD AGE

PEOPLE RULE, HE DECLARES

Senator Chauncey M. Depew took his annual birthday dinner with the Montauk Club, in Brooklyn, last night. For the last seventeen years, with the single exception of last year, when he was too ill to make the journey to the borough across the river, Mr. Depew has observed this time-honored custom. He was only 56 when he first appeared as the guest of the club, but last night he came among his friends a man 73 years old.

But age does not worry Mr. Depew. In the characteristic after-dinner speech he took a careless fling at Oslerism and all such doctrines that would snuff out the life of a man long before he reached the allotted threescore and ten. His appearance justified it. Many who saw him when he made his first speech before the club fifteen years ago declared that they could see little change in his manner. To these he had the same sparkling spontaneity of wit that made him the most widely sought after-dinner speaker years ago.

There was a dispute at the dinner as to whether it was the fifteenth or seventeenth occasion on which the club had honored Senator Depew. In the programme it was announced as the sixteenth. In prepared copies of his speech Mr. Depew referred to it as the fifteenth, but when he spoke he declared it was the seventeenth. Mr. Woodruff, in introducing Mr. Depew, said it was the seventeenth. "Mr. Depew came to us first when he was 57 and he is now 73," Mr. Woodruff said. "It is seventeen years, because it is from fifty-seven to seventy-three inclusive. Mr. Depew and I have had a dispute about this, but we have settled in favor of the seventeenth."

Among the diners there went a persistent whisper all night that Mr. Depew's speech was to be the last that he would make in public. Responsibility for the rumor could not be fastened on any one person, but it was so persistent that it soon gained credence. This had the effect of heightening the interest taken in it. Many a man around the dining hall was seen to take notes on his menu as a memento of the occasion.

This also had something to do with the unusually large attendance. Politicians of all creeds, Supreme Court Justices, prominent lawyers and men of affairs in other fields came to do honor to Mr. Depew.

From a prominent position at the guest's table, where he could readily be seen from the remotest part of the long, narrow dining hall, Mr. Depew manifested the greatest interest in the festivities. Over his countenance spread one continual smile. Now and then he leaned toward President Woodruff and passed a joke with him. His joy was unbounded when one of the members of the club stood forth and sang "Our Chauncey" to the tune of "Bill Simmons." The chorus follows:

Chauncey let us tell you, when your birthdays come,
We can't keep still, got a thumpin' in our hearts,
Just like a double bass drum.
A-surging is the Montauk whoop
We're trying mighty hard for to keep back
Till we hear you holler
You've got to talk till your birthday's through.

President Woodruff introduced Mr. Depew. When Mr. Depew arose the Montauk whoop let loose. It is something between a cowboy's "wow" and a steam whistle. Mr. Depew received it with a smile, and then took a slap at Mr. Woodruff.

"I did not think we would have the President of the club with us to-night," said Mr. Depew. "When I read my papers last Sunday I learned that he had consented to act as a judge in a contest to decide the most beautiful woman in New York. I made up my mind then that it would be the last of him if he made that decision. I saw his decision. It was beautiful. I learned that a few days afterward Mrs. Woodruff returned from Europe. Then I knew our President was in safe keeping."

After some pleasantry regarding his age and the age of some of his older colleagues in the Senate, Senator Depew said he felt as young to-day as he did fifteen years ago, when at 58 he was the guest of honor at the first annual dinner given for him by the Montauk Club. Mr. Depew then spoke of the great popular indorsement of the concentration of power in the hands of executive authority. He said:

"We have a centralization of power and Executive authority beyond the dreams of Hamilton, and it is the popular will.

"The Rate bill passed by the last Congress was a tremendous advance in Federal authority, while anti-lottery laws, pure food laws, and other Federal acts, within what were presumed to be the health and police powers of the States, receive general approval, and in the appropriation of eighty millions of dollars at the last session for rivers and harbors —State rights men sharing in the benefits and forgetting the veto of one of their Presidents of a similar bill because of its unconstitutionality, and the failure of another to sign for the same reason, hailed with joyous acclaim the wise liberality of the Federal Government.

"But still more remarkable than centralization is the expansion of popular appreciation of the Executive Office. The Presidency has grown into proportions which overshadow the Congress and the courts. The people expect the President not only to deliver the messages contemplated by the Constitution, but to instruct their Representatives on all matters of interest. The formative or restraining hand of the Executive is on every detail and proposed amendment of leading measures. There are 90 Senators and 386 members of the House of Representatives, but apparently the people believe their functions are to ratify recommendations, and they resent independent Congressional suggestions which alter bills or opposition to their enactment.

"While this expansion of the Executive power is in harmony with the views and practice of one of the ablest, most independent, and resourceful of our Presidents, even his supreme genius for moulding public opinion could not have produced these results if the trend of the popular mind had not been in that direction. The people are supreme, and whatever happens is what they demand. The absorption of the time and mind of the citizen by the competitive intensity, higher standards, and increased cost of our economic life are rapidly relegating to some trusted leader the individual initiative which has been the characteristic of our political development, and the glorious mission of government by town meeting.

"A Public Utilities bill is presented to the Legislature for its approval. It confers powers never known before, and if adopted here will be followed in other States. Government ownership buys from the stock and bondholders their securities at a fair valuation, but under this measure every attribute of ownership is conferred on a commission controlled by the Governor, except responsibility for returns on the capital invested. It can order everything which the President and Directors can in expenditures and on motive power, signals, patent appliances, equipment, tracks and bridges, and the number and character of employes on the one hand, and regulate earnings on the other by control of rates for fares and freight, but without any accountability for results. This is in its effect upon property and employment the most far-reaching measure which any Legislature has ever had to consider, and yet the apparent popular tendency of the hour is to deny to either the Senate, with its fifty-one members, and the House, with 150, all recently elected by the people, the right to alter or amend the provisions of the proposed law in any essential feature, especially as to conferring upon the Senate the power of removal or upon the courts the right of review of the orders of the commission.

"What of the future? Can we count upon the indefinite continuance of our present high standard of Executive administration and responsibility which we have with Gov. Hughes? There has never been a corrupt Governor of the State of New York. But some of them in believing that all is fair in love and war, and that to the victor belong the spoils, have felt that they best served the Commonwealth by strengthening their party organization by patronage, favors, or fear.

"Over half a century upon the platform and in affairs has taught me one supreme lesson. It is that revolution and evolution, errors of legislation or crazes of the hour, crystallizing into policies, may check for the moment our development, but cannot stay our progress. The resistless spirit of American enterprise overcomes all obstacles. Sanity is our normal condition, and brain storms at rare intervals and for brief periods lift one foot from the ground, never both. With an archaic monetary system which produces periodical panics, raises the rate of interest on money to a hundred per cent. per annum, and prevents our occupying our natural position as the world's centre of finance, we have yet built a commercial empire and reaped the harvest of a productive energy beyond the experience of any nation and all periods.

"A cyclone in Wall Street a few weeks since dropped the market value of stocks and bonds a thousand millions of dollars, but no banks suspended, no mercantile houses failed, and no manufactories shut down. Railroad managers, because of the present difficulties in borrowing money at reasonable rates, cancelled contracts for the year, amounting to $450,000,000. This was nearly all for labor, and yet labor was never before so scarce or commanded such high wages.

HIGHER PAY FOR JUSTICES.

Movement Started to Advance Salaries from $17,500 to $25,000.

Following a speech made by Dean Ashley of the New York University Law School at a dinner at the Hotel Astor last week, a movement has been started to have the Board of Estimate advance the salaries paid to Supreme Court Justices from $17,500 a year to $25,000. The movement is based on the contention that it is impossible to keep good men on the bench when the corporations are able to offer inducements much more attractive than those held out by the municipality.

Three of the Justices now on the Supreme bench in this city are said to be contemplating retirement. They are Justices Leventritt, O'Gorman, and Scott, all of whom, it is said, have received offers from corporations. Justice Leventritt is not expected to remain on the bench after Aug. 1, and it is said that he may become connected with the law firm of Guggenheimer, Untermyer & Marshall. Justice O'Gorman is said to be seriously considering an offer entailing $35,000 a year, just double his present salary, and Justice Scott is also reported to be considering an offer of similar character.

APPLETON DEFENDS THE 7TH.

The Regiment Would Burn the Armories, If Ordered To, He Says.

The Seventh Regiment Veterans' Association held its annual reunion and dinner last night at the Hotel Astor. More than 300 of the famous regiment's former officers and privates attended.

With Col. Thomas Diamond, President of the Veteran Association, who presided, was Col. Daniel Appleton, the present regimental commander, who responded to the toast, "The Seventh." Justice Francis M. Scott, the Rev. L. W. Battin, Col. William P. Room, and Capt. J. Weston Meyers also spoke.

Col. Appleton said that much criticism had been heaped upon the regiment, but he said that time always showed it to be in the right. The regiment would obey orders, he said, even if it got a command to burn the armories.

A message was received from Admiral Coghlan that he was not in good health and unable to attend.

MUST FIND UNKNOWN TO TRY POLICEMAN

NO CASE UNLESS FOUND

Jerome Now Hunting for the Man, but He Seems to Have Disappeared —A Queer Case.

What is to be done with Policeman Henry A. Mehl of the Elizabeth Street Station, who was arrested on Friday, after the Special April Grand Jury had found an indictment against him for assaulting "an unknown citizen," is the question which puzzled many old-timers around the District Attorney's office yesterday. For a strange circumstance has suddenly loomed up in the policeman's case. Although the District Attorney's office can produce the assailant, it appears to be impossible to discover the identity of the man assaulted, and without him Mehl cannot be tried.

As was told in THE TIMES yesterday, the indictment against Mehl was found at the request of a member of the Special Grand Jury. This man, it was learned yesterday, is Henry Evans, President of the Continental Life Insurance Company, of 44 Cedar Street. According to the story, Mr. Evans, in company with Charles L. Vandewater, a lawyer, at 16 Exchange Place, was on his way to a meeting of the Grand Jury when he witnessed the assault of a policeman upon a citizen.

This was on April 2. The policeman and the man whom he was clubbing were on Duane Street, near the Edison Company's building, and Mr. Evans obtained the policeman's number. Perhaps because of the excitement at the time, Mr. Evans apparently forgot to learn the name of the man who was clubbed, but armed with the policeman's number he readily obtained his name, and on the last day of the Grand Jury term asked for the indictment.

The resources of the District Attorney's office were called on yesterday to locate the victim of the assault, and it was learned that on April 2 Mehl had arrested a man named Tony Ponce of 235 Elizabeth Street. The blotter in the Elizabeth Street Station showed that this was the only arrest made by Mehl on that day.

Ponce, with a number of his countrymen, had gathered on the street near the Edison Company's building, it is said, in response to an advertisement for help published by the company. Many complaints were received at Police Headquarters concerning this gathering in the street, and Mehl, it is said, attempted to disperse the crowd. A fight resulted, and Ponce was arrested.

The records of the Tombs Court show that Ponce was arraigned before Magistrate Wahle on a charge of disorderly conduct and fined $2. Subpoena servers were sent out after him by the District Attorney yesterday, but at nightfall they had not found the man. If he is found Ponce will be directed to appear before the District Attorney on Monday, and he will then be asked whether he was the man whom Mehl is charged with assaulting. It is by no means certain that he is the man, however, and if he shall prove not to be it will be almost impossible for the District Attorney's office to find the real victim.

Mehl, who was arrested on Friday night station, and who was later transferred from a cell in the station to the Tombs, was taken before Assistant District Attorney Miner yesterday. His bail was fixed at $1,000, and this was provided late in the afternoon by Daniel Valenti, who offered real estate security. Mehl, who is single, lives at 35 Columbia Street, Brooklyn. He has been on the force about four months, and, according to Capt. Dooley, in whose precinct he has been stationed, is an efficient policeman.

KINDERGARTEN CONVENTION.

1,000 Delegates to Attend Four Days' Session Here This Week.

The fourteenth annual convention of the International Kindergarten Union, which opens in New York on Tuesday, is expected to bring together over 1,000 delegates from all parts of the United States and Canada and also from European countries. The union is to be the guest of Teachers' College of Columbia University and of the public and private kindergartens of the city.

After a closed conference Tuesday afternoon of representatives of schools for the training of kindergarten teachers the first public meeting will be held at Teachers' College, at which there will be addresses on the relation of the kindergarten and primary school. Better adjustment between kindergarten and school is still possible, and New York teachers will be interested to know what wisdom the kindergartners have now to offer.

For Wednesday afternoon, at the De Witt Clinton High School, the topics will treat of the work and thought of Frederick Froebel, who founded the kindergarten. The speakers at this meeting will include Miss Susan E. Blow and Mrs. Maria Kraus-Boelté, who opened the first Froebelian kindergarten in New York City in 1872.

On Wednesday night, at Carnegie Hall, a public meeting will be held. It will be addressed by Hamilton Wright Mabie and by President Taylor of Vassar College. On Thursday afternoon, at the Wadleigh High School, several speakers are to discuss the relation of the kindergarten and the home, and at the same time another meeting will be held at the American Museum of Natural History to consider the exhibit arranged there to illustrate the history of the kindergarten and the results accomplished.

The last public meeting will be on Friday afternoon, at the De Witt Clinton High School, at which addresses are to be made by Dean Gill of Barnard College and by Chancellor MacCracken of New York University.

During convention week there will be a number of receptions and luncheons for the delegates.

PLEA FOR READER'S RELEASE.

Judge Chatfield to Decide To-morrow on Perjury Charge Dismissal.

Judge Chatfield, in the Criminal Branch of the United States Circuit Court, yesterday heard arguments of counsel on a motion to dismiss the indictment for perjury in the case of Athole B. Reader, the husband of Ella Rawls Reader. The jury was not in court, having been excused on Friday until Monday morning. The accused and his wife were attentive listeners to the arguments.

The contention of the defense was that the evidence submitted by the Government did not make out legally the crime of perjury. Lawyer Francis L. Wellman, the general counsel for J. B. Haggin, and representing the Government as a special assistant in the prosecution of Reader, opposed the motion.

Judge Chatfield took the motion under advisement, and said that he would pass upon it on Monday morning, before the defense opened its case, "providing he then decided to permit the case to go to the jury."

Miller for a dissolution of the partnership and a division of the assets on account of a disagreement between them. They have been in business twenty years. The assets are $9,000 and the liabilities $2,500.

HUGHES SAYS A WORD FOR THE FARMERS

Tells Cornell Men Good Roads Will Promote Agricultural Interests.

STATE COLLEGE DEDICATED

Commonwealth's Efforts In Regard to Farm Labor Has Facilitated the Sale of Abandoned Farms.

ITHACA, April 27.—The new buildings of the New York State College of Agriculture were dedicated this morning. President Schurman introduced Gov. Hughes, who said, in part:

"There are many engrossed in the great industrial activities of the State who fail to realize the importance of its agricultural interests. According to the last census, New York led the States in the value of its dairy products, of its hay crop, of its vegetables, of its flowers and plants, and of its apple crop, while in the value of its fruit and orchard products it was second only to California. The value of its farm property is exceeded only in the case of three States. The State has no more important duty than to husband its agricultural interests.

"Much has been done in recent years to improve the condition of the farmer. The rural free delivery has brought him into closer contact with his fellow-citizens, and with the forces which make for progress in the State.

"The improvement of the roads of the State will greatly facilitate his access to markets. While he has the advantages of these external improvements, he has the opportunity of forming part of the important and efficient organization of the State grange for the protection and advancement of his interests. The State Department of Agriculture has a most important function, and among its other activities is now addressing itself to the very serious problem of farm labor. Its efforts have also facilitated the sale of abandoned farms.

"But much remains to be accomplished. In the press of the questions incident to congestion of population in our great cities we must not forget the demands of rural communities, and must not fail to take advantage of opportunity to promote the welfare of that important portion of our population, which, although not urban, has its own serious social and economic problems.

"To your administration the State has committed one of the most important interests of the people, represented in the establishment of this school. It is not a school to be administered for the benefit of Cornell University, but it is a school to be administered by Cornell University for the benefit of the people.

"President Schurman: On behalf of the State of New York, it is now my privilege and my agreeable duty to commit through you to Cornell University the custody and control of these buildings and property, constructed and set apart by the State for the New York State College of Agriculture, and through you to commit to Cornell University the administration of this college for the benefit of the people of the State."

At the end of his speech, Gov. Hughes handed over a golden key, symbolical of the Trusteeship of Cornell University.

Forty-six of Them : : Average $63 Value.

TAILORED DRESSES MADE UP AS SAMPLES by one of the chief wholesale makers in Manhattan. No two alike, of course, and a great variation of their value. But even the poorest of them is worth to-day almost twice the price it is marked, and 46 women lucky enough to share the offering will get perhaps the greatest values of the whole season.

The Dresses are of voiles, silk pongees and fancy striped mixtures. Mostly the jaunty, short Eton effects with rich braid trimming or combinations of colored silks. Some are beautifully embroidered, and the voiles are silk lined throughout.

IN ADDITION there are a number of strictly tailored Suits made of short lengths of imported fabrics in light-weight mixtures and at $25 very much under their value. Coat has semi-fitted back and box front and lining of peau de cygne or other silk. Full plaited skirts.

$25 to $50 Dresses and Suits, $14.98

Straight reductions in prices in our own stock because these are ones and twos remaining of certain styles and we want them to go speedily. They are made of mannish mixtures, fancy cheviots, plaids and a few silks. Short and medium coats in cutaway and fly front styles. Waists of the Dresses are lace trimmed. Skirts are mostly plaited.

The Greatest Offer of the Spring.

FRESH, HANDSOME, IMPORTED SUITING FABRICS, absolutely all wool and of the fine quality, the light-weight and the cheerful attractive, patterns most in demand at regular prices.

It is the character of the fabrics that makes this offering so remarkable. Nothing more attractive could be found in any store to-day—even for full price. The chance comes to us only because the importer sailed for Europe last week, and before he went gave us choice from his stock on hand at a sacrifice.

There are shepherd and suiting checks for street and travelling wear. There are white grounds with fine stripes of pretty colors, specially good for tennis, golf or yachting costumes. Every yard was made for this season, and until this offering none have been sold under $1.25 a yard. Now.....59c. a yard.

Second Floor, Elm Place.

THE MOST REMARKABLE OFFERING of Overcoats ever made in April, we believe—a chance for some men to buy smart Spring Coats at EXACTLY HALF PRICE.

There are black and Oxford silk lined Chesterfields, fancy gray effects in form-fitting Coats serge and silk lined, Covert Top Coats and Covert Paddocks.

Every Coat is out of our regular stock and the reductions are made only because there are not all sizes in any one style —in fact, in some styles there are but one or two Coats.

Early comers will find in the lot, however, all sizes from 32 to 42 chest measure. And those who get their size will get a very real bargain.

Main Floor, Elm Place. None C. O. D. or on Approval.

KNOCKED SENSELESS CHASING FAST AUTO

BRICKS THROWN, PERHAPS

Bicycle Policeman Gibney of the West 152d Street Station, riding slowly down Fort Washington Avenue on the look-out for speeding automobiles at 5:30 o'clock yesterday afternoon, saw the form of a fellow policeman lying in the road at 161st Street, his broken bicycle beside him. As he leaned over the unconscious man, Gibney saw that it was Policeman Donnelly, who has gained a name for himself by his many arrests of automobilists, and who is known to them as "the Terror of Fort Washington Avenue."

When he had regained consciousness, Donnelly's first remark was:

"Did you pick up those bricks?"

Then to the physicians, who thought him out of his head, the policeman explained that he had been thrown from his wheel by riding over three bricks.

"And I am morally certain," he added, "that they were purposely thrown from the tonneau of an automobile that I was pursuing, for the express purpose of throwing me from my wheel."

Then Donnelly explained that he had been at 155th Street when he observed a car with a red body approaching him at high speed. A man was driving, and in the tonneau were three young women. Donnelly timed the car as it neared him, and estimating that it was moving at thirty miles an hour, he sprang to his bicycle and started in pursuit.

The women in the car were excited at the chase, said Donnelly, and they urged the chauffeur to greater speed. Nevertheless the policeman gained upon the car until he was almost within a dozen feet of it. Then the policeman's wheel struck the bricks.

Donnelly admitted that he had not seen the bricks thrown from the car, but explained his startling accusation by declaring that he had been over the very stretch of road where the accident occurred only a few moments before. The bricks had not been there then, nor to his knowledge had a single vehicle passed over the road until the automobile went flying by him.

The three bricks, which were new, were found lying in the roadway. They were gathered up and taken to the police station to be used as evidence, should the opportunity ever arise. Donnelly, after having his arm set and his cuts and bruises dressed, refused to remain in the hospital, and was carried to his home. He will be absent from duty for weeks probably on sick leave.

After hearing Donnelly's story Policeman Gibney set out on a hunt for the red auto. It had passed him, he said, at 180th Street as he rode down the avenue before coming upon Donnelly. At that time, however, it had been traveling at ordinary speed, and he had not thought to take the number of the car. He failed to come upon it again when he searched for it.

BROKE JAIL BUT CAME BACK.

"Stone walls do not a prison make, nor iron bars a cage," sang a second-story burglar as he sauntered out of his lockless cell in the Queens County Jail, wrenched off a few iron bars in front of the jail window, and, leaping lightly to the ground, went out to the Jamaica races to play a sure thing. He got back in time for dinner at night, however. In order to keep his prisoners from straying away, Sheriff Herbert S. Harvey is compelled to give them pie with each meal and furnish the more fastidious with cigars. But, despite all this kindly treatment, there are frequent cases of rank ingratitude among those who partake of the Sheriff's bounty.

Last Fall ten prisoners in one batch decamped, and that after they had been given a gorgeous Thanksgiving supper. Ever and anon when the roll is called other boarders are found among the missing, and filled with indignation, the Queens County Grand Jury, which has been in session for several weeks, yesterday handed to Judge Burt J. Humphrey in the Queens County court in Long Island City a presentment, calling for better and stronger jail accommodations in that borough. Among other things in connection with the jail the Grand Jury sets forth:

"The number of escapes have made the Queens County Jail a subject for ridicule and contempt among criminals who have been confined therein and among the residents of this county, who have a right to demand and expect that a safe and suitable jail shall be maintained, in which criminals can be securely confined. We find that the locks on the cells are wholly useless and out of repair, and that the bars and screens on the windows are rotten from rust, and insecure." Continuing, they want a wall fifteen feet high built around the jail in place of the present rickety board fence, and they also find that in view of the number of prisoners in the jail and the insecure condition of that institution, that there are not half enough keepers to take care of the institution and its inmates. In conclusion they call the attention of the officials of the city to this dangerous condition of affairs, and even recommend that the succeeding Grand Jury continue the investigation.

BLINDNESS CAUSED WILLCOX SUICIDE

Ex-Railroad Chief Had Lost One Eye and the Other One Was Failing.

WAS CHEERFUL ON SHIP

Steward Discovered Former Delaware & Hudson President's Body When He Went to Call Him.

Ill-health and worry incident to the prospect of losing his eyesight were the reasons generally accepted yesterday for the suicide at sea last Wednesday of David Willcox, ex-President of the Delaware & Hudson Company. Mr. Willcox had lost the sight of one eye and the other was failing. It was evident months ago that Mr. Willcox dreaded becoming blind, and as the best specialists in this city were unable to help him, he became despondent. When the North German Lloyd liner Barbarossa, in a promenade deck stateroom of which vessel Mr. Willcox shot himself on Wednesday night, reached her pier in Hoboken yesterday morning, the officers were just as reluctant as on Friday night, when the vessel arrived in Quarantine, to discuss the tragedy on the liner.

At the pier when the Barbarossa docked were two men and an elderly woman who had gone there to take charge of Mr. Willcox's body. One of the men, it was said, was William G. Willcox, a relative of the dead man. None of the three would talk with reporters, and all left the pier together after holding a long conference with Capt. Langreuter, commander of the Barbarossa, who it is supposed gave them what details he had concerning Mr. Willcox's suicide.

At the home of William G. Willcox, on Staten Island, near New Brighton, Mrs. Willcox said that all the family knew of the suicide was what had been told them by the Health Officers at Quarantine and the officers of the Barbarossa. She knew of no reason why Mr. Willcox should have ended his life as he did. The funeral, she said, would be held from Mr. Willcox's late New York home, at 19 East Sixty-eighth Street, to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Killed Himself on Wednesday.

From what those officers of the Barbarossa who could be induced to talk said yesterday, Mr. Willcox is supposed to have taken his life between 11 o'clock and midnight last Wednesday, for when his body was found the following morning by Hugo Schaeffer, one of the stewards, Mr. Willcox had apparently been dead many hours. It was about 11 o'clock, they said, when Mr. Willcox, who had been chatting pleasantly all evening with a number of his friends on the ship, left them to retire for the night.

At 8 o'clock the following morning the bedroom steward, as was his custom, went to Mr. Willcox's stateroom to awaken him for breakfast. When Mr. Willcox did not respond to his knock on the door the steward concluded that he did not care to get up so early, and proceeded to attend to his other duties. At 11 o'clock, when the steward noted that Mr. Willcox had not appeared on deck or in any of the ship apartments where the passengers congregate, he went back to the stateroom to awaken him.

When after repeated and vigorous knockings on the stateroom door he failed to get any response, the steward called Hugo Schaeffer, the chief steward, and told him that he was afraid that something was wrong. Schaeffer then tried to get an answer from within by knocking on the door, and, failing, he decided to break in the door.

This was done. The stewards found Mr. Willcox lying on the bed partly undressed, his head propped up with a pillow, while in his right hand was tightly grasped a 32-calibre revolver. There was a bullet wound in the dead man's head and an empty chamber in the cylinder of the pistol.

Capt. Langreuter was promptly notified, as was also Dr. Colarno, the physician who represents on board the Barbarossa the Immigration Department of the Italian Government. Dr. Colarno examined the body, and announced that Mr. Willcox had been dead many hours. By order of Capt. Langreuter the body was then removed to a mortuary chamber on the Barbarossa, and the news of the tragedy was kept as much as possible from everybody except a few of the friends of Mr. Willcox. Those of the passengers who had not known him very well, but who nevertheless found out that he was dead, were led to believe that he died of heart disease.

When the Barbarossa arrived in Quarantine and Dr. Doty, the port Health Officer, sent some of his staff physicians to the ship to ascertain the cause of Mr. Willcox's death, most of the passengers learned for the first time that a tragedy had marked the final days of what had otherwise been a very pleasant voyage. In explaining his action in not making known the real cause of Mr. Willcox's death to the passengers, the commander of the Barbarossa said that the liner had just come out of a storm at the time and that he did not care to cause the passengers any additional excitement by informing them of the nature of Mr. Willcox's death.

On Wednesday, according to several of the Barbarossa's officers, Mr. Willcox gave to one of the stewards a sealed package, with instructions to mail it as soon as the liner arrived in Quarantine. Whether this was done or the letter turned over to the health authorities by Capt. Langreuter could not be ascertained. That the steward had any reason to suspect that Mr. Willcox was in great mental trouble when he gave him the package to mail was denied by those who were familiar with the incident.

Mr. Willcox, those of the passengers who were much in his company said, was apparently very cheerful. Among his particular friends on board were Mr. and Mrs. R. G. Shaw of Boston and G. V. Lyon of Oswego. Mr. Willcox, it was said, played bridge whist with Mr. and Mrs. Shaw and Mr. Lyon on Tuesday night, and apparently enjoyed the game as much as any of them. Wednesday he was with this party on several occasions, and when he bade them good night Wednesday his actions indicated that the last thing in the world that he contemplated was suicide.

In Wall Street, and in railroad circles generally, where Mr. Willcox was so well known, his friends ascribed his suicide to worry and nervousness incident to his broken health, and also to the fact that he no longer held the important place he once did as the principal spokesman for the anthracite railroad interests. He had no financial difficulties, those who knew Mr. Willcox said, that could have caused him to end his life as he did.

FIFTY FALL WITH BIG PIER.

Six Known Dead and 15 Injured—16 Unaccounted For.

BALTIMORE, April 27.—A section of the new pier being erected at the immigration station at Locust Point, South Baltimore, for the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad, for the use of the North German Lloyd Steamship Company, collapsed today, carrying down upward of fifty men, of whom six are known to be dead and fifteen injured. Sixteen in all are unaccounted for. Among the injured is W. N. Edson, General Superintendent of the Baltimore Bridge Company, which had charge of the steel construction.

Howard L. Ellender, of Baltimore, a civil engineer, was one of the dead. He lost his life trying to save the men on the outer end of the pier. Superintendent Edson, who was injured in the performance of the same service, was not seriously hurt. All the victims were employes of the bridge company.

The pier was a two-story building, 1,000 feet long, and its estimated cost was $400,000. About 480 feet of it sank. Several days ago the piles toward the end of the pier began settling and vigorous efforts were being made to save the structure.

To-day, shortly before the accident, the piles began settling in such an alarming manner that orders to leave the place were circulated among the fifty odd workmen, and it is due to this fact that the casualties were not greater. Those caught were on the end of the pier or on the roof.

The falling of the pier created a tremendous wave throughout the harbor and led many persons to believe there had been an earthquake. At Spedden's shipyard, directly across the harbor from Locust Point, the water suddenly dropped eight feet, throwing two men overboard from a marine railway. They were rescued with difficulty.

PUTTY, SOAP, WOOD FOR WARSHIP RIVETS

Representative Waldo Says Private Builders Practice Some Serious Frauds.

UPHELD AT THE NAVY YARD

BOSTON, April 27.—Charges of gross frauds in the building of warships by private contractors were made here last night by Representative George W. Waldo of New York. He spoke at a mass meeting given in Faneuil Hall by the National League of Employes of Navy Yards.

"Warships built under contract by private concerns and almost immediately after their completion sent to the Brooklyn Navy Yard for repairs," he said, "have been found to have rivet holes plugged with wood, putty, and soap, instead of iron rivets being inserted. In one instance I know of several hundred rivets supposed to have been put into a warship built by contractors, whose workmen filled the rivet holes with putty and wood.

Representative George W. Waldo, at his home in Brooklyn last night, repeated the charges that faulty work had been discovered in the construction of certain warships built by private concerns. Mr. Waldo, who is making a fight to have naval vessels built in the Government yards, said that he knew of several ships turned over as complete to the navy, which had to have considerable costly work done on them to fit them for service. The battleship Louisiana, sister ship of the Government-built Connecticut, was one of the vessels delivered as completed which was not in shape for service, Mr. Waldo said.

"When this vessel was delivered by the contractors she was said by them to be complete," said he. "Inspection of her at the Brooklyn Navy Yard, however, showed that many repairs were needed. The sum of $31,000 was asked, and the Government employes worked for six weeks on the ship before she was in proper shape."

Officials at the Brooklyn Navy Yard declined yesterday to express their opinions of the statements of Congressman Waldo, either in affirmation or denial. They were ready, however, to discuss such cases as have already been made public, and it was pointed out that the Louisiana, built by private contractors, offered perhaps the best example of such construction as Mr. Waldo referred to.

While private enterprise was building the Louisiana the navy yard force was engaged in constructing her sister ship, the Connecticut. Although the Louisiana was delivered at the yards some months before the Connecticut was ready for the water, it was found that she was not complete, and it required some months of work by the men at the navy yard before the ship could be called finished. At the time of her delivery by her constructors not a gun was mounted, the turrets would not work, and there were many other details of construction which had not been completed.

Similar instances are offered by the Washington and the Tennessee, both of which needed several months of additional labor by naval men after their delivery at the yards, presumably prepared for service. Both ships were built by private contractors.

HUMAN LIONS TALK TO SCHOOL TEACHERS

MAXWELL FOR SOCIALISM

The Principals' Club held its fourth annual luncheon at Delmonico's yesterday. The club is a society of the Principals of the elementary schools of this city. About 98 per cent. of the members are women, but a daring man is the President. He is William O'Flaherty.

Mr. O'Flaherty explained the purpose of the club yesterday. "First," he said, "the club is not concerned with the material side of our life." Which means that it dodges such issues as equal pay for equal work, suits to recover arrears in salary, and similar matters. "Next," continued Mr. O'Flaherty, "it is the tail to no kite. It has no axes to grind. It is engaged in no propaganda. It is interested in the higher pedagogical ideals."

There was a remarkable attraction at the luncheon. A menagerie, "just a menagerie, not even a beautiful menagerie," was the way President McGowan of the Board of Aldermen classified it. Mr. McGowan was very popular with the women teachers when he was a School Commissioner, and he is invited to all their functions to speak.

The menagerie consisted of a long table, extending along the back wall of the dining hall, behind which sat the "animals." In front of the table sat the diners at round tables, smiling at the "animals." All the animals were classified as lions by President O'Flaherty. They were Supt. William H. Maxwell, Norman Hapgood, Herman Ridder, Patrick F. McGowan, President of the Aldermen; Charities Commissioner Robert W. Hebbard, Dr. John Cronin of the Health Department, and Dr. James J. Walsh.

"The main purpose of this club is lion hunting," said President O'Flaherty after the refreshments. "We go out into the highways and hunt lions literary, lions scientific, lions journalistic, and lions other things. Then we induce them to come and speak to us. I hope the lions will not grow restive under their captivity this afternoon. I am sure they will roar to you as tenderly as sucking doves. Dr. Walsh, the genial, will emit the first roar."

Dr. Walsh stood up bashfully. "I am not a lion," he protested, almost tearfully. "I am rather the suckling dove of this concern." Then he proceeded to coo about "Unconscious Elements in Education." He raised an objection to the dangers of reading, particularly the reading of frivolous novels and of newspapers. Incidentally, he slapped the newspaper reports of the Thaw trial. "Lately we have been learning a lot of morbid psychology through the newspapers that we could well be without," he said. Then he said that sensational papers could be put out of business if the person who objected to sensationalism refused to read those papers.

President O'Flaherty called for another roar, and Dr. Cronin stood forth. Dr. Cronin has done most of the work in curing physically defective children in the schools, such as those affected with adenoid growths. He roared about the necessity of curing physical defects and then retired to his corner in the menagerie.

Herman Ridder criticised the board for its hostile attitude on the teaching of German in the schools. "We know that the day is not coming when German will die out in America," said Mr. Ridder. "I believe every educated man and woman should speak two languages, even though the School Board is wholly against me." Mr. Ridder also made an announcement about starting an afternoon newpaper in English, the details of which are given elsewhere.

Commissioner Hebbard then roared against the proposition of furnishing free eyeglasses to pupils with defective vision. Dr. Maxwell, father of the proposition, glared. Mr. Hebbard said it would be "Socialism." Dr. Maxwell made a mental note, which he used later.

Mr. McGowan refused to roar. "I'm a Tammany tiger," he said, when he was called upon. So he made a noise like a tiger, and then paid the teachers a compliment. "Let me tell you what the teachers have to contend with in the schools," he said. "The bad they have to eliminate from the pupils requires greater efforts than teaching the 3 R's."

Dr. Maxwell showed his teeth. The opponents of the eyeglass proposition were the objects of his wrath. "They call it paternalism," he roared. "They call it Socialism! Well, then, I say if it is paternalism, if it is Socialism, give me Socialism. The character of the public schools is Socialistic, pure and simple. It is the people doing in co-operation what the individual cannot."

Dr. Maxwell then said that he had received statistics which showed that since Sept. 1 5,500 pupils with defective vision had been discovered in 100 schools, and of these 31 per cent. had been attended to. Then he told of a poor woman who was sent by a Principal to a hospital which had offered to furnish free eyeglasses for pupils with defective vision. The woman's child was in a bad condition. The woman wrote a letter to the Principal telling her about her experience at the hospital. She spent 20 cents for carfare, was required to give a registration fee of 25 cents at the hospital before the physicians would examine her child, was required to pay 20 cents for drops put into her child's eyes, and then was asked $2.50 for eyeglasses for the child.

PROBING INSURANCE ELECTION

George R. Scrugham, Chairman of the International Policy Holders' Association, had a long talk with Acting District Attorney Smyth yesterday morning in connection with the investigation that Assistant District Attorney Howe is making into the conduct of the election of Directors at the Fall session of the New York Life Insurance Company.

Mr. Howe has been investigating the charges by the committee that the agents of the company committed forgery in signing the names of policy holders to administration tickets without the sanction or permission of the policy holders.

Mr. Scrugham said that he presented to Mr. Smyth and Mr. Howe affidavits from policy holders living in this city, showing alleged forgeries by agents of both the Mutual and the New York Life Insurance Company in soliciting votes for the "administration" tickets of these companies.

BRITISH CONSUL QUITS.

After thirteen years' service as the representative of his Government in this city, Sir Percy Sanderson, the retiring British Consul General, sailed for Liverpool yesterday aboard the Cunarder Etruria. The vessel sailed at 6 o'clock in the morning, and most of her passengers went aboard on Friday night.

"I am sorry to leave New York," said Sir Percy, "and I am coming back to see my many friends again. Since I have been Consul General I have seen some startling changes in this city. I have watched it grow as has no other city in the world. New York has been to me a home, and I am overcome with sorrow at leaving it."

Another passenger sailing was Sir Henry Seymour King, head of the London banking firm of H. S. King & Co. Sir Henry came to this side on the Etruria. He is traveling incog.

ONION AND POTATO TRUST.

Bermuda Shippers Combine to Regulate Sales—Two Men in Control.

The Bermuda Island onion and potato shippers have formed a combination by which all of their products are concentrated and placed in the hands of two men, C. A. V. Frith and J. P. Hand, both of Hamilton, Bermuda. These men have just arrived in New York, and will make this their headquarters for the remainder of the season.

The Bermuda shippers claim that their interests were not being properly guarded by the New York commission merchants, owing to the fact that there were too many receivers here who in competing to make sales made lower prices than the markets justified. The two sales agents now here have a power of attorney from the Bermuda shippers' organization authorizing them to take charge of all stock on its arrival here.

It is the plan of these agents to sell only to a few firms, only six in New York City, and to fix the prices to be charged for their stock. They will also regulate the supply, bringing approximately 40,000 crates of onions here per week. One of the prime causes of the discontent of the Bermuda shippers, according to authorities here, is the fact that Texas has begun growing Bermuda onions which are superior to those grown on the island, and, having no duty to pay, that State can place its onions here at a lower figure than Bermuda producers. It is estimated that Texas will ship about 1,000 cars of Texas Bermuda onions to this market in the season of slightly over two months. The Bermuda onion and potato trust, as it is styled, will have little effect upon the potato situation this season, as the crop was very light and the bulk of it has already been moved.

THEIR BILL PASSED, TEACHERS STILL ROW

MEET TO TELL ABOUT IT

But Teachers from Higher Grades Who Are Satisfied Descend Upon Them and Disperse the Gathering.

The women teachers who are demanding "equal pay for equal work" are fighting among themselves. The teachers of the higher grades are thoroughly satisfied with the White bill, which has passed both houses of the Legislature and is to give them "equal pay for equal work," and they want it signed by the Governor and approved by the Mayor as soon as possible. But the teachers in the primary grades are not so sure that the bill cares for their interests, and want it altered or killed.

The trouble came to a head in the Normal College yesterday. The Interborough Association of Women Teachers, which has mothered the bill, held a meeting in the chapel on the third floor, and the Protective Association of Teachers Below Grade 4 B, which is looking after the interests of the teachers in the primary grades, met on a floor below. The members of the former association quitted their meeting and went below to stampede the other meeting. They succeeded in breaking up the meeting and then tried to hold one of their own, in which they were unsuccessful.

District Superintendent Strachan, who has engineered the campaign of the Interborough Association, tried to persuade the primary teachers that their interests were being looked after. She said that there would be an increase in their pay.

"Are you sure that we will get the increase?" inquired a primary grade teacher.

"We are sure of nothing," replied Miss Strachan, "but it will be up to the Board of Education to make the schedules effective. It has the power, and it is our duty to see that they are adopted."

About this time a scout of the association entered and announced that the primary teachers were busy down stairs. Miss Strachan said she considered it her duty to attend the rival meeting, and suggested that all present should do likewise. Immediately there was a rustle of skirts, a patter of feet, and cries of indignation on the stairway. Then Miss Strachan and President N. Curtis Lenihan of the Interborough Association broke into the primary grade teachers' meeting at the head of their followers.

When they entered Commissioner Stern of the Board of Education, who has persistently opposed the bill, was speaking. Immediately there was a loud uproar. Mr. Stern finished his speech, shouting it at the top of his voice against the tumult.

Commissioner Freifeld of the Board of Education was then introduced. He was received with shouts of derision. But he faced the storm and managed to taunt those who were causing it.

"There has been a great deal of wire-pulling on the part of the teachers of the higher grades to get the bill passed," yelled Mr. Freifeld.

Then the two factions nearly came to a fight.

"Under this bill it is impossible to work it out so that justice can be done to the primary teachers by the Board of Education," shouted Mr. Freifeld, taking his seat.

The meeting then broke up in disorder. Miss Strachan and her associates tried to speak, but the teachers deserted them. Before the entrance of the Interborough warriors, Mr. Stern had addressed the primary teachers with difficulty. When he was introduced he was greeted with hisses and jeers.

Between the members of the school's teaching staff," Mr. Stern said in a lull in the tumult, "or to criticise the action of the Interborough Association. I came here simply to explain and ask that there shall be no ill-feeling between the teachers of the different grades. There should be harmony in our school system. In your eagerness to look out for yourselves don't forget the children.

"When I went to Albany to oppose the White bill, I made no harsh criticism of those who favored it. As a member of the Board of Education, I want to see justice done. The Board of Education ought to treat all teachers alike, and as long as I have a voice in the board, I will proclaim that doctrine with all the force and energy I possess."

SOME TRADE INTERPRETATIONS.

The totals of the foreign trade have been much commented upon lately, but the details are equally interesting. In March, the last reported month, for example, our exports—which are England's imports to a large degree—consisted, as usual, largely of copper, cotton, breadstuffs, oil, iron, and wood. These humble products are those which a nation is poorer for losing, either in themselves or in the profits which they produce, first, by consumption in manufacture, and, secondly, by sale to ultimate consumers. Our loss is England's gain, and to the extent to which that gain might be ours we reduce our profits on the business. On the other hand, the increases of our imports consisted largely of diamonds, silks, linens, feathers, wines, and other luxuries, proper enough objects of consumption by the wealthy, but of which the consumption does not add to the Nation's wealth in any such sense or degree as the things we gave in exchange for them.

More wholesome are the increases in our imports of materials of manufacture, chemicals, leather, and a curious cross current of goods which we were simultaneously exporting, like iron and steel and copper. Our imports of the worked-up staples which we exported are of course an economic reproach, and just so much wages out of the pockets of our workers. We import too much of what we would be as well off without, and we consume too little of those things which enrich the consumer by their consumption, just as luxuries waste the substance of the extravagant. England's enormous excess of imports of merchandise is accompanied customarily by an excess of imports of bullion, showing that there is more wealth than waste in importing what we send her. Our enormous excess of exports of merchandise is accompanied by an invariable excess of exports of silver, and by an accustomed excess of exports of gold, the excesses of imports of gold being related to banking necessities rather than to commercial credits on merchandise movement. The conditions are such that these exports of bullion are normal, and they have been tending for some time to reflect England's financial rather than commercial condition. Our bullion movement, however, does not suggest, like England's, that we are enriching ourselves by parting with basic wealth.

OVERWORKING MR. BRYCE.

So far as we know it had occurred to no American that Ambassador BRYCE was neglecting his duties in not attending the Pittsburg ceremonies the other day, and the defense of him in Parliament was superfluous so far as this side of the ocean is concerned. But it was left to Pittsburg to plume itself properly over getting such an advertisement as a "question" in Parliament, and to suggest that the real trouble was not the Ambassador who did not attend, but the invitation which did not come. That is what Pittsburg makes out of Mr. RUNCIMAN'S and Lord FITZMAURICE'S explanation of how it happened that "Germany was left to monopolize the most prominent position" at Mr. CARNEGIE'S housewarming, something which, of course, would not have occurred if the invitations had been made officially "through the usual channels." In that case, it was suggested, suitable attention would have been paid.

As far as we had remarked Mr. CARNEGIE'S collection of lions was worthy of the occasion, and that is saying a great deal. It is needless to add that Mr. BRYCE'S attendance would have added distinction even to that assembly, but that his absence is not sort of grievance. Our hospitality is not of that deadly sort which has disabled the Colonial Premiers in London seriatim, and, after all, Mr. BRYCE has considerable occupation in taking care of Mr. ROOT and Earl GREY, who together are a handful. Where, we may ask, would Mr. BRYCE draw the line if he once made a beginning? As The Pittsburg Gazette-Times exultingly asks:

> When has anybody in the British Parliament asked his Government to explain a fancied slight at the hands of New York, of Cleveland, of Chicago, Kalamazoo, or Milwaukee?

Without in the least grudging Pittsburg its delight, we may ask in Mr. BRYCE'S behalf if he is really to be at the beck of every town in the 300,000 class, or whether his credentials should properly be extended to the 100,000 class? Not Pittsburg's simple joy, but the heartburnings of the slighted sisters must be considered in framing a reply. New York having no grievance, may properly express its surprise that Lords and Commons should unite in making a double-barreled incident of it. If LOWELL were now alive, the incident would certainly cost us the loss of his remarks upon a certain condescension in foreigners, or perhaps the time might have arrived, if he could have survived, for him to write something in his shrewdly humorous way about a certain unaccustomed and overdone sensitiveness among foreigners to American opinion.

In the current telegrams we are told that the alleged Anglo-Spanish entente, which King EDWARD perhaps arranged when he met his royal cousin ALFONSO the other day, ends the competition between Germany and England for Spain's favor. This is a very Spanish view, and quite in Pittsburg's manner. But the complaint of Lord LEITH of Fyvie that PAUNCEFOTE'S work was being undone, and the Anglo-American entente was endangered by Germany's acceptance of Mr. CARNEGIE'S invitation, certainly authoritatively suggests an Anglo-German competition for the favor of the United States. This is a little too absurd.

"EXAGGERATED ARMAMENTS."

The sensitiveness of Germans with respect to any public, and especially to any international, matter has been described by some philosophers, notably by STEVENSON, in his account of the international troubles in Samoa, as amounting to hyperaesthesia. Some evidences of this seem to be shown by the comments of a German of high authority, given in our special dispatch from Berlin, on the relations of Germany to the informal and preliminary Peace Congress here in New York, which succeeded the dedication of the Carnegie Institute in Pittsburg.

The German representatives at the dedication were wholly within their rights, as would have been the official representatives of any other nation, in abstaining from taking any part in the proceedings of a body with respect to which they presumably had no instructions, and in employing the time in industrial and "sociological" investigations on their own account. But it seems that the authority quoted by our informant undertakes to resent on behalf of Germany some remarks of President BUTLER of Columbia University on "exaggerated armaments," upon the assumption that they were made with particular reference to Germany.

The remarks themselves by no means bear out that assumption. What President BUTLER said was: "Defensive armaments are not evidences of militarism. Exaggerated armaments, which by their very existence are an invitation to offensive use, are an evidence of militarism." Surely no fair-minded man can deny this statement, much less can construe it as having reference to any single one of the Powers which are quite notoriously overarmed for the peaceable progress and prosperity of their respective countries. When the German authority undertakes to prove that Germany is not overarmed, with reference to the proportion of her population under arms, or with reference to her financial ability to bear the burden of her armament, in comparison with France, or with Italy, or even with Great Britain, he labors to prove the negative of a proposition which nobody has advanced. True, it is open to anybody to say that the geographical position of Germany forces her to maintain on land the "two-Power standard" which Great Britain, for obvious and vital reasons, has to maintain at sea, and to make head, as BISMARCK put it, at once against Russia on the east and France on the west. It is equally open to anybody to retort that it is quite notorious that the condition of Russia is such that Germany may very well save some of the expenditure and some of the diversion of her young men from peaceful pursuits which were or which might have been necessarily incumbent on her before the war between Russia and Japan, for the defense of her eastern frontier. But President BUTLER did not go into that question, nor any other question which could justly arouse the susceptibility of any one nation in particular.

STEEL RAIL DEFECTS.

It is singular that in all the discussion regarding railway wrecks so little emphasis has been laid by anybody upon lack of strength in the rails. Yet 3,014 broken rails were reported in this State alone in the first quarter of the current year. This is more than double the breakages of 1905, and nearly three times those of last year. Inasmuch as some rails now in use were laid in 1872, it is evident that reproach is laid upon the more modern manufacture, and, even more strangely, upon the heaviest sections. The largest number of defects is in the 100-pound weight, and in rails only two or three years old.

Analysis of the figures somewhat lessens the natural alarm. The breakages do not occur in anything like uniformity of increase. On some roads, including the Pennsylvania, the increase is not more than might be explained by the severity of the Winter and the growth of traffic. The New York Central accounts for almost half of the total increase, and the greatest percentage of increase is contributed by the Buffalo, Rochester & Pittsburg, which broke more than sixty times as many as last year. Such inconsistencies would seem to point to differences in conditions of use, rather than to deterioration in quality of rails, as the chief cause. The Central, having the greatest mileage and traffic, and running the fastest trains, would naturally be most exposed to this danger. Trains run at slower speed do not strain the rails less for that reason alone. The speed strains the rolling stock as well as the rails, and flat wheels strike a hammer blow much severer than anything to be attributed to weight of trainload.

But after every mitigation of this sort there remain doubts created both by the facts and by the expert authority upon which charges are made. Before this report by the State Railway Commission the American Railway Association at Chicago had been making complaints based upon technical causes rather than deficiencies to the demands of traffic. The association members complained of latent flaws due to methods of manufacture, and to chemical components which weaken the metal. The continuous process does not, it is charged, afford time for care in making, and the constant heat impedes inspection. The presence of phosphorus makes the metal brittle, it is known, but there can hardly be anything unusual in this, since the rails are made under standard specifications, which have not been altered. It is likelier that hurry in making and the use of larger ingots prevent entire homogeneity of composition, and perhaps the process of straightening when cold causes inequality of stresses in the material, resulting in interior weaknesses, which escape detection only to appear beneath the wheels.

Our Pittsburg telegram quotes the makers of rails as denying these allegations. "The best steel rail that was ever made is being made at the present time," said the President of the Carnegie Company, which produces more than a million tons of the Trust's total. The suggestion from this quarter is that trade rivalries are responsible for the imputations upon the quality of the modern goods. The railroads are said to favor rails made by the open hearth process, whereas the equipment of the principal makers is for the Bessemer process, which is somewhat too expensive to "scrap." Into the merits of this controversy the layman can hardly enter, but it is to be remarked first that there is nothing fanciful nor malicious in the reports of the breakages, and, secondly that there is great difference in national preferences of processes, and in the usages of national practice from year to year. If American practice differs from German, and if German rails are more enduring in use, a case is made which rests upon something more solid than rivalries between American makers. It is certain that leading independents not long ago procured a substantial premium upon the sale of open-hearth rails to a company which would have no other, according to its own statement, but which could get no other, according to the version of those who do not supply the goods. Not until 1908 will the Gary plant enable the Trust to meet the competition of independents, who in times like these thrive upon the Trust's overflow. Not one-tenth of the present production of rails is open hearth, but the rate of its growth since 1900 has been marked. Since 1900 the percentage of open hearth to Bessemer ingots and castings has increased from 33 per cent. to 47 per cent., and since 1890 the open hearth production has quadrupled. Generally speaking, this is a contest of the Lake ores against the Southern, with hardly more than a million tons between them.

THE COST OF JUSTICE.

It has lately been pointed out, and with much cogency, that, under the law as administered in the State of New York, a rich defendant has an undue advantage over a poor defendant in a criminal case, even when it is a capital case. The evidence of this fact was doubtless one of the considerations which have moved Dr. HAMILTON, himself an eminent expert in alienism, to demand that experts should not be witnesses retained by the one "side" or the other, but impartial witnesses, "friends of the court" and employed by the State. The suggestion must commend itself to impartial minds.

But it seems that "predatory poverty" is not so much worse off in this respect than predatory wealth. The wealth which has given rise to the discussion is in fact not predatory wealth at all, in its present condition, but torpid wealth, so to speak, which stands strictly on the defensive. Now we read that the persons under indictment whom the President of the United States has described, without prejudice to their present situation, as he has explained, and even without reference to it, as "undesirable citizens," are not likely to suffer injustice for lack of money. It is explained that over $100,000 has already been raised for their defense, and that the promoters of the defense fund hope to raise it to a million if necessary. A hereditary millionaire could scarcely expect to be better equipped for a perplexed and prolonged criminal litigation than these simple sons of toil.

A NEW LABOR NOTION.

The Independent Labor Party of England is now frankly a Socialist organization, and it no longer seeks Socialist aims by a roundabout path. At its recent convention at Derby the party announced a new purpose, the democratization of administration. Its members have found that "recent changes have placed our civil service more completely in the hands of the wealthy classes," and that it is "closed to every one who has not had a middle class or an aristocratic education."

This charge, though somewhat rudely and extravagantly expressed, is not without a certain basis of fact. In the middle of the last century the old régime of social privilege in the British civil service was done away in all the subordinate departments, that is in all the offices the occupants of which had not to shape the policy of the Government and to exercise responsible discretion. Appointments by competitive examination were substituted for appointments for favor. Within the limits of human fallibility the new methods were those of fairness and of equal opportunity for all who could meet the tests. But undoubtedly it was true, and is still true, that only the educated could get into the service, and, since education in England is to a considerable extent confined to the middle classes and to those above them in the social scale, the laboring men are excusable for saying that the doors of public employment are closed to them and to their sons and daughters. This will continue to be true so long as education continues to be as costly as, in general, it still is in the United Kingdom.

The action of the Independent Labor Party is criticised in the Conservative press as extreme, since it seems to favor the removal of educational tests for admission to the civil service. But while this is, on their face, the apparent meaning of the declarations of the Independent Labor Party, there is an alternative interpretation which we are sure comes nearer the general feeling of the workingmen, namely, that the education necessary to admission to the service shall be made attainable in free schools supported out of the taxes. That substantially is the course that the United States has followed, not always with the best judgment or with the best results, but on the whole wisely and effectively. If the workingmen of England turn to this policy they will not only attain the removal of the practical privilege still existing in the civil service, but they will mightily promote the permanent improvement of the condition of all the people.

EZRA CORNELL.

Cornell University does well to celebrate with enthusiasm the hundredth anniversary of its founder's birth. And Mr. CARNEGIE surely is entitled to be among the celebrants, as he is with a very well thought and well expressed "tribute." For one may fairly say that EZRA CORNELL, though but a humble two-millionaire, according to the fashion of his simpler and modester times, was not only the predecessor, but, as a public benefactor, the progenitor of Mr. CARNEGIE, Mr. ROCKEFELLER, and the other multi-millionaires who have bettered his instruction, and the enormity of whose benefactions have made all Europe "stare and gasp." It is a good time to recall the words of GOLDWIN SMITH, though uttered or written a generation ago, of the GOLDWIN SMITH who, imported "ad hoc," delivered an address at the first commencement of Cornell. The words are to this effect: "In Europe the successful man undertakes to found a family; in America, it seems, he still aspires to found an institution."

Of course there were brave men before AGAMEMNON, and American benefactors before CORNELL. We had had the Girard College and the Astor Library, and we had had other benefactors. But the modern American notion, which is the ancient Scriptural notion, of the stewardship of wealth, one may almost say was first effectively or coercively put into practice by EZRA CORNELL. His first benefaction was the endowment of a library for his native or adopted town, and for it he received so much praise and honor that he seems to have concluded that, making sure to leave his dependents and descendants out of the reach of want, he could derive more satisfaction, or, to put it more idiomatically, could "get more fun" out of his superfluities by endowing the public with them than through any form of purely personal expenditure. He left a legacy to his successors not only in his example but in his words: "I wish to found a university in which any person can obtain instruction in any study." And he was well advised in details, largely, no doubt, by the then active and now venerable ANDREW WHITE, the first President of Cornell and a conspicuous figure at this celebration. One may almost say that Mr. CORNELL founded the "elective system" in this country by founding such a university. And surely his descendants who assisted at this celebration must have derived more gratification from it than they could have derived from the possession of more money than they know how to spend to advantage or with dignity. His example has been immediately contagious. Benefactors beget benefactors. SIBLEY, McGRAW, SAGE, these are names that are added to his on the roll of honor of Cornell. The university is already and in many fields abundantly justified of its children. And its existence and its prosperity have one of their best results in the constraint they put on other men blest with prosperity above their fellows to go and do likewise, to "shake the superflux" to their countrymen and to their country.

ABOUT THE "NEW NEGRO."

Attention Called to One City Where Mr. Baker's Theory Does Not Apply.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Will you permit me a few words in regard to your editorial of Thursday morning relating to Mr. Ray Stannard Baker's "illuminating" articles on the race problem in the South, contributed to The American Magazine?

Mr. Baker contends, according to your editorial, that the new Southerner "fiercely" refuses to know the "new negro," and that the better class of whites and negroes are as far apart as if they lived in different countries.

The writer was born in the South, and has lived there all her life until recently, and may be pardoned an opinion, perhaps, despite Mr. Baker's insinuation that it is not necessary to have lived with the negro to know just what are his relations to the whites.

In Richmond, Va., where there is a large well-to-do class of negroes, where they own not only homes, but automobiles and victorias, not only do the better class of whites know the better class of negroes, but the blacks have had the sympathy, and, in their efforts to better themselves, the aid of the very class who were the former slaveholders. It is true the negroes have kept their "proper place"—that is, kept to their own color—and that is the very reason why they are so well-to-do and have the recognition of the whites. But that is the bone of contention, apparently—according to Mr. Baker and other writers—the negro should not keep to himself, but mingle with the whites.

The writer, after several years residence in the North, cannot pretend to that luminosity of view attained by Mr. Baker in his brief survey of conditions in the South. She has not observed, however, that the people of the North treat their servants, to which class the negroes did and still largely do belong, with any marked consideration. Nor when they step out of a servant's place to something better are they given that recognition which the Southerner "fiercely" refuses the negro. Why should there be this marked discrimination in favor of the negro when there are white brethren right at our own doors waiting and eager to know and be known?

THE JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION.

How to Reach It and Visit Neighboring Points of Interest.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Allow me to suggest a better way of visiting the Jamestown Exposition than is described by your Jamestown correspondent to-day. Last Saturday night a party of us left Washington on the Norfolk boat, reaching Fort Monroe in time for breakfast at the Chamberlin. Thence we took a ferry direct to the Exposition grounds, half an hour's sail across Hampton Roads, where twenty battleships in line made an imposing array. The Exposition we found exactly as your correspondent described, unfinished, but all very interesting. No concessionaires anywhere, so no plans, no maps to be had, and, worst of all, no information. The old colored "uncles" at work were not ready to answer our Yankee questions. The Swiss chalet provided a nice luncheon. The Lynnhaven River, with its far-famed oysters, is outside the grounds. The admission was 25 cents. After wandering about several hours we were satisfied that it did not really matter whether this Exposition were finished or not—the beauty of the location, the historic interest and the delightful Spring weather made it a pilgrimage worth having taken.

Next we took the Oceanview trolley line, ten miles to and through Norfolk, another boat ride across the bay to Newport News, threading through the battleships again. After landing we found a trolley car going to Fort Monroe, and for an hour we whirled past beautiful homes, the wistaria in full bloom and the gardens well advanced. We passed Hampton, the Soldiers' Home, and reached the Hotel Chamberlin in ample time for the night boat back to Washington. The whole trip from Washington and back cost us less than $10, not including meals. ANNA MAXWELL.

While strolling along the superb highways of Central Park yesterday, my mind was equally taken up with thoughts of Spring, and with a strong and all-pervading odor given forth by the swarm of automobiles which whirled by, leaving their smoke behind them.

I could not but think how likely it is that the perfumes, which generally abound at this season, of growing things, budding trees, shrubs, and flower plots, have lost their chance and been displaced by or brought under the domination of the great odor monopoly of gasoline vapor.

It may be that a certain repugnance which I have for this rather aggressive odor is personal and does not agree with the popular taste, yet from the standpoint of hygiene one might be tempted to protest, and I would suggest a series of tests on "Gasoline Vapor as a Substitute for Air for Breathing Purposes," or, "The Same When Slightly Diluted With Air."

If it could be thus settled by expert evidence that it is a benefit and not a menace to our millions, we could all witness the daily and almost hourly melange of ponderous gas-emitting machines, which move by battalions in close order up and down our narrow traffic "ducts" (notably Fifth Avenue and Broadway), with glad approval and assent.

Note. The tests suggested might be made by the Health Department. W. D.

Those Noisy Flat Wheels.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Will some one kindly inform me if there really is a law against the use of cars with flat wheels, and, if so, why is it not enforced? The writer, who lives on Central Park West, had the matter brought quite vividly to her attention one night some three weeks ago, when she counted fifteen cars that passed within a period of half an hour, all with flat wheels. Since then she has taken particular pains to notice the proportion of perfect cars, and I do not think I am exaggerating when I say that at least half of the cars used on the Eighth Avenue line have flat wheels. Surely there are many other people residing on this avenue who must have noticed the same condition, and possibly among them is some one who may know what steps to take to enforce this law, if there is such a law.

On Keeping Young.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The statement made by Dr. John B. Rich before the Health Culture Club yesterday that one of the reasons for his attaining the age of 97 was that he "kept away from old people," seems inconsistent, not to say heartless. According to his own theory, is he not maintaining his own health at the expense of the young people whom he insists on making his friends? Should they practice what he preaches, I think he would find the rule a poor one.

What Wall Street Is.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Mr. G. W. Bloomingdale has hit the nail on the head. Wall Street is but the "local habitation and a name" of the world's great investment mart, and sales and purchases made in Wall Street are representative of our country's activity. Wall Street is the centralization of the people's invested savings and the people's wealth, and the name "Wall Street" has come to stand for the movements of capital and the enterprises of capitalists.

NEW SUBWAY LINKS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Your editorial of to-day, entitled "Mr. Shonts's Offer," is a timely opening up of the discussion concerning the improvement of our present rapid transit facilities which should not be concluded until some satisfactory solution is arrived at.

In view of the fact that there were no bids for the proposed new subways, the proposition to better our present facilities is made all the more imperative.

Having represented in the past various real estate interests in some of the proceedings for the proposed new subways, I have become fairly familiar with rapid transit projects. Permit me, therefore, to make a suggestion with respect to Mr. Shonts's offer in the nature of an amendment to it. The proposition to extend the west side branch of the existing Subway downtown from Forty-second Street and Broadway is the only proper and feasible manner of improving that part of the existing system. The proposition to extend the present Subway from Forty-second Street and Fourth Avenue northward, however, is not so commendable. In its place I would suggest the extension of the existing Subway system from Forty-second Street and Fourth Avenue northward in as direct a line as possible, so as to connect with the system at 110th Street and Lenox Avenue, and then to continue northward from the present Lenox Avenue terminus up Jerome Avenue. That part of the existing system running northeasterly from 149th Street and Third Avenue should be continued southerly by an independent east side line. This plan, if I am not mistaken, will require about seven miles of subway more than that required by the plan outlined in Mr. Shonts's offer, but would, however, give the city three separate and distinct subway routes, one central and one on either side of the city.

If the Interborough Railroad is willing to undertake this upon the terms stated by Mr. Shonts, why, let the octopus have it, as this now seems the only relief from the present disgraceful and uncivilized method of intermural transit.

THE ALTON DEAL.

Mr. Harriman's Part In It, Mr. Odell's, and Gov. Roosevelt's.

From The Wall Street Journal.

The more the Alton deal is studied the more extraordinary does its history appear. Here is a chapter which did not come out at the recent Union Pacific investigation.

It will be recalled that the Alton readjustment took place during Mr. Harriman's absence in Alaska. He has nevertheless been held by public opinion chiefly responsible for it, and his associates in the scheme, Messrs. Gould, Stillman, and Schiff, have in a large measure escaped the condemnation which has been his portion. The idea has prevailed that Mr. Harriman planned the deal before he left for Alaska, and that what took place during his absence was simply the carrying out of his ideas.

Mr. Harriman, to his credit be it said, has not sought to escape any blame which attaches to the transaction by shifting the burden upon the shoulders of his associates. His friends say, however, that upon his return from Alaska he was, in fact, displeased at what had been done while he was away, feeling that a mistake had been made.

This, however, did not prevent him from going ahead with his accustomed energy to make a success of the transaction. Complete success depended upon making a market for the bonds which had been issued to the Harriman-Gould-Stillman-Schiff syndicate at 65.

Enlisting the aid of Benjamin B. Odell, then Chairman of the Republican State Committee, it is said Mr. Harriman secured the passage by the State Legislature of a law extending the permissible savings bank investments to these Alton bonds.

A fact of extraordinary interest in view of recent developments is that this law was signed by Gov. Theodore Roosevelt. Thus the signature of Roosevelt completed the Alton deal by giving the Alton bonds the prestige which attaches to a savings bank investment. Yet at this very time the essential facts of the Alton readjustment—stock, stock-watering and all—had been made public.

This of course does not imply any complicity on the part of Gov. Roosevelt in the operations of the Harriman syndicate. On the contrary, the Governor unquestionably accepted the bill as it came to him, in good faith, believing that it represented the desires of the investment market. He did not then understand the matter as he does now.

Seven years later, as President of the United States, Mr. Roosevelt believed it to be his duty to proceed against Mr. Harriman and condemn this very deal which he himself, in his ignorance, as Governor of New York had helped to consummate.

I suppose every thoughtful citizen of New York regrets that the city does not compare more favorably in an artistic sense with many of the European cities. The Brooklyn Plaza of the Williamsburg Bridge promised, with its roomy expanse, the Howe statue of George Washington, and fine banking and other structures in course of erection, to be one of the few busy centres of the city not offensive to the eye. Now an unsightly elevated railway is to be constructed upon it. It is announced that no attempt to render this structure in any way ornamental will be made. Imagine Paris permitting such a thing to be done! S. W.

Stocks and Other Inflated Values.

About ten years ago, an uncle of mine, who had kept a grocery store on Ninth Avenue, died, leaving an estate which was divided between my cousin and myself; to my cousin was left a house on Thirty-second Street, between Eighth and Ninth Avenues, which was valued at $12,000. I received about $10,000 in cash, which I invested in Pennsylvania Railroad stock. My cousin wanted to sell the house for $11,000, but as no buyers appeared he moved into it himself with his family. About four or five years ago he got a tip that the Pennsylvania Railroad was going to build in the neighborhood, so he withdrew his house from the market, but finally sold it for $29,000.

I have received regular dividends on my investment in the Pennsylvania, and am well satisfied, as far as that goes; but, in view of the great cry that is being raised about watered stock in corporations, I often wonder what kind of a fluid it was that raised a house worth $12,000 to $29,000. What are the legislators of the country going to do against such flagrant cases of inflated values as this is?

As far as I am concerned, the Pennsylvania has never increased its capital stock one cent to equalize the actual value of the road to-day.

I suppose that the private citizen who benefits by increased values is in one class, but the unfortunate investor in the outlaw corporation is a public enemy, who ought to be thankful that he is allowed to live.

Native American Speaks.

Having preserved a copy of your issue of April 25 for a purpose, and having in pursuance of that purpose reread your editorial, "Undesirable Citizens," I wish, as a plain American citizen of native right to the title, to express deep appreciation of the justice done my countrymen in your comment.

President Roosevelt has made more friends than enemies in his latest gallant and convincing defense of what we Americans hold dear. Dynamiters and doers of violence have no place among us, and there is no authority better qualified to serve notice to that effect than the man at Washington.

Thank God, he is a man, and not a weathercock. J. W. EDMONDS.

TAFT IN CINCINNATI; STOPS ALL BOOMING

BUT YALE MEN CHEER HIM

President Hadley Says Eastern Universities Are National and Western Ones Are Local.

CINCINNATI, April 27.—For the first time since he entered the race for the Presidency Secreary of War Taft returned to Cincinnati to-day. So far as politics were concerned, however, the big Secreary sat firmly "on the lid." He wae here as a Yale man, and insisted on remaining so, even though the Yale men with whom he came into contact insisted on attempting to boom him every time even the shadow of an opportunity was given.

Mr. Taft came to attend the annual convention of the Western Yale clubs of which he is President. The members of the clubs proposed to meet him on his arrival, but he presented strenuous opposition to any demonstration, and the plan was abandoned. When he arrived he declared that he would not in any manner allude to politics during his visit. Although he consulted his brother, Charles P. Taft, and Arthur I. Vorys and Henry A. Williams, two of his managers, during the day, he kept his promise in his public appearances.

The Yale men, however, would not be restrained entirely. Their illusions to the "next President of the United States" were frequent and popular, and, although Mr. Taft ignored them as well as he could, he had difficulty keeping his seat "on the lid."

The first outbreak came in the business meeting of the morning. The Secretary as presiding officer had announced the personnel of a Nominating Committee and mentioned the offices they were to fill. As he finished a voice from the throng offered the amendment of "And also nominate the next President of the United States." A spontaneous yell came from the crowd, but the Secretary was unmoved. "The gentleman is out of order," he said sharply.

At to-night's banquet there were frequent allusions to the Presidency, and each time continued applause followed them.

Mr. Taft was roundly cheered when he arose as toastmaster. He spoke of the great progress made by Yale in recent years.

"It is not true," he said, "that because hazing has disappeared, because drunkenness is very much less, that therefore men may not develop rugged practical qualities fitted to resist temptation of after life; and all of us ought to rejoice that the material growth of Yale since we were there has been paralleled by an improvement in the moral tone of the student body and in the standards set by that public opinion which is even stronger as an influence in the college community of New Haven than in the body politic at large. The change has not affected the spirit of independence, of self-reliance, or democracy that we all like to think of as especially characteristic of Yale."

Mr. Taft adverted to the fact that since the last meeting of the federation he had been honored by election as a member of the governing body of Yale. He pointed out that in the evolution of the university Yale was not a sectarian institution.

"This is official," said he, "for it has come within the benefits of the Carnegie Fund as a non-sectarian institution, and it is purely so."

He expressed gratification that he had found the view taken by the clerical members of the Yale Corporation with reference to liberal instructions, particularly in theology, to be broad and tolerant. He said, however, that the corporation pursued the wise policy of not meddling and leaving to the President the management of the various departments. He stamped with his approval the Yale method of dealing with athletics, indicating his belief that public opinion would place restraint upon excesses in respect to athletics.

President Arthur T. Hadley of Yale was the chief speaker at the banquet. He said, in part:

"Until the early part of the nineteenth century the work of higher education was done by a few colleges in the East. These were, with few exceptions, sectarian or narrow. But in the last forty years the Eastern universities have undergone a great change. They have loosened their denominational ties. They have widened their conception of what a college should do.

"They differ from the Western institutions not so much in the things they teach as in the character and traditions of the student body. Their constituency is National and not local. Their associations are not with one or two generations alone, but with many. Amid the disintegrating tendencies of American life, they form an overwhelmingly strong cohesive element. Not Yale alone, but Harvard and Princeton also and other colleges like them, represent a distinctive feature in American life, which is likely to become more and more important as time goes on.

"These endowed universities of the East are National; the State universities of the West are, by contrast, local. I am unwilling to say a single word which would appear as a criticism of the system of State universities. They are rendering magnificent services to the country. Nevertheless, if this tendency to localize learning went to an extreme our teaching of science and literature would lose half its benefit."

Mr. Hadley declared that Western men of wealth should be interested in the National universities.

"You can create in every city where you have influence," he said, "a feeling among the graduates, and through the graduates among the public, of essential nearness to Yale—nearness in purpose and nearness in ideal. For an endowed institution needs support; and it will get support only from those places that have a direct personal interest in the men and ideas for which it stands. Fifty years ago Yale got most of its money from Connecticut. Now it gets most of its money from New York. But this cannot go on forever. A National university must appeal to the Nation for its support. The West has reached a point where its rich men are contributing largely, by gift or by bequest, to the various local institutions in which they are interested. It is for you to build up a similar interest in National gifts."

THE TWENTY-EIGHT.

A golden harp for each of them,
A halo for each pate, Sir;
And angel hands are fast at work
With wings for twenty-eight, Sir.

For they are paragons of good,
Of righteousness the models;
They hit the line of Evil hard—
They are not mollycoddles.

But there's no good in being good
Both in and out of season,
Especially in Pittsburg there—
I say this with a reason.

For when th' unrighteous cash their chips,
Why you know where they go to,
But Pittsburgers won't mind the place,
And they go pretty low, too.

It's dark and hot and all of that,
Not just the place for ladies,
But he who's been through Pittsburg smoke
Won't mind the smoke of Hades.

MISS UNTERMYER WEDS MR. MYERS

MISS HARMON ENGAGED

Miss Irene Untermyer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, was married yesterday to Louis Putnam Myers, son of Mr. and Mrs. P. C. Myers of this city, at Greystone-on-the-Hudson, Mr. Untermyer's country home. Greystone, with its handsome grounds and gardens, was once the home of Samuel J. Tilden. The wedding took place in the drawing room of the mansion, and it was the first marriage to be held there in many years.

Ten thousand lilies of the valley, 500 American Beauty roses, and 500 Bridesmaid roses, white lilacs and appleblossoms from the Greystone conservatories were used to decorate the interior of the house.

The bride and the bridegroom stood under a canopy of asparagus and lilies of the valley, sprayed with moss rosebuds, with ferns and tall palms in the background. Suspended from the canopy were three florni bells of lilies of the valley snd pink moss rosebuds. Before the large mirrors surrounding the drawing room were suapended gilt baskets containing lilies of the valley and moss rosebuds. Moss-covered columns, with garlands of lilies of the valley, and moss roses formed an aisle leading to the bridal bower, where Judge Gildersleeve united the couple at 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

Preceding the bridal party a boy choir of twenty-eight voices, selected from various city churches, entered the room, singing the bridal chorus from "Lohengrin." The choir started from the top of the grand stairway and descended slowly to the drawing room, singing as it marched. The bride was escorted by her father, Samuel Untermyer, who gave her in marriage.

The bride wore an Empire Princess gown of white satin, having a panel down the centre front of rose point and point applique lace, bordered with raised embroidery in silk, satin, and silver roses, with follages. Similar rich embroidery went around the bottom of the skirt, and also formed sprays at the sides of the gown. The yoke and undersleeves were of rose point, and the top of the gown and its Mandarin sleeves were of satin embroidered in roses to match the skirt.

The bride's veil, a handsome piece of old rose point, extended from the top of her head to the end of her train, and it was held in place by orange blossoms. She carried a shower bouquet of lilies of the valley. Her jewels were a long three-strand string of pearls, the gift of her mother, and a diamond ornament, the gift of the bridegroom. There were no bridal attendants.

Barby's "Perfect Love" was sung as the Recessional, and a string orchestra stationed near the grand stairway played the Mendelssohn wedding march after the recessional sung by the choir.

Perit C. Meyer, Jr., brother of the bridegroom, was best man. The ushers were Kenneth B. Schley, Daniel M. Coffin, James B. A. Fosburgh of Boston, Louis M. Richmond, and Alvin Untermyer and Irwin Untermyer, brothers of the bride.

The main entrance, leading to the reception hall, was arched with forsythia blossoms and Florida smilax. In the large Gothic hall were many apple blossoms, white lilacs, and forsythia. Beneath a chandelier in the hall was suspended a bell of growing lilies of the valley; above the chandelier were boughs of apple blossoms. The fount in the center of the hall was filled with white lilacs, and other founts in the hall had apple blossoms. Groups of palms, banked with bridal wreathe, were in corners of the hall and near the entrance to the balcony, overlooking the Hudson. All the doors in the house were arched with apple blossoms.

In the Gothic room were American beauty roses, and in the reception room were jars of sunrise roses. The library was decorated with American beauty roses. The grand stairway was elaborately decorated with yellow forsythia and smilax. On the terrace where tea was served after the wedding, large jars of bridal wreath were artistically arranged.

Among the 500 guests invited were Mr. and Mrs. John E. Cowdin, Mr. and Mrs. John Hays Hammond, Mr. and Mrs. William E. Perry, Miss Cowdin, J. H. Worthington, Mr. and Mrs. Henry P. Perry, Mr. and Mrs. Reginald Jaffray, Poultney Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. James M. Mr. and Mrs. Meyers left on a honeymoon trip last night, which will include visits to several of the Southern resorts.

They will live in this city.

COACHING CLUB PARADE.

To be Held on May 11, with a Luncheon at Claremont.

The annual parade of the Coaching Club on May 11 will this year depart from the usual programms. The members will entertain their guests at luncheon at Claremont instead of at the Metropolitan Club, as hitherto.

Alfred G. Vanderbilt, who is exhibiting his horses in England, is returning to take part in the parade.

The club had its first parade in 1870, and this is its twenty-seventh meet. Col. William Jay, the first President, is still President; William H. Gulliver is Vice President, and George G. Haven, Jr., is Secretary and Treasurer.

There will probably be a dozen coaches in line, and the list of those who are to take part contains the names of Col. Jay, R. W. Rives, G. G. Haven, Jr., E. Victor Loew, Jr., W. Goadby Loew, George B. Read, Seymour Le Grand Cromwell, and also, probably, Harry Payne Whitney, and R. L. and P. G. Gerry, will take part.

The club will meet opposite the Metropolitan Club, in East Sixtieth Street, at 11:45 o'clock, entering Central Park through the Sixtieth Street entrance. The coaches will be driven along the Mall to McGowan's Pass Tavern, thence westerly to the West Drive, up to the Great Circle on the hill at the north of the Park, where the review will take place, as usual.

The parade will, after the reviewing is over, continue northerly down the hill to the West Drive to the northwestern entrance of the Park, thence westerly through 110th Street to Riverside Drive, and up the Drive to Claremont, where luncheon will be served at 1:30 o'clock.

WOMEN'S COACH PARADE.

The Women's Four-in-Hand Driving Club parade is to take place next Thursday. The starting point, as usual, will be from East Seventy-second Street, near the park, and the hour 11:30 o'clock. The women drivers will follow their usual course through the Mall to the point of review at the Circle, where, after Mrs. Hastings reviews, the parade will be over, and the whips will make their way back to the Colony Club, where luncheon will be served this year, instead of at the Women's Annex of the Metropolitan Club, as in previous years.

Mrs. Thomas Hastings, the President, will, as usual, lead the parade, and Miss Louise Gulliver, the Secretary and Treasurer, will bring up the rear, while Mrs. Arthur Iselin, daughter of Col. Jay, the President of the men's Coaching Club, who is Vice President, will follow Mrs. Hastings.

The new members of the club who will this year drive their own coaches are to be Miss Harriet Alexander, the débutante daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Alexander, and the Misses Gladys and Dorothea Cromwell, the débutante daughters of Frederic Cromwell. Mrs. W. Goadby Loew will drive her coach, but there is still some uncertainty as to the others who will participate. Mrs. Archibald Alexander (Miss Helen Barney) was to have driven a coach, but the death of Mr. Alexander's uncle, Robert L. Stevens, has made it impossible. Miss Gerry will probably be away. Those who were the whips last year besides the officers of the club and Mrs. Loew, were Miss Mary Harriman, Miss Cornelia Bryce, Miss Angelica Gerry, Mrs. C. Ledyard Blair, and Mrs. Ralph Sanger.

NEW COMBINE BORN IN THEATRE LAND

AFFECTS MINOR THEATRES

Rivalry in Larger Matters to Continue, but on a More Friendly Basis.

The consolidation of certain Shubert and Klaw & Erlanger theatrical interests was formally announced last night for the first time, and as THE TIMES indicated two years ago is mainly and essentially an arrangement for enlarging Klaw & Erlanger's new circuit of "advanced vaudeville" houses. The consolidation and the formation of certain interests into a new company is by no means an amalgamation of the great rival combines, but the fact that both leaders of the opposing hosts have consented to be Directors of a new corporation was taken last night as indicating the dawn of a more amicable feeling.

Exactly how much further significance can be attached to it can be determined by time alone. The Shuberts have in no degree lost their separate identity. The rivalry between the combinations is by no means at an end, but henceforth it will probably be a more friendly emulation.

The official statement issued late yesterday afternoon said:

"The rumors that have been current for many months as to the formation of a large theatrical merger became a fact to-day when the United States Amusement Company was incorporated in New Jersey and at once began business. Its charter gives it unlimited theatrical and amusement powers.

"The following were immediately elected: A. L. Erlanger, President; Lee Shubert, Vice President; Marc Klaw, Treasurer; James P. McGovern, Secretary; Levy Mayer of Chicago, General Counsel; William Klein of New York, Attorney; Attorney General Robert H. Carter of New Jersey, the New Jersey Attorney. The Executive Committee elected consists of A. L. Erlanger, Lee Shubert, and Marc Klaw. The Board of Directors is composed of A. L. Erlanger, Marc Klaw, Al. Hayman, Lee Shubert, Jacob J. Shubert, George B. Cox of Cincinnati, Congressman Joseph L. Rhinock of Kentucky, Moses Reis, and Conover English of New Jersey, the latter being the New Jersey Director, the laws of that State requiring a resident Director.

"The new company immediately acquired from the Messrs. Shubert and their associates theatres in the following cities: Brooklyn, Buffalo, Chnttanooga, Columbus, Denver, Kansas City, Louisville, Milwaukee, New Orleans, Pittsburg, Rochester, Springfield, and Worcester, and the Majestic Theatre in New York City. The new company at the same time acquired from Klaw & Erlanger and their associates the Tremont Theatre in Boston, the Grund Opera House in Brooklyn, the New Forrest Theatre in Philadelphia, and the New York Theatre in New York.

"One million dollars was paid into the new company, for which that amount of stock was at once issued, the company retaining in its charter the power to increase its capital stock from time to time to meet its business requirements. While the charter of the new company gives it unlimited theatrical and amusement powers, its efforts will be in the direction of vaudeville.

"In taking over these various properties and interests the new company agrees to aid the respective parties in every way to carry out all existing contracts. The negotiations that led up to the formation of the new company were inaugurnted by Messers. Cox and Rhinock.

"Messrs. Klaw & Erlanger state that the arrangement as so consummated will at once clear the theatrical atmosphere; that there were altogether too many theatres devoted exclusively to high-class attractions; that, while there was an enormous public to support "popular-priced" and vaudeville attractions, the higher class theatres necessarily catered to a minority. They further state that the new arrangement will in no way affect their syndicate, and that its booking agency will remain intact and as heretofore continue under the control of Al Hayman, Klaw & Erlanger.

"The Messrs. Shubert expressed themselves as being highly pleased with the arrangement, as it violates none of their existing obligations, all of which will be carried out with their business associates and stars."

An examination of this statement shows that the Shubert theatres taken into the new company are those under the so-called Shubert Theatrical Company, in which Messrs. Cox nnd Rhinock are large shareholders, and not the houses controlled by the old Sam S. & Lee Shubert Company. The only change in New York is that the Majestic will become a vaudeville house, and that has long been a foregone conclusion. The policy of such houses as the Lyric, the Herald Square, and the recently acquired Daly's will remain unaltered.

Though no official statement to that effect has been issued it is generally understood that if the Shuberts desire to book attractions in cities in which they now have no theatres for legitimate attractions, Klaw & Erlanger will be prepared to furnish the time. If this turns out to be the case, it is perhaps the most important development in the situation, not at this present moment, but for future consideraion when some of the present booking contracts expire.

The independent managers affiliated with the Shuberts in booking through their houses were unanimous yesterday in expressing the opinion that the new arrangement would strengthen the independent movement. The "independent movement" thus spoken of means the movement for leaving all theatres open to all producing managers.

Harrison Grey Fiske and Walter N. Lawrence both expreseed the opinion that the new arrangement would be beneficial rather than detrimental to their interests. Though Mr. Belasco would make no personal statement, those in his confidence expressed a similar belief, and said that their contracts were of such a nature that they stood in no danger. By the new arrangement the independent producing managers will be relieved from the necessity of booking their attractions in a certain number of unprofitable houses for the sake of keeping the entire Shubert circuit open to legitimate attractions.

A forecast of the future seemed last night to indicate a new line-up of theatrical hostilities, founded on the vaudeville business. The establishment of the new corporation was interpreted as meaning that Klaw & Erlanger and their new vaudeville circuit will be in militant opposition to the Keith & Proctor and Hammerstein and Williams combine.

This latter combine, formed only a few months ago, controls no less than 150 vaudeville houses between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans and represents an array of capital which might well appear formidable even to such antagonists as the so-called "syndicate." Mr. Albee, general manager of the United Booking Agency, which controls the attractions for the 150 houses just mentioned, did not appear to be in the least perturbed by the news last night.

"This new development is nothing but what we have been expecting for months," said Mr. Albee, when the official announcement was read to him. "It is what we have expected from the first day that Mr. Erlanger announced his vaudeville enterprise. We see no cause to be in the least disturbed about it."

MISS EMILY O. GIBBES DEAD.

Long Illness of Newport Resident Had Affected Her Mind.

NEWPORT, April 27.—Miss Emily O. Gibbes died this morning at her residence, on Gibbes Avenue, after an illness of several weeks. She had spent the Winter in Newport, living alone with her servants. Her mind had been failing for some time, and her idiosyncrasies had made it impossible to keep employes for any considerable time.

She was at times so suspicious of every one that she discharged her physicians, nurses, and servants by the wholesale, charging them with attempting to rob her of her money, and on one or two occasions threatened them with a loaded revolver. In the latter part of March she discharged every employe and shut herself in her room. She was found two days later, almost starved. She was so weak that when she opened the door to admit those who went to her relief, she fell and broke one of her legs.

Miss Gibbes was more than 80 years old, and had been a Summer resident of Newport for nearly half a century. Her father, the late Robert Mason Gibbes, was one of the pioneer cottagers here. She was a member of a well-known Southern family, being connected by marriage with John Jacob Astor, father of William Waldorf Astor, who married a Miss Gibbes.

Miss Gibbes was quite wealthy, and in the management of her property was clear-minded and exact.

EDNA MAY BIDS GOOD-BYE TO STAGE

WILL RESIDE IN ENGLAND

Tells London Audience Her Intention —Two Loving Cups and Many Bouquets Presented to Her.

LONDON, April 27.—Edna May, who gained a peculiar hold on the hearts of theatregosrs here when she appeared as the Salvation Lass in "The Belle of New York" a decade sgo, which hold hae never been weakened, received a great demonstration to-night on the occasion of her last appearance on the stage, which she abandons to marry young Oscar Lewisohn. Her admirers had sent thousands of requests for souvenirs and photographs since her approaching retirement was announced, and a line of "gallery gods" today waited before the Aldwych Theatre from early morning for seats.

Miss May has been presenting "Nellie Neil" to large and enthusiastic audiences and on every appearance the popular star has been greeted with round after round of applause. This enthusiasm reached its climax to-night, when hy request she sang "Follow Me," from "The Belle of New York." The audience joined in the chorus and then spontaneously sang "Auld Lang Syne."

At the conclusion of this the entire house rose and cheered Miss May, who came to the front and briefly thanked her admirers for the great ovation. She concluded by saying that it was her intention to reside in England. She was completely overcome, but she had to respond again to the calls of the audience after Joseph Coyne, on behalf of the members of the company, had presented to her two loving cups and a dozen bouquets, which, added to those given by the audience, made an imposing floral display on the stage. Mr. Coyne and Kitty Gordon also received ovations.

After the performance Miss May was entertained at supper at the Savoy Hotel and she then bade farewell to those who have supported her in "Nellie Neil."

TO BUILD A SPOONER THEATRE

Mrs. Spooner Will Move Her Company to Manhattan Only Temporarily.

New facts came out yesterday about Mrs. Spooner's plans after she moves her stock company from the Bijou Theatre, Brooklyn, where it has been a favorite for years, to Keith & Proctor's Fifth Avenue Theatre.

In the first place, the Bijou Theatre, where Mrs. Spooner has been giving performances for the last six years, will be devoted to melodrama under the management of Hyde & Behman. In the second place, Mrs. Spooner left the Bijou only because the rent was raised beyond what she considered a reasonable figure. She does not intend permanently to remain in Manhattan. On the contrary, she expects to build a theatre of her own in Brooklyn.

Mrs. Spooner gave an interview yesterday in which she explained that, though she was taking her company to Manhattan for a long engagement, she had already begun planning for a new Brooklyn playhouse. Within a year, she says, she hopes once more to be giving the people of Brooklyn entertainments such as she has given at the Bijou. Mrs. Spooner has not yet announced where her new Brooklyn theatre will be situated.

LONDON, April 27.—"Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" was presented hy an American company at Terry's Theatre this evening. It had an enthusiastic reception at the hands of a friendly audience. Every seat in the house was taken. The play made a good impression and gives promise of a long run.

FINANCIAL MARKETS

WAIT FOR THE CROP REPORT

Local Institutions Decrease Loans and Increase Cash Where Reverse Had Been Awaited.

Where a substantial increase in loans and a falling off in surplus had been looked for in yesterday's bank statement, the return itself disclosed the reverse, and the stock market, which had been dull and without decided tendencies, turned upward sharply after the publication of this document. There was nothing else in the day's news to influence the course of prices, and the small trading, amounting in all to a little more than 150,000 shares, found its source entirely in professional operations. There was some further discussion of the condition of Winter wheat, but the disposition is to await the publication of the Government's regular monthly statement on May 10 before attempting to estimate even roughly the damage so far worked by pests and unseasonable weather. Advices from European markets described them as laboring under the same apathy that holds our own, and the only developments of interest either in London or on the Continent were connected with the money situation. Discounts eased in London and in Paris, and the Paris cheque on London fell another centime, to 25f. 16c., a rate which seems to promise heavy takings of gold by Paris either from the Bank of England itself or from the London open market on Monday. A large amount of gold is due to arrive in London from South Africa on Monday, and it is probable that this will supply the French demand for the moment.

It has been a matter of general knowledge that interior banks were withdrawing from unprofitable loans, thus shifting the burden of supplying this credit to the shoulders of local banks while at the same time these out-of-town institutions were drawing money from this city. It was this knowledge that led to the belief that yesterday's bank statement would prove unfavorable through its reflection of the loan increase and the consequent falling off in cash holdings. What factors intervened to prevent the full weight of the known movements of money from finding their logical expression in the bank return is not clear, and the statement is, therefore, somewhat unsatisfactory, since it fails to coincide with known conditions. The actual figures show a decrease of $1,587,000 in loans, a gain of $147,000 in cash, and, as a result of the other changes, an addition of $641,000 to surplus reserve. The surplus now stands at $12,346,000, exceeding that of a year ago, and those of 1903 and 1902, but otherwise well under the same item in any year at this season since 1893. There is no certainty as yet that the interior demand for "Spring funds" has ceased, the discount at Chicago is still heavy, and in only one city, New Orleans, did exchange move in such fashion during the week as to suggest the cessation of demands.

THE BANK STATEMENT.

Predictions of a fairly good bank statement were fulfilled in the showing made by the banks yesterday. Loans which had increased on a large scale the two previous weeks showed a decrease of $1,587,300 yesterday, and deposits also were smaller by $1,980,200. Instead of a decrease in cash as had been indicated by the preliminary estimates of the week's currency movement, the banks showed a small increase. There was a decrease of $2,003,100 in specie and an increase of $2,150,000 in legal tenders, a net increase of $146,900 in total cash. As there was a decrease of $495,050 in reserve requirements, the surplus showed a gain of $641,950.

PHILADELPHIA PRICES.

PHILADELPHIA, April 27.—A fair volume of business was transacted to-day, Philadelphia Rapid Transit again being the

Traders are developing early the Saturday vacation habit due to the extreme dullness and professional character of the market. In scores of houses yesterday the only member who came downtown was the office man, and in many cases the cashier was the official representative of the firm. The board members did not appear, and whatever few orders were received from customers were handed out to the specialists or the two-dollar men. The market presented an appearance exactly similar to that of last Saturday, and customers in the big houses were few. It was so evident that a dull market might be expected that only those who had nothing else to do and nowhere else to go, supplemented by those who are tied up to stocks, appeared on the scene. The floor of the Exchange showed a very slight attendance, and the brokers who appeared there seemed to be absolutely indifferent.

There are some big houses which have only one member on the floor, and it is impossible for him to attend to all the orders received. Consequently it becomes necessary to give out a very large part of the business. The monthly bills paid for this special service are enormous. There are some houses which make an effort to attend to as much of their own business as possible through their own representatives, and yet they pay out in excess of $100,000 a year to other brokers for executing orders for them. It pays a house well to own several seats on the Exchange. An investment of $80,000 is a wise one, as it saves an annual expenditures of from $50,000 to $100,000. Some of the smaler houses have two or three members, and their purpose is not so much to handle the business of their own firm as it is to supplement the firm's income from comissions of custoers, by the handling of orders of other houses and by specializing in stocks.

***

"Any one can see that the market is very dull and professional," remarked a broker yesterday, "but one of my clerks gave me the best illustration of it and the most convincing one I have heard. He mentioned casually that the clearing sheet of a certain house usually noted for uniform activity showed on one night recently only four or five items. I assumed that this sheet at any time would have shown in excess of twenty-five or thirty items, and it was a revelation to me of the extreme nature of the market's dullness. I can see it for myself in my own office, but my customers are usually conservative, and it does not surprise me when they forget to trade for a week or so at a time. Inquiry from my friends on the floor, however, elicited the fact that real commission business is getting to be a very scarce commodity."

***

In the last week a big block of city bonds has been quietly offered by two or three brokers, but thus far it has had no material effect on the general price of these issues. These bonds are part of an estate, and when the sale is completed it is likely to be found that they have been distributed over a wide area. They are being offered by letter privately to houses and individuals in every part of the country, but only to such as the brokers know to be specifically interested. The size of the block is not extraordinarily large, but the offering on account of collateral conditions is quite important.

***

Charles M. Schwab has gone to Mexico to look over his mining properties recently acquired in that section. These trips are regarded in a sense by Mr. Schwab as a relaxation, but any one who has accompanied him on such a trip has found that he manages to get in a tremendous amount of work. One of his secretaries who accompanies him invariably finds that he has plenty to do at every stage of the trip.

***

Bond men who have to deal with the domestic issues only—that is, with Government, municipal, railroad, and industrial bonds of the United States—do not realize what a more interesting, if more complicated, business their foreign confrères have in keeping track of the various European issues. There are all kinds of foreign bonds, not the least interesting of which are the so-called premium bonds, which have more or less the characteristics of lottery issues. One day last week a stock broker in the Street received from a client a collection of frayed and tattered certificates, disreputable looking and not conducive to a belief that they were worth anything. He submitted them to one of the foreign houses, and found out speedily that they were worth a great deal. He found out also that there were limitations in trading in them, for their lottery characteristics made it possible for the house only to act as agent in the collection.

***

One house in the financial district is credited with "laying off" twenty-four clerks in the last two weeks. This is accurate in a great degree, and may be modified only by the statement that some of the men relieved from duty were what are known as "extra" clerks. There has been a reduction of force in many houses, but as a rule the important houses have retained practically their full force. Some houses have made it a practice in the last few months not to replace clerks who have resigned, but they have not expedited the reduction of their force by dismissals.

***

Quite a thriving business has developed in the financial district of late in the preparation of prospectuses for mining ventures. Some of this literature is lurid, some is hackneyed, and some of it is very interesting. The fascination of copper, the possibilities of wealth, the ease and sureness with which investments can be made, and the historic personages who have founded their fortunes on mining, all find a place in these booklets of information. A collateral branch of the business is one in which advice, information, and suggestion are furnished to the prospective writer of such pamphlets, and all the interesting data that might be used in weaving the story of fortune yet to come, are found compiled, ready for use, and should be very useful indeed.

***

With few exceptions financial institutions pay interest on out-of-town deposits. This practice is almost universal now, but it has given rise from time to time to serious discussion of its advisability. Back in 1858 the Clearing House advised against it, and it has been discussed many times since, and particularly in 1873 and 1874. There are all sorts of arguments pro and con, but the practice still survives and flourishes among nearly all the big institutions. A bank paying interest on out-of-town deposits has to get a most substantial return on its money to make its profits equivalent to that of a non-interest-paying bank, and it is figured that with normal rates for money, the non-interest-paying bank can do practically as well with half the deposits as a bank that is compelled to set a de a certain percentage for payment on its balances of out-of-town institutions or individuals.

LONDON MARKETS EXTREMELY DULL

Attractive New Loan Issues Probably the Chief Cause of the Stagnation.

CHEAPER MONEY EXPECTED

Belief That the Stock Exchange Will Soon Be Active, as Money Will Be Withdrawn from Banks.

Special Cablegram.

LONDON, April 27.—Old members of the Stock Exchange say they have not often known stock dealings to be duller than now. Bankers say the same thing, in confirmation of which they direct attention to the extraordinarily small demand for loans at this week's settlement, which indicates, according to their view, that little or no account is open.

Probably the dullness on the stock markets, as was pointed out last week, is due chiefly to applications for loans by various governments of the British Empire and by municipalities and corporations. A number of these loan propositions, in fact most of them, are so favorable to investors that they have attracted money than in the ordinary course would have been employed on the Stock Exchange in investment purchases and speculation.

It is also suggested that while money was dear and scarce, and people were more or less alarmed by the fall in the prices of securities, a great many persons put their savings into banks, which at that time were paying large rates of interest. It is thought that now that rates have fallen and money is getting cheaper a large percentage of what was deposited in the banks a few months ago will be withdrawn soon and find its way into the stock markets.

The opinion of a good many City men is that money is going to be considerably cheaper than seemed possible a few weeks ago. It would be unsafe to predict this, conservative bankers tell me, although they acknowledge that the indications are for falling rates. Whether the Bank of England rate will be reduced again next week depends on the outlook in other money centres. At this moment the conditions almost everywhere encourage the expectation that the Directors will take off another ½ per cent. before long.

Developments of Yesterday in London, Paris, and Berlin."

LONDON, April 27.—Money continued to be in liberal supply in the market today. Discounts were firm on the weakness of Paris exchange, indicating possible competition for gold on Monday.

Trading on the Stock Exchange was dull and uninteresting. The selling of consols in order to participate in the new loans, caused a sagging of gilt-edged securities generally.

Americans were idle. The uncertainty regarding the situation in New York restricted business. Prices moved to fractionally above parity level, and the market closed dull, with an absence of special influences.

Money, ¼@2½ per cent.

The rate of discount in the open market for short bills is 3 per cent. The rate of discount in the open market for three months' bills is 3⅛@3¼ per cent.

PARIS, April 27.—Prices on the Bourse to-day were firm, and trading was inactive. Russian imperial fours closed at 74.00, and Russian bonds of 1904 at 107.00.

The private rate of discount was at 3 5-16 per cent.

Three per cent. rentes, 94f, 57½c for the account.

Exchange on London, 25f; 16c for checks.

Discount rates: Short bills, 3 per cent.; three months' bills, 4 per cent.

BERLIN, April 27.—Prices on the Boerse today were irregular, and trading was limited. Americans were lower.

Discount rates: Short bills, 3 per cent.; three months' bills, 4 per cent.

TO COMBINE COAL COMPANIES.

Pocahontas Collieries Amalgamation with the Consolidated Recommended.

The amalgamation of the Pocahontas Collieries Company with the Pocahontas Consolidated Company, which was foreshadowed last year when the latter company began to acquire the stock of the former, has been formally recommended to the stockholders of the collieries company by its Executive Committee. The consolidated company now owns all but $26,000 of the $3,000,000 stock of the collieries company.

The Pocahontas Collieries Company also has outstanding $1,500,000 6 per cent. cumulative preferred stock and $1,250,000 5 per cent. bonds.

The plan of merger recommended contemplates the exchange of 5 per cent. first mortgage bonds of the consolidated company on equal terms for the preferred stock and bonds of the collieries company. The preferred stock acquired will be canceled. The mortgage of the consolidated company will permit the issue of $20,000,000 of these bonds, but only $6,000,000 will be issued under the plan except to acquire additional property.

Western Florida, Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana—Showers Sunday and probably Monday; fresh east to southeast winds.

The cotton market was less active and showed rather a reactionary tendency under reelizing and some selling for a turn. The close was barely steady at a net declino of from 2 to 5 points. Sales for the day were estimated at 75,000 bales.

The opening was steady at an advance of from 2 to 4 points on firmer cables and bullish week-end figures. The visible supply statement showed a decrease in the visible supply of American cotton of about 135,000 bales for the week, against a decrease of 78,000 bales for the same week last year, and spinners' takings for the week were placed at about 243,748 bales, against 202,942 bales last year. The present visible supply of American cotton is about 724,000 bales in excess of last year's figures. Cables from Bombay report that cotton mills there are going on short time.

GRAIN AND PROVISIONS.

WHEAT—An opening advance of ⅝ to 1c per bushel furnished excitement in yesterday's market, but it was noted that large blocks of wheat were on sale in all markets, and prices immediately broke, continuing under pressure all the forenoon, although the news was as bullish as ever. The cable news was particularly strong, especially from the Continent. Antwerp was up 1¼c a bushel, having advanced steadily for the last four days. Berlin closed 1¼@2¼ marks net higher, and Budapest was up 11 points. Liverpool closed ½ to ⅝d net higher. Cash wheat in New York was steady, with No. 2 red quoted at 87¾c, elevator, and 88¾c, free on board, afloat; No. 1 Northern, Duluth, 06¾c, and No. 2 hard Winter, 91¾c, free on board afloat.

CORN—The feature this morning was a cent jump in May at New York, due to manipulation. The Liverpool advance of ⅛ to ¼d cut little figure, and up to the close the market was influenced principally by wheat. On the curb May was quoted at 60¼c and July at 58¾c. Exporters took one load, and cash corn in New York was steady, with No. 2 quoted at 60c, elevator, and 59½c, free on board, afloat; No. 2 white, 59c, and No. 2 yellow, 58¾c.

MORE BOGUS N. & W. BONDS.

Magistrate House, in the Tombs Court yesterday held three men in $2,500 bail each on the charge of swindling Frank B. Crawford, a decorator, out of $3,500 by means of one of the bogus Norfolk & Western Railway bonds that were set afloat a year or more ago.

The examination in the case was ended about 3 o'clock, and the Magistrate then granted an honorable discharge to George Horn, Jr., proprietor of the café at 96 Cathnrine Street, where the trick was supposed to have been worked. Those held were William Houghton of Mount Vernon, Frederick Robinson, whose address was refused, and Charles E. Ackron, once proprietor of the notorious Tivoli, on West Thirty-fifth Street. As none of the trio could produce bail, all went to the Tombs.

C. Augustus Seton and his companions in the forgery of the Norfolk & Western securities are now serving terms in State prison. Ackron and his companions are said to have obtained one of the bonds which they passed on Crawford.

Robert J. Haire of 74 Lafayette Street, counsel for George Horn, Jr., and presumed to be representing the defendant Robertson as well, said after the hearing that because of certain information he had received he could not appear for Robinson, and that he understood Robinson had made a statement to the District Attorney concerning the case. Apparently this had exonerated Horn, inasmuch as no appearance was made against him. If it is true that Robinson has confessed, it may throw new light on the Norfolk & Western forgeries.

MAYOR PICKS NEW POLITICAL ADVISER

Corporation Counsel Ellison Now Directing McClellan's War on Murphy.

FEATHERSON DROPPED OUT

It was learned last night that there has been a material change in Mayor McClellan's political cabinet within the last week and that Corporation Counsel William B. Ellison is now adviser in chief, in political as well as in legal matters. Maurice Featherson, ex-Dock Commissioner, has been relegated to the rear rank and Mr. Ellison is said to be absolutely in command. Incidentally, there has been renewed activity in fighting Charles F. Murphy through the New York Contracting and Trucking Company, in which Mr. Murphy' brother, John, is largely interested, and which has the contract for the excavation work on the new Pennsylvania Railroad terminal.

The Corporation Counsel made his influence felt first in the appointment of John Purroy Mitchell as Commissioner of Accounts in place of George Von Skal, who was generally believed to be rather friendly toward Borough President Ahearn, whose department is being investigated. Mr. Von Skal, it will be remembered, resigned so suddenly to make room for Mr. Mitchell that two hours later he was asking whether he had resigned or had been removed.

Later in the week Mr. Ellison's hand was noticeable in the appointment by the Mayor of the three City Magistrates. The appointees were Frederic Kernochan, A. C. Butts, and C. N. Harris. The last two mentioned are assistants in Mr. Ellison's office. Mr. Kernochan was appointed by the Mayor, it is said, on personal grounds. As there had been all sorts of influences brought to bear on the Mayor to appoint favorites of this or that organization or individual, the fact that Mr. Ellison's two assistants got places is a fair indication of his popularity with McClellan at this time.

In the appointment of the Magistrates, too, the relegation of Mr. Featherson to a back seat is very noticeable. Mr. Featherson, who undoubtedly has for many months been preparing for the fight the Mayor is expected to make at the next primaries, had his own selections for the three places on the bench. That his selections would receive at least some consideration was the generally expressed opinion about the City Hall. His men were not appointed and it is said that he first learned who the actual appointees were from reading the newspapers.

Since Mr. Ellison virtually took command of the Mayor's political forces, he has had numerous conferences with the heads of city departments, and has, in most cases, come to a thorough understanding. Among those whom he saw and talked with at length were Police Commissioner Bingham and Health Commissioner Darlington.

Not very long after the Corporation Counsel's visit to Mr. Darlington the Health Department decided that the noise made by the steam drills used in the excavation for the Pennsylvania terminal constituted a nuisance and three violations were filed against the New York Contracting & Trucking Company, which have the effect of prohibiting the carrying on of the drilling work at night. The police are required to enforce the ruling of the Health Department and it is said that Commissioner Bingham will have sufficient policemen in the vicinity of Thirty-fourth Street and Seventh Avenue hereafter to see that the nuisance is not maintained.

As a matter of fact, the stopping of the night work on the contracting company's one remaining big job constitutes the hardest blow that the Mayor has yet struck at the Murphy brothers. All the estimates on which the contract for the job was based contemplated the working of three shifts of men.

Ex-Commissioner of the Land Office Cleared of Charge of Destroying Records.

WASHINGTON, April 27.—Binger Hermann, ex-Congressman from Oregon and former Commissioner of the General Land Office, was acquitted of the charge of destroying public records by the verdict of a jury, rendered at 12:40 o'clock today. The trial had progressed for twelve weeks, and the jury deliberated for twenty-one hours.

The defendant received many congratulations in the courtroom. Mr. Hermann expressed his thanks to each juror, as did his counsel. United States Attorney Baker was among those who congratulated him.

LONDON, April 27.—An important statement was made to me to-day bearing on the row that Germany has kicked up over King Edward's Mediterranean cruise. Unfortunately it is impossible to associate with the statement the name of its author, but the readers of THE TIMES may rest assured that it comes from a man of great prominence in international affairs who has close relations with the British Government and is on confidential terms with the King.

There is every reason to attach importance to this utterance, though there are absolutely convincing reasons why the gentleman who made it should be unwilling that the public should know who is responsible for it.

In answer to the question, "What do you think of the Mediterranean affair?" the gentleman replied:

"It seems to be one of the fruits of the Anglo-Italian entente, which I regard as about the most dependable thing in European politics, for, although it is not a matter of record, like other ententes, neither party to it ever wavers in distrust or jealousy.

"Anybody might have predicted that German editors would raise a ruction over the royal meetings at Cartagena and Gaeta. Anybody might have predicted that English editors would reply with contemptuous and galling raillery, and, of course, it is not astonishing that France has got into the row through her silly alarm about the flirtation of her ally with the House of Savoy, nor that Italy has risen in her dignity and advised the Germans that they have made intolerable fools of themselves. It is a rather widely prevailing fuss, taking it all in all, isn't it?

"While the effect of King Edward's visits to the sovereigns may have great significance from the standpoint of international politics, I personally believe the tour was made solely for the object of pleasure. We must remember that the Queen has just emerged from mourning. This is the first opportunity she has had in a long time to leave England for extended travel with propriety. Much has been made in the foreign press, especially in Germany, over the King's growing popularity in Europe, which has been much enhanced by his recent visits to Paris, his meetings with King Alfonso, and the personal amenities and private interviews between him and King Victor Emmanuel of Italy. Germany is always ready to send forth the cry that King Edward is secretly working to cement the powers of Europe against her. From an intimate knowledge of King Edward's character and policy, I believe I can say without fear of contradiction from any well-informed quarter that he is not seeking trouble with Germany. At the same time he is wise enough to take care of eventualities.

"It may truthfully be said in this connection that such motives as the Germans ascribe to King Edward, though not in my opinion in conformity with the facts, might be justified by Germany's past attitude toward England. In addition to the Kaiser's hostility, as reflected through his representatives at the Algeciras Conference and other stands openly taken by Germany against Great Britain's interests, there have been many hostile moves made by the Kaiser that are not generally known. Were I to recount the incidents referred to, I would at once reveal my identity, which I do not wish to do. Suffice it to say that if every move made lately by Germany were known, the public would have good reason to understand the present hue and cry raised by Germany over King Edward's visits to the Mediterranean Kings.

"Personally, I believe the dissatisfaction expressed by the French press over the King's meeting with the King of Italy is a mere flash in the pan. No sudden outburst in France should be taken as a barometer of public opinion. The fact that Italy has lately been pushing forward in Palestine, Syria, and Tripoli for advantages lost by France perhaps has made the French people a bit resentful toward Italy. The journey of the King of Siam to meet King Edward I do not consider a matter of great significance. The meeting seems to me quite the natural thing. I cannot verify the report that King Edward is going to Russia to see the Czar, but if a meeting should take place undoubtedly it would be an interesting item in the political history of Europe.

"There is not the slightest doubt that wherever King Edward may be he constantly keeps watch over the interests of his kingdom and people, and neglects no opportunity to advance those interests, but he has no animus against any other power. Nobody can say truthfully that he has made, or contemplates making, any hostile move toward Germany or any other country."

This may be accepted as the British official view of the Mediterranean affair. To a large extent it does not differ from the German official view, as disclosed at the German Embassy in this city. The people there regret that German editors have questioned King Edward's right to visit the heads of other States while on a cruise. Nothing, they say, could be more natural and proper than his meetings with King Alfonso and King Victor Emmanuel, and nothing more foolish than to suggest that he is spending his holidsy making trouble for Germany.

"Are the Kaiser and King Edward on good terms?" I asked the Secretary of the Embassy, who, in the absence of the Ambassador, received me.

"Oh, yes," he replied, "their relations are all that could be desired."

The Secretary said he had not the faintest notion what was meant by the allegation that the Kaiser had made many hostile moves against Great Britain. He was quite astonished when told that it came from a highly authoritative, responsible source.

British Minister Proposes a Substitute for Annuities.

LONDON, April 27.—The Rev. T. E. Ruth of Liverpool made some of his fellow-Baptists fairly gasp as he talked the other afternoon before the Baptist Union, which was holding its annual session in this city. His subject was superannuated clergymen, whose treatment by his denomination he considered very disgraceful. He offered what he called a barbaric suggestion, and said he thought its adoption would be a decided advance on Christian ethics.

His suggestion was of the Osler sort. Like Osler, he fixed an age limit beyond which he would not permit those to pass for whom he was prescribing. And just as Dr. Osler, responding to a world-wide outburst against his declaration that men ought to be put to death at 40, pleaded that he was indulging in humor when he said it, so Mr. Ruth proclaimed that he had spoken as a humorist, but a good many who heard him unfold his suggestion prayed that they might not be around if he should ever again be taken with a humorous fit. This is what he said:

"We give our old ministers a miserable pittance which we call an annuity. I would suggest a kinder method. I would depute every year a man of 59 to take all our clergymen of 60 to the edge of a cliff. It should be a glorious Autumn afternoon. I would have the man of 59 address his seniors, pointing out the gorgeous cloud palaces in the western sky. He would say, 'Within are many mansions in my Father's house,' and bidding them take the path to golden glory which the setting sun cast on the silver sea, he would topple them gently over, one by one, and come away humming, 'Part of them have crossed the flood and part are crossing now.'

"No doubt he would chuckle to think that his turn would come next year. No doubt he would have a feeling of joy to think he had rendered God and his generation more service than an annuity fund."

The sentiments of those who heard these humorous remarks were somewhat divided. There was a certain amount of applause. There was also a distinct manifestation of disapproval. One venerable clergyman actually burst into tears, he was so shocked at Mr. Ruth's Neroesque humor.

MUNICH, April 27.—King Otto of Bavaria yesterday reached his sixtieth year of age. The unhappy monarch until recently used to have periods of lucidity, but nowadays, while his physical condition is good, his mental state is one of absolute paralysis. Reports are sent at regular intervals to the Prince Regent, Luitpold, but neither he nor any other relative ever visits the King, who used to betray irritation when they came.

Otto has with him at Furstenried Castle, which was formerly a pleasure resort of the Kings of Bavaria, a marshal of the court, two gentlemen in waiting, two physicians, and once a week, the celebrated alienist, von Grashen, pays a visit.

PARIS, April 27.—The bogey of "the man on horseback" has been raised by Gaston Calmette, the well-known editor of Le Figaro, who declares that France is on the road to ruin and in need of a strong man.

M. Calmette urges the Government to dissolve the General Federation of Labor, close the Labor Exchange, and show energy in its dealings with the unreasonable demands of workingmen, whose revolt is a menace to the security and well-being of the country. He adds:

"If the Cabinet does not take measures for national preservation, it will be overthrown in the near future for the benefit of the Socialists, and the Socialists in their turn will be driven out by a dictator, who already haunts the dreams of millions of tormented minds."

It is not alone in the columns of the opposition journals that a note of alarm is struck. Papers like Le Temps and Le Journal des Débats betray considerable uneasiness and call on the authorities to neglect no precautions to cope with the situation which may develop on May 1, Labor Day.

The arrangements made in connection with the Prefecture of Police and the Military Government of Paris are announced to-day. The garrison of Paris will be kept in its barracks throughout the day, with detachments ready to march at a moment's notice. The Republican Guard and the entire police force will be mobilized, but unless unexpected developments occur between now and May Day there will not be a display of troops on such a considerable scale as last year, when soldiers were stationed in advance at all the mairies, railway stations, public buildings, and chief squares.

Orders have been given which will enable drafts of cavalry and artillery to be brought into Paris on short order from the neighboring towns.

LONDON, April 27.—Sir Frederick Treves, the famous anti-fog agitator, says he has demonstrated that there are six tons of smut to a square mile of air in London whenever there is a thick, prolonged fog, and there is a lot of smut in the air all the time. Thus it comes about that every adult who has lived his life in London, instead of having pink lungs like a child—pink on the surface and pink all through—has lungs of a dingy blue, a thundercloud hue, marked with lines, patches, and streaks of darker blue, which permeate the inner depths of the organ.

Trouble caused by breathing the impure London air, says Sir Frederick, is the starting point of appalling misery. London fogs kill people, not by the scores and hundreds, but by thousands.

Everything ought to be done, Sir Frederick says, to banish the London fogs, which are so thick sometimes that, according to Whitechapel tradition, people are able to lean against them.

LONDON, April 27.—Time alone will tell how Marie Corelli will come out of her latest encounter with the camera fiends. She may have triumphed over them. On the other hand there presently may appear in the public prints some photographs of her that will set the world grinning as it grinned when it saw that bizarre picture labeled "Marie Corelli getting out of a four-wheeler."

Miss Corelli and a friend were caught at Shakespeare's tomb by a press photographer. When the novelist became aware that she had been snapshotted she turned a lobster color, but a moment later, recovering her self-possession, she approached the photographer, smiling, and demanded a pledge not to publish the photograph. The man hated to give the pledge, but finally yielded to Miss Corelli's blandishments. Then she gave him her hand and smiled wider than ever.

While in the midst of the smile she heard the click of another camera. It appeared that another press photographer had made a group picture of the photographer, Miss Corelli's friend, Miss Corelli herself, and the handshake and smile.

"Come here," said Miss Corelli to the offender. He came, and Miss Corelli wheedled a promise out of him not to publish the group picture.

Miss Corelli thinks she may rely on the two pledges, but the chances seem to be the other way.

LONDON, April 27 —Americans these days rarely see the flag of their country displayed by officials of the American Government stationed in Europe. My attention was called to this fact to-day by a Chicagoan just arrived from a tour of the Continent.

"One would think," said he, "that Old Glory was a thing to be ashamed of from the way our Consuls, Ministers, and Ambassadors keep it out of sight. Consul General Wynne of this city, so far as I know, is the only man in the American Consular or Diplomatic Service in Europe who daily flies the flag in front of his office. He keeps it on duty from 10 to 4 every day, like the fountains in Trafalgar Square.

"I remember when more of our flags were to be seen in front of embassies and consulates in Europe than those of any other country. It is not so now. Japan is on top, and our flags are carefully hidden away in the cupboard. We see plenty of American flags, but about all of them are flying in front of shop windows as lures to American tourists. I counted seven to-day over entrances to Regent Street shops. I wish our friend Roosevelt, some day when he is not working overtime, would look into this matter and see if the Star-Spangled Banner cannot be put to better use in Europe than to make money for European shopkeepers.

"We Americans who travel want to see that banner floating at the flagstaff of every office in Europe in which an American Government official does business."

LONDON, April 27.—It is rumored among Americans in London that the inscription "Ichabod" which was chalked in big letters on the portico of the City Temple early Thursday morning was the work of two young Harvard graduates.

It is impossible to confirm the rumor, but it does not seem an improbable story, for the deed was just the sort that a very young American college student would be apt to glory in.

The significance of the inscription was easily understood by the members of the congregation, who recalled the impressive address made five years ago by Dr. Parker, the man who made the City Temple famous:

"Should it ever come to pass," said the doctor in the course of his address, "that the great truths of Christ's death and resurrection be denied by any future occupier of this pulpit, should the fact of his gracious Godhood and divinity be questioned, may the word 'Ichabod' be written over the doors of the City Temple."

Well, the thing has come to pass that Dr. Parker had in mind, for the Rev. Mr. Campbell, who now occupies the City Temple pulpit, has, in his "New Theology," proclaimed a dissent from what Dr. Parker regarded as the essential truths of Christianity.

So the time was ripe either for a devout adherent to Dr. Parker's theology or a practical joker of the Harvard variety to take his chalk and ladder and write the opprobrious word Dr. Parker described.

The thing was done at about 6 A. M. At that time two stylishly dressed young men arrived in front of the City Temple with a pushcart on which was a long ladder. They put the ladder against the portico and one of the young men climbed it while the other remained below to keep it from slipping.

There are nine large panels in the portico of the Temple, and the man on the ladder did the job patiently and well.

BERLIN, April 27.—I have shown the speech of Melville E. Stone, in which he declared that Americans had not been quite fair to Germany in regard to the Diederichs episode in Manila Bay, to Prof. Hans Delbrück of the Berlin University, one of the best-informed men in Germany.

I pointed out the statement in which it was insinuated that Andrew D. White, when Ambassador in Berlin, had suggested the attitude of the German naval squadron which resulted in an apparent attempt to block the work of Admiral Dewey. I also showed the Professor Mr. White's denial. Prof. Delbrück said:

"You may remember that in the Spring of 1898 the late Frederic W. Holls was here on a secret diplomatic mission connected with the Spanish-American war. He told me in the most categorical manner possible that the United States would take the Philippines, but would certainly not desire to cede or sell them to Germany."

The former private secretary to Mr. White, who is still in Berlin, confirms what the former Ambassador says in denial.

MOROCCO EXPECTS AID FROM GERMANY

Delaying Execution of Mauchamp's Slayers and Payment of Indemnity.

MAY ARM AGAINST FRANCE

Conference at Fez Decides That Every Sacrifice Shall Be Made to Defend the Capital.

PARIS, April 27.—Although the French warships sent to Morocco to lend the appearance of strength to Consul Courri's mission to witness the execution of the murderers of Dr. Mauchamp have arrived off Mogador, there seems to be a hitch in the Sultan's programme to see that justice is done, both in the shape of executing Mauchamp's assassins and the paying of the indemnity. Evidently the Government at Fez expects some sort of intervention from Germany—at least a word of hope or of encouragement from the Wilhelmstrasse.

This indifference of the German Kaiser to the obligations imposed by the Act of Algeciras, while it has not so far upset the equilibrium of the Paris press, is extremely annoying, although the French are confident that the eleventh hour has passed and that their practical possession of Oudja and Lalla Marnia, as well as the posts in the Moroccan-Algerian Hinterland, make them masters of any situation which may arise from within or be injected from without.

A telegram to L'Eclair from its Tangier correspondent may throw some light on the delay of the Sultan in carrying out the Mauchamp programme: "An extraordinary conference took place at the Sultan's palace at Fez on Monday. Those present resolved that every sacrifice should be made to defend Fez against the French, but the Sultan gave assurance that the French harbored no designs against the holy city, and he urged his hearers to calm the populace in order to prevent regrettable incidents, which might involve the ruin of Morocco."

Apropos of Germany's annoying indifference, Le Temps indicates that it may arise from other and more personal reasons than a vague desire to make France uneasy and give hope of intervention to the Maghzen. "It is but natural," says this paper, "that the firm of Renschenhaus, which did not sign the Act of Algeciras, should seek and obtain concessions. But if those concessions be contrary to the engagements entered into by the German Government, it is also natural that it should be expected formally to remonstrate with the firm.

"What is strange is that Dr. Rosen, the German Minister, while in Tangier made no observations of this matter, and so he has been unduly led to support the Renschenhaus concessions—concessions which his Government cannot possibly support, without incurring the displeasure of the signers of the act. It was Germany that wanted the Conference of Algeciras. France in agreeing to attend it was absolutely sincere. Germany in taking part in it was also certainly loyal. Europe, which was only desirous to abstain from it, consented to warrant the engagements taken. In Morocco, so far as economic matters are concerned, there is but one law for foreign Powers—that of adjudication. It must be obeyed. If the Maghzen wants to construct drains, a boulevard, or anything of the kind, let it make an adjudication—a passing of judgment."

But whatever be the cause of Germany's silence, one thing is certain: should any mishap occur to M. Courri's mission to Marakesh, or should the terms of the Mauchamp programme be not carried out, a break will instantly ensue between Morocco and France, and the latter will not wait for word from the Wilhelmstrasse before invading the country in force.

BERLIN, April 27.—American newspapers which commented upon the lack of interest in the Peace Conference displayed by the German visitors to Pittsburg have reached here. The coldness of the Germans occasioned no surprise—on the contrary, their attitude evidently gets official approval.

Although not at liberty to quote my informant, who is one of the highest officials in the empire, I can state with certainty that the question of partial disarmament was never more unpopular in Germany than at the present day. The speech of President Butler of Columbia University, in which he used the term "exaggerated armament," is reproduced here, having a special reference to Germany.

On this question the Imperial Government entertains pronounced convictions. Germany, it is declared, has in no sense an exaggerated armament. On this question my informant spoke as follows:

"I can only find three grounds for saying that our armament is exaggerated. First, our geographical position; but surely Germany may well claim the necessity for arms in this respect. Secondly, the number bearing arms in proportion to the population; but this shows a smaller percentage than in France. Thirdly, financial ability to maintain the armament; in this respect we have a better rate than England or France.

"Aside from this, Germany sees in the Eastern situation the cause for grave concern, and in this she believes America is vitally interested. After a careful investigation, Germany is convinced that Japan is overrated and China underrated.

"The development of China is certain, but it should be made under European or American auspices, not Japanese. China was reaching out toward Europe until England made her treaty with Japan. Up to that time Japan was isolated, and China, seeing her advantage, acted with the European powers and ignored Japan. The English alliance changed it all over night. Japan was recognized and admitted to the Concert of World Powers. There could be no further disadvantage to China in closer relations with Japan, and ever since they have been increasing. England's act was near-sighted, selfish, and against the interests of civilization.

"At the time the American question could not have been foreseen, but it is the duty of statesmen to steer clear of just such embarrassments. We have also our African question and our Austro-Hungarian question, but above all we fear the Eastern situation as it is now drifting."

LONDON, April 27.—The trial of what is known as the "£1,000 spook case" is attracting much interest in London. The case grows out of the claim of J. N. Maskelyne, the London illusionist, to £1,000 offered by the Rev. T. Colley, who calls himself Archdeacon Colley, for the reproduction by trick of certain effects the clergyman witnessed which, he said, were due to the influence of spirits.

There seems to be no reasonable doubt that Mr. Maskelyne earned the money, but Mr. Colley would not pay, and in the course of time Maskelyne, in a pamphlet, said things that Colley didn't like, the statements including an allegation that Colley had no right to the title of Archdeacon. Colley sued for libel, and Maskelyne made a counterclaim for £1,000.

It looks as though Mr. Colley would lose both ways. He was under cross-examination a day and a half, and fared much as that Pittsburg alienist whom Mr. Jerome so unmercifully wigged at the beginning of the Thaw trial.

ROME, April 27.—Mgr. Francis Bourne, Archbishop of Westminster, London, is in Rome, and, according to reports in circulation, is here "to fight America."

It seems that, from reports which have reached him, at the next consistory there will be only one Anglo-Saxon Cardinal, and, of course, the Archbishop from mixed feelings of patriotism and nationality, and possibly of personal ambition, would like to obtain that single red hat, should it be destined to rest on an English head.

He and his friends have abundant arguments to sustain his cause. England has now been without any member in the Sacred College since the death of Cardinal Vaughan in June, 1903. They point out the necessity for the Catholic Church in England to have a high dignitary, in order to maintain her prestige and influence, which practically means that there is no one but Mgr. Bourne who can be thus honored, as the other candidate who has often been mentioned, the learned Benedictine, Abbot Francis Aidan Gasques, would have to be called to Rome as a Cardinal of the Curia, to which the Pontiff objects, as he thinks that the Cardinals living in Rome are already too many and weigh too much on the finances of the Holy See, from which they draw their salary.

Archbishop Bourne also hints that his elevation to the purple being delayed places him in a difficult position, he appearing as though he were not fit for the place. Among his predecessors, Mgr. Wiseman was appointed Archbishop of Westminster on Sept. 29, 1850, and created Cardinal the next day, while Mgr. Vaughan was nominated to the Archbishopric on April 8, 1892, and entered the Sacred College nine months later. Although these are not precedents, still it becomes quite marked that Mgr. Bourne, who was the first Archbishop appointed by the present Pope on Sept. 2, 1903, four years later has not yet received the red hat.

He, or rather his friends furthermore argue that America, having already one Cardinal, does not need another, especially as there are already two Irish Cardinals in the persons of Michael Logue, Archbishop of Armagh, and Patrick Moran, Archbishop of Sydney, so that the appointment of whatever ecclesiastic that is now prominent in the American hierarchy would in reality mean another Irishman in the Sacred College, as all the candidates in the United States, such as Mgrs. Farley, Ireland, Ryan, &c., are either Irish born or of Irish parentage.

The object of Mgr. Bourne, however, may be defeated, he having the original sin in the eyes of those now in power in the Vatican. It must not be forgotten that when Mgr. Vaughan died, Leo XIII. was still alive, and the list sent to the Congregation of the Propaganda for the choice of his successor contained, besides Mgr. Bourne's name, that of Raphael Merry del Val, then a simple prelate, but President of the Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics here. Agitation was started among English Catholics to oppose the appointment of Merry del Val, and it was supposed that Mgr. Bourne, who was then Bishop of Southwark, had considerable part in it, although it was led by the Duke of Norfolk protesting against the mere idea of having for Archbishop of Westminster a prelate who, although born in London, was a Spanish subject and the son of a Spanish diplomat.

BERLIN, April 27.—Attention has been aroused by Prince Henry XXXII. of Reuss, who has matriculated in the Commercial University of Cologne. The Director, Prof. Eckert, in his inaugural address to the students, said:

"When the social position of the merchant is improved we shall behold Germany like America and England, where near relatives to royal houses engage in business life. Our best intellectual forces devote themselves more than ever to fostering our economic life.

"We find among the new arrivals a member of one of the oldest German royal families who, by his resolve to devote himself to business pursuits, breaks the prejudice—as if noble birth were incompatible with commercial gain.

"Heretofore Princes of royal houses have matriculated in ordinary universities, without, however, taking the studies very seriously; but a purely commercial university, such as the one in Cologne, has had no attraction for them. Now that a Prince has matriculated with the serious intention to study, this university may attract other serious royalties."

PARIS, April 27.—Statistics are not available of the number of Americans now in Paris nor of the profits to Parisian trade accruing from their presence, but the figures would cheer up even the most pessimistic of the croakers who are lamenting that things are going to the dogs under the existing régime. Perhaps never before have there been so many Americans in Paris at this season of the year.

J. Pierpont Morgan has arrived from Aix-les-Bains, where he has been sedulously taking the cure, the world forgetting if not by the world forgot, since his trip to Italy. An army of art and curio dealers is preparing to lay siege to his rooms at the Hotel Bristol, and there is some talk of the members of the Academy of Inscriptions and Belles-Lettres extending a special invitation to him to visit the Palais Mazarin and receive the thanks of that learned body for his courtesy in lending a precious illuminated manuscript dating from the period of St. Louis. Mr. Morgan's well-known dislike for public appearances, however, may nip the scheme in the bud.

Mrs. John Jacob Astor has joined the ultra-fashionable set at the Hotel Ritz. Consuelo, Duchess of Manchester, has set the fashion of Dutch treat luncheons, where nobody need laugh at anybody's stories but his own.

Another American Duchess who has been lunching there two or three times this week is the Duchess of Marlborough. Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt and her sister, Lady Herbert, the widow of the late British Ambassador at Washington, are often there together.

Mr. and Mrs. Cornelius Vanderbilt came up from the Riviera at the beginning of the week. They had a pleasant time cruising in their yacht in the Mediterranean, though one projected expedition to Corsica from Cannes had to be postponed owing to extremely bad weather.

Mrs. C. S. Thompson of New York gave a dinner party, with Gen. and Mrs. Winslow among the guests, and Theodore Meyer gave a large party.

With the delightful weather Paris has been enjoying the greater part of the week, al fresco luncheons and teas have been in favor, and among the many well-known Americans who have been seen at the resorts in the Bois de Boulogne and the garden of the Ritz are Mr. and Mrs. Thomas F. Walsh, Mr. and Mrs. Bradley Martin, Mrs. Cavendish-Bentinck, Mrs. Walter Burns, Mrs. Potter Palmer, who is installed in her apartment and expects to pass most of the Summer in Paris, with occasional visits to friends in the country; Major and Mrs. Blackburne, the latter a sister of Count Reginald Ward; Mr. and Mrs. Lucius K. Wilmerding, Mr. and Mrs. L. H. Littlefield, Mrs. Frederick Nellson, and Mr. and Mrs. J. Lorillard.

A dinner party at the Ritz one evening included Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Carter, Elisha Dyer, and Mr. and Mrs. Biddle. Mr. Carter is delighted with his new Panhard, which met him on his arrival at Havre, and in which he ran down to Paris in rapid time, leaving by the wayside some of his light baggage, which was dislodged while bumping over an unexpected rut.

***

J. Ogden Armour, accompanied by Archie Valentine, has arrived from London and has purchased a fine touring Mercedes machine, in which he is making a number of trips around Paris before starting on a tour through the château district.

***

Mr. and Mrs. L. Beekman arrived in Paris to-day, having come from Pau by motor. They will remain some time in Paris.

***

Wayne MacVeagh, former American Ambassador at Rome, with his wife and daughter, has arrived from Italy and will make Paris his headquarters for a month or two.

***

***

Mr. and Mrs. Peter Martin are enjoying Paris so much that they have taken an apartment. Anthony Drexel has also left his hotel for a private apartment in the Avenue du Bois de Boulogne, his wife having sailed on the Kaiser Welhelm der Grosse. Mr. and Mrs. H. S. Lehr left for New York on the same steamer.

***

Mrs. George H. Holt and Mrs. Martin have gone on an auto trip to Italy. They expect to be back in Paris in about a fortnight.

***

Mrs. C. A. Spreckels has gone to Berlin to visit her son-in-law and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. Spencer Eddy, and with Mrs. Havemeyer and Mrs. Henry Munn.

***

S. H. Schumann and family of Boston are at the Elysée Palace Hotel, where they will probably remain some weeks longer. Mr. Schumann, who is interested in various philanthropic undertakings in America, has been studying the working of Parisian methods in practical philanthropy.

***

F. J. Pierce of New York, after a tour of the world, has arrived in Paris, accompanied by his brother. Mr. Pierce said he enjoyed the trip immensely. He started at San Francisco and visited Japan, China, India, and Egypt. Japan interested him greatly. He thought the Japanese had made great strides. Mr. Pierce at present is confined to his hotel with a sprained ankle. He slipped on a marble floor. He possesses a fine 70-horse-power motor car and hopes to make excursions in the environs of this city.

***

Among the departures by the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse this week were Mrs. F. H. Harriman, Mrs. F. E. S. Hadden, Mr. and Mrs. Stanley Mortimer, Mr. and Mrs. H. L. Platt, Mr. and Mrs. Alfred N. Ran, Mr. and Mrs. F. N. Doubleday, and T. St. John Gaffney.

***

Walter Wellman says he has been kept extremely busy since his arrival in Paris informing reporters that he has nothing to say until he is able to throw open his balloon shed for inspection about the second week in May. He leaves for Spitzbergen May 15.

***

James B. Regan, proprietor of the Knickerbocker Hotel, in New York, has purchased from a Paris art dealer two handsome old French tapestries, which New Yorkers will soon have an opportunity of admiring in the restaurant of his hotel. Mr. Regan, who is accompanied by his wife, is enjoying himself automobiling and theatregoing, now that he has finished the business which brought him to Europe. He sails for home next week.

***

***

Mr. and Mrs. William M. Laffan, who have been here for a month past, will leave soon for Aix-les-Bains for the cure. The Laffans have been making trips in the neighborhood of Paris, in their newly purchased 40-horsepower automobile.

***

Mr. and Mrs. Nathaniel Thayer of Boston, who have been in Paris for some weeks, have left for London. The marriage of their daughter to Count von Moltke, attaché of the Danish Legation at Rome, will take place soon.

***

Mrs. H. R. Reynolds and Miss Reynolds of New York have arrived at the Hotel Liverpool from Italy and the French Riviera, en route to London.

Mrs. C. O. Alexander and Miss Berger, who have been visiting Mrs. Spreckels, have left for Italy.

They intend to come back leisurely through France, arriving in Paris at the beginning of June, when they go to London, where Mrs. Saunderson will be presented at Court. Mrs. Saunderson is the daughter of John D. Archbold, Vice President of the Standard Oil Company, and her marriage last Spring at a fishing club on the Island of Cuttyhunk, off New Bedford, was a surprise to her friends. Her husband is a son of the late Col. Saunderson, for many years a member of Parliament for Belfast.

ACADEMY IN DISGRACE AGAIN.

Rejects Bust of Spanish Queen—King Edward Orders That It Be Shown.

LONDON, April 27.—The Royal Academy is in disgrace again, thanks to the rejection by the Exhibition Committee of Conrad Dressler's bust of the Queen of Spain. The bust was subscribed for by forty Peeresses, headed by the Duchess of Sutherland, as a wedding gift to King Alfonso. The marble is now in Madrid, the bust the Exhibition Committee rejected being the original plaster model for which the Queen gave sittings at Cowes.

As soon as the bust was rejected it was offered to the New Gallery and gladly accepted, just as, two years ago, Thomas's statue of "Lycidas" was accepted by that gallery after its rejection by the Academy. But Dressler's statue had hardly been placed in the New Gallery before the Directors of the Academy came to the Directors of the rival establishment begging that it be sent back to the Academy. It had been rejected by mistake, they said.

The New Gallery wouldn't give up the bust until the Academy people confessed that they wanted to get it back because the King had commanded that it be shown at Burlington House. It is now said that there was no sculptor on the Exhibition Committee, so the statues were judged by painters.

LONDON, April 27.—Charles Frohman says not a line will be changed in "Strongheart," which will be produced at the Aldwych Theatre on May 8, with Robert Edeson in the principal part.

"I have decided," said he, "to give the play here just as it has been given in America, slang and all. I believe the play will make a big success or a big failure on this account."

William Forbes, who has come over in advance of the company to do a little press work, will first invite the attention of Londoners to the fact that Siegfried, the dog which is one of the important characters of the play, cannot come to England unless the Home Secretary suspends the law relating to the exclusion of dogs. Forbes contemplates circulating a petition in the dog's behalf. He thinks that would be a good stroke of advertising.

BERLIN, April 27.—At the annual meeting of the German Shakespeare Society in Weimar, last Tuesday the principal address was made by Dr. Ludwig Fulda, the distinguished poet-dramatist. His subject was "Shakespeare's Comedies and To-day."

Dr. Fulda made an earnest protest against Tolstoy's abuse of Shakespeare. The address was enthusiastically received by the audience.

The Shakespeare Monument in Weimar which was injured by vandals three years ago has been restored by the Shakespeare Society. Next year the society will offer a prize for the best acting version of "Hamlet" in German.

BERLIN, April 27.—It is reported that Governor von Putkammer is to return to his post in the Kameruns. There will be a storm of indignation in Germany if the news be correct.

Yesterday the disciplinary court fined him 1,000 marks for having issued a fictitious pass to his sweetheart, whom he alleged to be a cousin, Baroness von Eckhardstein.

The latest phase of the scandal is that a real cousin of the Governor, Madeline von Putkammer, a talented writer, has written a comedy telling of the exploits in the Kameruns of her relative.

PARIS, April 27.—The tongues of the gossips are wagging furiously today with the report that the arrival of the Duke of Marlborough in Paris, where his American wife has been stopping for some time past, presages the reunion of the couple, who have been living apart under the terms of a formal deed of separation.

I am assured that there is no ground for the report beyond the natural hope of relatives and friends that a reconciliation will never be an impossibility.

RICH FIND OF THORIUM.

YEKATERINBURG, Province of Perm, Russia, April 27.—Rich deposits of thorium, used in the manufacture of incandescent filaments, have been discovered in an abandoned mine in this vicinity.

Thorium, one of the rare metals, was discovered by Berzelius in 1828 in a Norwegian mineral called thorite, from the Scandinavian god Thor. Water does not act upon it, and nitric and sulphuric acids act on it with difficulty.

LONDON, April 27.—The editor of The Statist thinks that if the present British Government stays in power until 1913, close to £100,000,000 of the national debt will be redeemed, and the debt will then stand at about £600,000,000, or about £50,000,000 above the amount outstanding before the South African war.

PARIS, April 27.—Jean de Reszke has just arranged by cable with Olive Fremstadt, the American singer, formerly of the Hoftheater, Munich, and late of the Metropolitan Opera House, to sing the rôle of Salome here after the third performance. In the first three performances the part will be sung by Emmy Desmlnn.

Two or three of de Reszke's American pupils will soon make débuts at the Opéra Comique.

***

An orchestral composition by Ernest Schilling, the pianist, who made a tour of the United States two years ago and who married Miss Lucie Draper of New York, is to be given at the beginning of May at Amsterdam by Herr Mengelberg, who conducted the Philharmonic concerts for a season in New York. Schilling's work is entitled "La Legende," and when it was produced last November it met with such a success that arrangements were made to repeat it in the next series of concerts.

***

Miss Mary Louise Rogers, a niece of James A. Deering, the well-known New York lawyer, has just returned to Paris after a successful series of concerts at the Casino-Municipal of Nice. Miss Rogers has a remarkably fine contralto voice and has been described as an American Clara Butt, whom, by the way, she closely resembles in physique.

***

Frank King Clark went from Paris this week to Brussels, where one of his pupils, Miss Rennyson, made her first appearance at the Theatre de la Monnaie as Elsa in "Lohengrin." Miss Rennyson is well known in America, having been one of the leading sopranos in Henry W. Savage's English Opera Company. Mr. Clark is now in London, where another American pupil, Claudia Laselle, is about to make her début in light opera.

HOTEL KEEPERS REFUSE TO YIELD

BIG AMERICAN TIPS BLAMED

PARIS, April 27.—According to the police reports, the waiters on strike number just over 500. The losses their absence from work has entailed on certain establishments will amount roughly to 25,000 francs daily.

M. Clemenceau's advice to the café and restaurant proprietors to submit their differences with the striking waiters to arbitration has borne no fruit. As cabled on Wednesday, the waiters' syndicate accepted the proposed arbitration with alacrity, but a majority of the employers are bitterly opposed to it, and decided at a general meeting to refuse to entertain the plan.

Meanwhile it is being borne in upon the public that the tipping system is the root of all the trouble. One paper, Le Gaulois, has suggested that "pourboires" be done away with altogether, and the idea has been taken up by Etienne Glen, the proprietor of the Café Riche, who submitted to his fellow restaurateurs a scheme by which waiters should be paid a regular salary and the public be charged a certain percentage on the bill and so relieved from tipping. The system of "pourboires," however, is so ingrained in Parisian habits that M. Glen's proposals are hardly likely to find acceptance.

America, by the way, are held to be indirectly responsible for the present strike. It is an indisputable fact that the excessive generosity of American visitors in the past years has raised the standard of tips in Paris. Where 5 centimes was a sufficient tip ten years ago, twice that amount must be given now. For a small service for which a 10-sous piece used to be considered an adequate remuneration, anything less than a franc is likely to be sneered at nowadays. The café and restaurant keepers were not blind to this fact, and raised the charges they levied upon the waiters.

With reference to the question of waiters being allowed to wear mustaches or beards, it is interesting to note that the matter forms the subject of a bill laid before Parliament at the last session. Antide Boyer, the Socialist Deputy from Marseilles, is the author of the bill, which consists of two clauses, the first making it illegal for any employer, either by verbal or written contract, directly or indirectly, or under any pretext whatsoever, to forbid an employe to wear a mustache; and the second clause making any person convicted of having acted contrary to the spirit of the first clause liable to a fine of from 150 to 500 francs and from fifteen days to three months' imprisonment.

In the reasons he invokes in favor of the bill, Antide Boyer cites Tacitus as an authority for the statement that the ancient Germans reserved the right to wear the mustache to warriors who had distinguished themselves by feats of arms, and traces the history of the mustache through the centuries, showing that civilians dared not sport such hirsute adornment in the presence of military men till after the First Empire. "Nowadays," continues Mr. Boyer, "some misguided noblemen and presumptuous middle-class folk cling to the belief that they are honoring themselves by forbidding their servants, whom they treat as slaves, to wear mustaches."

M. Boyer decries "a custom which under a democratic republic is grotesque and humiliating," and declares that an end must be put to "the abuse of authority by employers who impose upon their employes a survival of bygone tyranny contrary to the principles contained in the Declaration of the Rights of Man."

CANADA TO SEND HORSES.

LONDON, April 27.—The British directors of the International Horse Show, who do not want the Americans to carry off the honors of the show, are greatly cheered by the news that the Canadian Government has promised a generous appropriation for the purpose of sending a national Canadian exhibit to the show. These directors were in a good deal of a funk until this word reached them.

It seems that they took alarm at the reports of the great expense that Mr. Vanderbilt, Mr. Armour, and other Americans were incurring in the expectation of capturing the best prizes at the show. They looked about for English exhibitors fit to offset the Americans and failed to find them. It is said that they came across nobody willing to spend money as the Americans were spending it, and failed to find studs from which hopeful selections could be made.

Then they called Canada to their help through one of the Canadian directors of the show, the Hon. Adam Beck of Toronto, who is a member of the Canadian Cabinet. Beck sent an urgent message to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, which was received soon after his arrival here for the Colonial Conference, and in response to the message the Canadian Premier promised an appropriation.

The English directors are greatly pleased. They would not mind very much having the big prizes go to Canadians, but it would humiliate them tremendously to have the Americans go home with the highest honors of the exhibition.

CHANCE OF DISSOLUTION

If It Comes It Will Be Due to This Attitude — Premier Stolypin's Offer.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 27.—The revelations of the treatment of political prisoners at Riga are the sensation of the week. In the outburst of indignation the somewhat surprising fact is overlooked that the envoy sent by Premier Stolypin to investigate the charges did not attempt to suppress the facts, as is the usual police fashion, but made a frank statement of many of the most blood-curdling details. When it is remembered that Russia to-day has more than 90,000 prisoners, held on more or less political charges, it is clear that the exposure of the treatment to which they are subjected comes home to nearly every household.

In the inhuman barbarity, such as has here been brought to light, is to be found whatever justification there is for the attitude of the progressive groups of the Duma in refusing to allow the resolution introduced by the Right, denouncing political assassination, to be brought to a vote, or even discussed.

"We cannot afford to do so," one after another of the leaders of these factions told me. "What little constitutional liberty we have to-day has been obtained not by speechmaking, argument, or logic, but by the dagger, the revolver, and the bomb. It is true that these are not our only weapons to-day, but if to-morrow, as many expect, the Duma is dissolved and a new election law promulgated, under which practically only Government officials can be elected, they would once again become our only means of salvation."

Not as an apology for the behavior of the Riga police officials, but merely to complete the horrible picture, I must say that during the last four months 116 Riga policemen have been foully assassinated, not killed in riots or in collisions with the people, and that the prisoners so barbarously treated are, for the most part, not idealists of the advanced movement in Russia, but savage Esthonian peasants who shot landlords from behind hedges and consigned defenseless women and children to the flames of their own burning homes.

The Caucasus-Polish group, which acts with the Constitutional Democrats in the Duma, adopted the following resolution on Thursday:

It is not very sweeping, nevertheless none of the other progressive groups will accept it. An inclination is manifested on every side to avoid the issue.

Prof. Miliukoff, M. Roditcheff, and other leaders are furious with the Poles because of their attitude. Deputy Hessen told me when I broached the subject to him that the Duma was not the place to deliver moral lectures. Of course this is very childish. The reign of political assasination is a question of the hour, and the place to discuss it, if possible, is the Duma. If the assembly is dissolved, it will not be because Deputy Malikin shook his fist in the face of the Minister of Justice, or because M. Alexinsky called the Minister of Finance a thief, but because, while not a day passes without scores of Government officials being murdered, a majority of the Duma cannot be brought to favor any resolution blaming in any way the perpetrators of these acts. If such a resolution is passed, Premier Stolypin pledges himself to abolish the military courts, but until it is done, he declares openly to all who question him, including myself, he will maintain martial law as his only weapon against the warfare of assassination.

"If half of what one hears is true," saya one correapondent, "the Duma is to be dissolved on May 2, but the trouble which I encounter is to ascertain which half of what one hears is the truth."

President Golovin's visit to the Emperor evidently passed off most pleasantly, and the monarch is now informed from a reliable and intelligent source as to what the Duma has done and what it proposes to do.

In the meantime those of us who are observing the course of events and are not engaged in the pastime of pure guessing are extending our acquaintance among the members of the Duma. The Right Wing made an excellent move in the last few days by refusing to follow Deputy Perushkivitch, who seems to be little removed from an idiot, and Deputy Krushevan, instigator of the Kishineff massacres.

Count Bobrinsky is a very intelligent young land owner of the Tula district, is a neighbor of Count Tolstoy, and promises to make his party a factor in the new era.

"I was a Constitutional Democrat, too," he said to me, "until they allied with the Revolutionists. We believe in a constitutional monarchy, not as yet in a Parliamentary Government, though that may come in time. We stand for the sacredness of property, and will not permit its expropriation either at the hands of the Revolutionists or the Constitutional Democrats. I seconded the interpellation of the Constitutional Democrats to investigate the conduct of the Governor of Moscow, and I am ready to help them to expose wrongdoing in Church or State wherever it be found, but I have small faith in the reforms preached by men who are thieves and murderers or, if possible, even worse."

Of the new men coming to the front Alexinsky, a workingman's Deputy of St. Petersburg is the most remarkable. He is hunchbacked and almost a dwarf. He has eyes like a serpent, and his hissing, vibrant voice compels attention even from those who loathe him. Though born of poor parents, he obtained a good education at Moscow University, and is a proofreader in private life. He has at times used language in the tribune which would never be permitted in the American Congress. On several occasions he has challenged the Government to arrest him and the members of his group.

"Be logical," he cried. "I, and all the members of my party are working for your overthrow. We hate the present régime in Russia, and are doing everything we can to destroy it."

On the other hand, he delivered a most intelligent criticism of the budget.

"I am a follower of Blanqui," he said to me yesterday. "'Neither God nor master' is my motto."

Stolypin May Force Reactionaries Out—Czar Snubs Deputies.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 27.—The lack of harmony between Premier Stolypin and the Recationary wing of the Cabinet culminated this week in an almost open rupture, and a reorganization of the Ministry appears imminent. Controller of the Empire Schpanebach, a Reactionary, who has been engsged heart and soul in the campaign for the immediate dissolution of the Duma, has already received an intimation that his resignation is desired. He has, however, appealed to the Emperor, declaring that he will resign only on the express command of his Majesty. He still retains his portfolio, although he is no longer admitted to the confidence of the Premier.

The deputation of Conservative peasant members of the lower house of Parliament was received by the Emperor today at Tsarskoe-Selo, and returned in a disappointed mood at the scant ceremony with which it was treated. It did not have a special audience, but was bunched with a big delegation of military men and Constitutional Democrats, and was greeted with the usual perfunctory expressions of his Majesty's pleasure at meeting his subjects. The Emperor did not give the spokesman of the peasant delegation an opportunity to deliver the loyal speech which he had prepared.

TO END DISPUTES WITH US.

British Foreign Secretary Confers with Colonial Premiers.

LONDON, April 27.—Foreign Secretary Grey is taking advantage of the presence of the Colonial Premiers in London to obtain the first hand views of Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Bond on the questions pending between the United States and Canada and Newfoundland, respectively.

The Secretary already has had one conference with Sir Robert, but it was largely taken up with the discussion of the modus vivendi which the United States and Great Britain signed to cover the last fishing season and to which the Newfoundland Premier strenuously objected on the ground of interference with the rights of the colony. Further interviews will occur, looking to the permanent settlement of the fisheries dispute. It is recognized that this is not easy of accomplishment, as there is a strong sentiment against any interference of the Imperial Government with the affairs of the colonies, and it is difficult to induce the Colonial Governments to recognize that local prejudices must give way to imperial considerations.

The Canadian negotiations are giving the Foreign Secretary even more trouble than those in which Newfoundland is interested, but every effort will be put forth to bring about an agreement. Premier Laurier has been too busy thus far with the imperial conference and social engagements to discuss questions with the Foreign Office, but he has made an appointment with the Foreign Secretary for the coming week, when the whole matter will be gone over.

Sir Wilfrid has spoken hopefully of the outcome, but from other sources it is learned that there are wide differences of views between Secretary Root and the Canadians. In almost every case the Canadians demand some compensation for what they are asked to concede. As an example, to give up pelagic sealing they not only ask the United States to buy out the sealers, but also want a further concession from the United States, which might take the form of a port in Alaska, to give traders an entry into the Canadian Yukon district without passing through American territory.

LONDON, April 27.—Tuesday we shivered with a biting east wind. On Wednesday, which had all the warmth and sunshine of a typical Summer day, I went with many others to Dorchester House, where Ambassador Reid presided at a meeting of the Dante Society.

It was a gay scene in spite of the serious matter on hand. Everybody was in Spring attire. The Prince and Princess Alexander of Teck were the guests of the afternoon; most of the embassies were represented, and every one appeared interested in the lecture, readings, and songs, all of which turned on Dante's never-to-be-forgotten Paolo and Francesca. Tea followed the entertainment, charmingly served in the banquet hall, where the tables and buffet were ablaze with yellow daffodils and narcissus.

Among the Americans I noticed Mme. de Dominguez, Mrs. Gibbons, wife of the Naval Attaché, and Mrs. Adair. Secretary Carter assisted the Ambassador to entertain the guests.

Many of her friends have been delighted at seeing the Duchess of Marlborough in Paris lately. They say that she looks very sad and quiet; but everybody worth considering, I am told, gives her the fullest sympathy. She has had hundreds of kind letters from English friends.

People here are much interested in the engagement of Miss Muriel Robbins to Cyril Martineau. Miss Robbins is a daughter of Mrs. Peter Collier and was one of the American débutantes in London last year. Her fiancé is well known in London. He is a widower, his wife having died in childbirth.

***

Mr. and Mrs. J. A. Clarke are among the many Americans who have been enjoying an exceptionally gay season in Paris and leave there soon for New York. Mrs. Clarke was Miss Evelyn Bigelow, daughter of Poultney Bigelow, the well-known publicist and friend of the German Kaiser. Her younger sister, Dorothy, is not yet out, but she promises to be even handsomer than Mrs. Clarke.

***

Mrs. Bates Batcheller, author of "Glimpses of Italian Court Life," is coming to London soon. She has been wintering in Rome and has seen a good deal of Italian royalty, of whom she had much to say in her book. Just before Mrs. Batcheller left Rome the other day on a trip to Sicily and Greece, Queen Margherita gave her a beautiful diamond pendant mounted with the Eagles of Savoy.

Alfred Vanderbilt has gone to New York, to return very soon. He saw a good deal of social life during his stay in London. Last Sunday he made up a party for a drive to Hampton Court, but it was such a vile day that the only one of his invited guests who kept the engagement was Craig Wadsworth, who rather prides himself on being quite independent of weather conditions.

I hear that Lady Barrymore talks of giving a ball this season. It is a long time since she has entertained to any great extent. Her daughter, Mrs. Nellie Post, who has usually gone out under the wing of her aunt, Mrs. Adair, and many other Americans mean to entertain largely this season, though they have not definitely announced their plans. Mrs. Ridgeley Carter will entertain much, as will Mrs. Chauncey and Consuelo, the Dowager Duchess of Manchester. They expect to have a series of parties, dances, &c.

***

Mrs. O'Brien, (née Lewis,) daughter of Mrs. T. Henry Mason of New York, has taken a house for the season, and I hear that Mrs. O'Brien's sister, the Princess Chartes, of Isemberg, also may take a house and do considerable entertaining.

***

Mrs. Hunniker, who has built a house in Charles Street, also means to give some parties. If Mrs. Ronalds keeps in good health she will resume her now famous Sunday musicalee.

Many American women were present at the reception given by the Duchess of Sutherland at Stafford House for the Colonial Premiers. Among them were Lady Barrymore, Lady Craven, and Lady Tankerville.

A large number of foreign royalties are coming here soon. The King and Queen of Denmark, Prince and Princess Guetavus Adolphus of Sweden, the Crown Prince and Princess of Roumania, are all expected during the season.

London hotels are beginning to take on a Yankee aspect. The stream of Americans from the Continent continues, and the influx from New York has set in. Nathaniel Thayer, who has been at the Berkeley for a week, was joined yesterday by his family, who came from Paris. At the same hotel are J. W. Appleton of New York, George L. Dresce, and Charles Head of Boston.

Mrs. Marshall Field has returned from the Isle of Wight and is at Claridge's. Miss Paul of Philadelphia and her sister, Mrs. Mills, are also at Claridge's after a six months' tour on the Continent. At the same hotel are Miss Whitaker and Miss Hall of Chicago and J. Ross and family.

The Americans at the Ritz include George Howard Chase, E. G. Voss, S. Singer, J. Rothschild, Albert C. Bostwick and family, and J. J. Van Alen.

The recent American arrivals at the Carlton include David E. Oppenheimer and Miss Oppenheimer, Frank V. Strauss, H. Sonn and Miss Sonn, Mrs. M. Kaufmann and Miss Kaufmann of New York, A. Loring Swazey, Mr. and Mrs. F. E. Snow of Boston, E. W. Cramer, F. A. Marsh of Chicago, and J. H. Cottman.

HAU TAKEN TO BADEN-BADEN.

Walking Tests to be Made in the Famous Murder Case.

KARLSRUHE, Germany, April 27.—Karl Hau, Professor of Roman Law in George Washington University, who is charged with the murder of his mother-in-law, Frau Molitor, at Baden-Baden, in November last, was transferred from here to Baden-Baden yesterday. He will be present while the court determines the time required to walk from the house which was occupied by Frau Molitor to the scene of the tragedy, and also the time it would take to walk from the Post-office to the house.

The Public Prosecutor has concluded his investigations in London and Paris. The latter were undertaken in company with Hau's lawyer. The investigations at Constantinople will be ended next week, but the conclusion of the investigations in the United States must be awaited before the trial can begin.

ROME FILLING UP WITH AMERICANS

TWO STORIES OF DIPLOMACY

Special Cablegram.

ROME, April 27.—As the magnificent, balmy weather advances—neither hot nor cold, but just pure Spring—the number of prominent Americans increases, especially those who are automobiling.

Mrs. Hanna, widow of the Senator, was here at the Excelsior Hotel for some time. She is automobiling and is accompanied by Miss Phelps, but not in her own car. She has a Mercedes, driven by the owner, engaged in Paris, which she finds a delightful arrangement, as she notices an appreciable difference in the care with which it is driven. An owner will take no chances with his own automobile, and the occupants thus feel perfectly secure.

Mrs. Hanna, although finding many friends in Rome, did not appear often in public, but she saw much of Mr. Griscom, the American Ambassador, to whom she had a letter from President Roosevelt, in spite of the fact that she has known the Ambassador since he was a small boy and that he is simply "Lloyd" to her. She has just left Rome for Perugia, Assisi, and Florence in the motor-car, and will ultimately end up in Paris before sailing for home, with the firm resolution never again to be bothered with her own automobile, but go on the new plan.

The same arrangement of hiring a man and his car can be made in Italy, with this difference, that it would cost one-half. Thirty dollars a day would cover all the hirer's expenses, while in France it comes to about $60 daily, without any advantage.

Haji Ali Ghois, the Khan or General of the Bakhtiari region of Persia, has just come and gone. He is a most interesting personage and an old friend of the Griscoms. Indeed, his first visit was to the American Embassy, considerably upsetting the nervee of the lesser personnel, unaccustomed to euch gorgeous apparitions.

When Mr. Griscom was Minister to Persia he decided to go into the interior, and Mrs. Griscom insisted on accompanying him, notwithstanding the warnings of more prudent friends. One bright morning, on horseback, the cavalcade started. It was composed of the guards of the Shah, servants, and pack mules with tents and provisions, and directed its way toward the dominions of Haji Ali Ghois, a powerful chief, who was the master of 60,000 armed men, and who very often snapped his fingers in the face of the Shah, and who was supposed to be suspicious of foreigners.

All went well until the boundary of the Khan's territory was reached, over which the soldiers of the Shah refused to put foot. But it eventually made no difference, as the Khan sent his own men as an escort. While on their way to the seat of their hoat, the escort was twice attacked, once in a hand-to-hand struggle, Mrs. Griscom bearing up in a manner we are accustomed to call "manful," but which is adopted by many ladies.

The first act of Haji Ali Ghois was to send a detachment of 500 men to exterminate those who had made the attack. This was neatly accomplished, it is said, although no European eye witnessed it. The visitors, after their fifty days' ride, covering a thousand miles, were magnificently entertained and tasted all the delights of the East, stopping for several days.

Now this Oriental Khan has been Mr. Griscom's guest, in his turn tasting Western hospitality and cordiality. The late Sir Henry Layard, at the time of Mr. and Mrs. Griscom's visit, was the only other European known to have visited the district.

Rome has also been giving hospitality to Mr. and Mrs. Wayne MacVeagh and Miss MacVeagh on their way home from Algiers, where they went for Mr. MacVeagh's health, as it was feared that his cough might lead to something serious, but he is happily now much better.

They found their few days here delightful, as Roman society had by no means forgotten the time—1893-1897—when Mr. MacVeagh was Ambassador here. They were deluged with invitations, but only accepted one, and that was in the nature of a command. The Queen mother reigned in those old days and was very gracious to the American Ambassador. After the death of King Humbert she settled again in the Eternal City, but this time in the palace where the MacVeaghs had lived, so that in the ten years which have passed there have been various messages passing between them. She, therefore, insisted on their coming to see her now—"That you may see your old home again." She kept them a long time and showed them what changes had been made in the disposition of the roome, and was exceedingly gracious.

The presence of the MacVeaghs reminds their friends here that the ex-Ambassador was the inventor of a new way of keeping awake when Ambassadorial duties become somewhat irksome. One day, many years ago, I was sitting beside him at a great gathering of Americans to hear a lecture on archæology by Prof. Tracy Peck of Yale, then head of the Classical School here. The Ambassador struggled heroically with the sleep which was overtaking him. I thought he was conquered when what was my astonishment to see him brighten up, with occasional lapses always followed by a look of pain. My curiosity got the better of me, and looking closely I found that he was sticking himself with a pin, a regular jab, constant repetitions of which produced a drop of blood. Somewhat later I passed the secret on to the British Ambassador, Sir Francis Bertie, who was occasionally afflicted in the same way, but he preferred the disease to the cure.

GERMANY WANTS AIRSHIP.

Wrights' Invention Soon to Have an Official Test.

BERLIN, April 27.—Probably within a fortnight arrangements will be made whereby the Wright brothers of Dayton will give a demonstration here for the German Government of their flying machine.

Their terms are regarded here as high, but it is believed that the Wrights come nearer to solving the problem of aerial flight than any of their competitors.

I understand that they ask $400,000 if a flight of fifty miles be successful, for which they will furnish twenty-five machines. As no portion of the machine is patentable they insist on having a contract before the demonstration.

It is not known here why their negotiations with the French Government were broken off, but the French are now directing their energies toward the Lebaudy machine.

The Aero Club of New York recently endeavored to interest the United States Government in the Wright invention. The War Department was willing, but the Wrights asserted that they had previously been insulted in correspondence with the Department and were unwilling to resume negotiations until an apology was made.

Neither the Department nor the club saw any insult in the correspondence, but the Wrights remained implacable and the matter was dropped.

BERLIN, April 27.—Under the title "What is Social Progress?" the Kaiser's brother-in-law, Duke Ernst Günther, publishes in The Deutsche Revue an interesting article in which he comes to the conclusion that the solution of the social question depends on a proper reform of the houses of workmen.

German as well as American architects now more than formerly devote themselves to the problem of creating rational, pretty workmen's dwellings, such as may be seen in the models to be exhibited all over Germany.

A picture by Böcklin has been confiscated at Frankfort. Some time ago it disappeared—was stolen—from the Ducal Museum in Weimar. It represents a landscape with a female figure. It was first sold to an art dealer in Berlin for $250. He sold it at auction for $3,000. The picture has repeatedly changed owners and wandered to Paris, Hamburg, and Vienna. Last year it was sold in Frankfort for $6,500.

The first step in the direction of protection of home workers is embraced in a bill just submitted to the Reichatag for the regulation of cigarette manufacture. It is no longer permitted to use sleeping rooms for the making of cigarettes. Fines are to be imposed, ranging from $30 to $250, for violation of the act. For touching cigars to the mouth while making a fine of $7 to $50 is imposed. It is admitted that it will be extremely difficult to enforce the law.

FRENCH DEMAND TARIFF WAR.

PARIS, April 27.—Urgent instructions have been sent to Ambassador Jusserand at Washington to protest against what is alleged to be the injustice of the charge of fraudulent undervaluation of Limoges porcelain, and to request that an expert be appointed to come to France and investigate the prices, pending which, it is said, the present consignments held up in New York should be released on the deposit of a bond to cover the duties should the charge of undervaluation be sustained.

Another deputation from Limoges was received in audience to-day by Premier Clemenceau. The delegates contended that the porcelain held up in New York was really overvalued, as the prices included the commissions of the agents to which it was consigned.

The Government here is especially embarrassed by the action of the United States customs officials at this time, as it is likely to increase the difficulties with which it may have to cope on May Day, for which occasion the Socialists are preparing demonstrations throughout the country. About 1,500 men employed in the porcelain industry of Limoges will be compelled to remain out of work pending the adjustment of the difficulties.

An official of the Foreign Office remarked with regret to-day that the growing tariff complications with the United States were assuming a phase which threatened to disturb the good relations between the two countries. New vexations in the administrative regulations against French goods, the official added, were being put in operation in New York, and this, together with the public resentment at the fact that the United States has seen fit to ignore France in the negotiations for a tariff arrangement with Germany, had created a demand for reprisals, which the Government was finding hard to resist. The latest complication comes on the heels of the action of the French Government in suspending the Porto Rican coffee decree until August.

The critical nature of the situation is fully recognized by the importers of American goods in this country. Consul General Mason has already advised Secretary Root to appoint a commission similar to the one sent to Germany, in the hope of reaching a mutually satisfactory settlement. Ambassador White has taken up the subject and probably will recommend an identical course.

COUNT TOLSTOY IS CONVERTED

He Believes In and Advises a Revolution to the End.

NO PASSIVE RESISTER NOW

Let People Unite and Fight Government to the Death, He Says.

TWO EXILES CHANGED HIM

Showed That as the Czar Refused Both Land and Work They Could Not Exist.

BERLIN, April 27.—Count Tolstoy's revolutionary pamphlet, which was prohibited in Russia, is to be brought out here in a fortnight. It is entitled "The Way to Social Liberty." Although it embraces a dual appeal to both the Russian Government and the people, its chief aim is to arouse the latter to the belief that the only cure for present evils is a successful revolution. Tolstoy practically repudiates his former principle of passive resistance and boldly declares for a war against the present Government to the death, each individual being inspired by what God has at all times demanded for the existence of human beings.

Formerly Tolstoy preached the gospel of the return of the individual to the soil, and demanded that an end be put to the revolutionary movement in Russia, and that, through his teachings, Government and revolutionist be reconciled.

But, as he himself realizes, this was a dream never to become a reality, and he now demands that the Russian people shall unite, and, to the very death, fight the present Government, for the Government refuses the people the most important factor in human existence after air—earth.

"For the tilling of the soil," continues Tolstoy, "you need people of different classes, of various walks of life—doctors, preachers, teachers, students, professors, journalists, lawyers, merchants. You must own sufficient land, so that none by force shall take away your possessions, place your sons in the army, and, above all, so that none shall force you to commit evil deeds, and all this can be avoided if you do not obey the commands of government desiring to destroy your bodies and your souls."

Tolstoy next relates the evolution of his thoughts and analyzes the reasons for his change of attitude—from passive resistance to resistance by force. This is the most valuable part of the pamphlet. He writes:

"About two months ago two young men came to me and asked for books. I asked them who they were, and they answered 'Workmen.' They were laborers who had been expelled from Moscow because they were supposed to have participated in an armed outbreak. Both men had white, clean teeth and black, fearless eyes. Both were well read. They were orators of the proletariat—Social Democrats.

"I asked them if they had read 'Soil and Liberty.' I also asked them what they thought about the book. They said:

"'What is stated there is true.'

"'What is true?'

"'That it is impossible to live if one has neither land nor work. The Government oppresses and strangles the people for absolutely nothing.'

"And the men began to tell, interrupting each other, how the Cossacks struck people with leather whips—how houses were bombarded—how entirely innocent people were slain.

"Upon my rejoinder that the uprising had been an unreasonable undertaking, one of the men smiled, and said:

"'We are of a different opinion.'

"When I spoke of the sin of murder—of God's command not to kill—one of the men shrugged his shoulders and answered:

"'Why, how according to the law of God, can the proletariate be exploited, as was formerly the case? We now come to realize that we cannot go on in this way.'

"I brought out some books, principally of a religious nature. They glanced at the titles and appeared dissatisfied. We continued to converse. They made it clear to me that only through stopping every measure of force on the part of the Government—not only the executions, but the arrests and banishments—could this fearful animal-like fight of a people be stopped.

"I am now strongly convinced that the best the Government can do is to give in to the Revolutionists, but, at the same time, such a proposition on my part may be considered an expression of my insanity, and I am also reminded of persons near me—revolutionists, conservatives, peasants—unhappy Revolutionists manufacturing bombs, unhappy, misguided people ordered before field courts-martial, and then shot—I am reminded of them. They all put the same question: 'What shall we do?'

"And I now reply: 'You shall not do what the Czar's Ministers and soldiers, or even the Chairmen of the Revolutionary Committees try to compel you to do. You shall do what appeals to you as men following the prayer that sent into the world which gave you a definite and a clear divine law known as conscience. Finally do only that which at all times God has demanded, so that the absurd and destructive fog now existing will disappear.'"

ANOTHER INDIAN MUTINY IS FEARED

VOLUNTEERS ARE ARMED

LAHORE, Punjab, April 27.—Rifles and twenty rounds of ball cartridge have been served out to the local volunteers in consequence of signs of marked unrest among the Hindu student elements.

The publication of inflammatory and seditious articles in the native newspapers, inciting race hatred toward the Europeans and demanding native control of the Government of India by means of an elected Parliament, has been followed recently by riots at Lahore and elsewhere in the Punjab and by attacks on Europeans.

Professional political agitators are now fomenting strikes on the railroads, and the Government has concluded that it is time to suppress the rioting, by forcible means if necessary. The authorities are satisfied that a determined front will speedily end the outward signs of disaffection, especially as they have the unanimous support of the great Mohammedan population, who at numerous mass meetings have emphatically condemned the anti-European movement.

Recent events have given a remarkable impulse to enlistment in the volunteers. The recruits include five Judges of the Supreme Court, the Director of Public Instruction, university professors, high Government officials, and leading bankers and merchants, all of whom have entered the ranks as privates.

LONDON, April 20.—The signs of unrest in India are seriously alarming the people of this country, to whom the possibility of another Indian mutiny has always weighed like a nightmare.

Two days ago the newspapers published accounts of serious riotings at Lahore growing out of the conviction of two native journalists, charged with exciting race hatred against the Government and the European community. These men accused an English officer of wantonly shooting, while on a sporting expedition, a Mussulman policeman who accompanied him, merely for refusing to do menial work which the man was not bound to do. They accused the Government of hushing up the matter, adding, "European murders of natives usually escape in this country."

The story was proved to be a complete fabrication and the men were convicted. They refused to express contrition, which would have resulted in a mitigation of the sentence, and while they were being conveyed to the prison at Lahore the prison van was stopped and assailed by a riotous mob, the police in charge were pelted with mud, and the two convicts were greeted as popular heroes and crowned in Oriental fashion with garlands. The mob afterward proceeded in procession through one of the principal streets of Lahore and assaulted every European it encountered.

In commenting on this news THE TIMES to-day expresses the alarm of the English people and Government. It remarks that the gravity of the trouble is increased by the fact that the Punjab has only recently been invaded by the agitation, which has hitherto been chiefly centred in Bengal, adding:

"Sir Denzil Ibbetson, who has just taken up the reins of government in the Punjab, may be trusted to put down any overt manifestations of lawlessness with a strong hand, and we cannot doubt that he will have the full support of Government. But what is even more disquieting than such overt manifestations is the dangerous spirit which underlies them. The official correspondence published at the time of Sir Bampfylde Fuller's resignation showed how that spirit was not only being fostered by the reckless speeches of political agitators, but actually instilled into the rising generation in schools and colleges, many of them dependent in whole or in part upon the support of the State.

"We have no wish to reopen past controversies, but the fact cannot be ignored that measures which are liable to be construed, however erroneously, as signs of weakness, though they may be inspired by the most conciliatory intentions, serve to embolden rather than to disarm the apostles of sedition. In Eastern Bengal, for instance, the Bengali Press loudly asserted that the disaffection which prevailed there was mainly due to the provocative attitude of a Lieutenant Governor who was out of sympathy with the people. Eight months have elapsed since the Lieutenant Governor, upon whom so much abuse had been heaped, resigned his office. Whether it was wise or unwise to sacrifice, or to incur the appearance of sacrificing, to popular clamor an able and distinguished officer, who had been specially selected for a post of exceptional difficulty, one might have hoped by this time to discern at least some signs of improvement in the situation, which his resignation, we are told, would substantially help to relieve.

"Unhappily, anti-British feeling in Eastern Bengal appears not to have lost, but to have gained in virulence. There has been no improvement in the tone of the Bengali Press, and no abatement of the social persecution which victimizes those who dare to be loyal to the Government. Meetings continue to be held at which the most seditious views are openly promulgated.

"The 'Swadeshi' movement, which aims at the boycott of British goods, is now too mild for the extremists; they have substituted for it the cry of 'Swaraj,' which implies the subversion of British authority.

"We need not lay much stress on the fact that the students of one of the Government high schools burned down their schoolhouse. The disturbances which occurred at Comilla at the beginning of last month were more serious than anything which the new province had hitherto witnessed. A public meeting was held there by the Mohammedans in support of the partition of Bengal. That the train which conveyed the delegates was nearly derailed by a Hindu pointsman may have been an accident, though the Mohammedans do not think so. But it was no accident that the Mohammedan leader, the Nawab of Dacca, one of the non-official members of the Viceroy's Council, was grossly insulted by a mob of Hindus as he drove through the streets of Comilla, that his private secretary was brutally assaulted later on in the evening, and that one of his followers was shot dead and another wounded. Had it not been for the admirable self-control of the Nawab and his immense influence over his co-religionists who form a large majority of the population, a very serious conflict would have ensued.

"The contempt for authority which such incidents denote is a very serious symptom in a country where authority has happily rested hitherto more on the prestige of the ruling race than on any exhibition of mere force. In Bengal no doubt contempt for authority is not likely to develop into organized attempts to subvert it, for the Bengali does not rank among the fighting races of Hindustan. But what if that contempt spreads to other parts of India where deeds follow more quickly upon words? Can it be denied that it is spreading when in a city like Lahore Englishmen are attacked in the open street and in full daylight for no other reason apparently than that they are Englishmen?"

German Employers Have Forbidden Employes to Celebrate It.

BERLIN, April 27.—All appearances indicate that May Day will be observed less generally than usual in Germany. Many municipalities have forbidden street parades or other public demonstrations, and the employers' organizations as a rule have taken strict measures to prevent the workingmen from celebrating the day, using the threat of a week's suspension without pay if the men absent themselves. This brought the Hamburg stevedores to terms.

The Social Democratic National Committee has issued the usual proclamation calling on the Socialists to observe the day, but the appeal is entirely lacking in energetic proposals. It urges the local organizations to study the situation for themselves, and then only celebrate the day if they can do so without getting into trouble with their employers. The proclamation has been the subject of criticism on the part of the stalwart Socialists, but the leaders in their speeches defend the moderate recommendations as being the only wise course, in view of the thorough organization and firm attitude of the leading manufacturers.

RUSSIA AND JAPAN AGREE.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 27.—The end of the Russo-Japanese negotiations is now in sight. Treaties covering fisheries and commerce and the traffic convention regarding the Manchurian railroads are well advanced. A full agreement on all points is expected within three weeks or a month.

The protocol of the fisheries arrangement, which has been the main point of contention, is not yet signed, but only a few minor questions remain to be settled.

A Russian commission is on the point of leaving St. Petersburg for the Island of Sakhalin to continue the work of delimiting the frontier.

TOKIO, April 27.—The Russo-Japanese negotiations on the fisheries question are reported to have resulted in a satisfactory agreement.

VENICE EXHIBITION OPENS.

Section Devoted to the Work of American Artists Admired.

VENICE, April 27.—In the presence of the Count of Turin, cousin of King Victor Emmanuel, and Minister of Education Rava, the International Art Exhibition was opened here to-day.

The American section was especially admired, the exhibitors including H. Anderson, Hendrik, F. W. Benson, Roopman, Gari Melchers, C. H. Miller, Scott, J. J. Shannon, Straus, and Eugene Vail. A special hall is reserved for the work of John S. Sargent.

BRITISH CRUISER LAUNCHED.

PEMBROKE, Wales, April 27.—The first-class armored cruiser Defence was launched at the dockyard here to-day. She is of the Minotaur class, has a displacement of 14,600 tons, and is expected to steam 23 knots per hour.

The Minotaur class of armored cruisers are 490 feet long, have 74½ feet beam, draw 26 feet of water, and are fitted with engines having 27,000 horse power. They have armored belts 46 inches thick, carry four 9.2-inch guns, ten 7.5-inch guns, and thirty small rapid-fire guns. They have five torpedo tubes, carry 1,000 tons of coal, have crews numbering 755 officers and men, and cost about $6,500,000.

TO WORK IN HERCULANEUM.

Archaeologists, However, Believe That Haste Would Be Costly.

ROME, April 27.—Education Minister Rava is preparing a bill asking Parliament for a special appropriation of about $5,000 yearly to excavate Herculaneum.

According to the leading archaeologists, including Prof. Boni, Director of the Excavations, it will be impossible to spend more on the work at present because the progress must be slow and the operations careful and gradual in order to be fruitful, as otherwise the excavators would risk damaging valuable objects which they may unearth.

Kiel Canal to be Deepened.

BERLIN, April 27.—The supplementary appropriation bill introduced in the Reichstag to-day provides $3,750,000 to be expended in widening and deepening the Kiel Ship Canal. The new depth will be thirty-six feet, and the total cost of the improvements is estimated at $55,250,000.

14 Births and 19 Deaths on a Ship.

HONOLULU, April 26.—The steamer Heliopolis has arrived from Malaga with 2,200 Spanish immigrants. During the voyage there were fourteen births and nineteen deaths. Those who died were all children, who suffered from measles.

Finland Punishes a Rebel.

HELSINGFORS, Finland, April 27.—A Russian revolutionist named Dolinsky has been sentenced to a year's imprisonment for spreading the revolutionary propaganda among the troops. This is significant of the changed attitude of the Finnish courts toward the Revolutionists.

Notes of Foreign Affairs.

SOFIA, April 27.—The French Vice Consul at Burgas has received a letter written in ungrammatical French threatening to blow up the Vice Consulate unless he contributes to the Macedonian revolutionary fund. Several persons have been taken into custody on suspicion. Several persons have been taken into custody on suspicion. The general belief is that the letter is a hoax played by some Greek for the purpose of creating international embarrassment for the Bulgarian Government.

BERLIN, April 27.—Members of the Centre Party to-day brought in an interpellation asking Prince Buelow, the Imperial Chancellor, to submit periodically to the Reichstag authentic information concerning Germany's foreign relations.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 27.—A dispatch received here from Tiflis says that famine is acute in Turkish Armenia, and that hundreds of peasants are dying from actual starvation.

SOME RECENT PICTURES

By Henry Golden Dearth at the Oehme Galleries.

Every time Mr. Henry Golden Dearth returns from his trips abroad he shows some distinct change in his style; so that, from having once upon a time been known as the quietest and least excitable of landscape painters he has become in the course of years a very kaleidoscope. Perhaps the crossing of the Atlantic shakes him up, and the result is always a slightly new and sometimes a decidedly novel rearrangement of his palette.

To one of his earlier phases belong such gray, sketchy pictures as "The Docks, Boulogne," and "A Bit of Old Montreuil." It is at Montreuil that he has his Summer studio, where he can find the ocean and the pastures of Normandy equally accessible. Later work is the phase shown by "The Peaceful Hour," with a church seen through the gathering darkness and in the foreground peasants loosening a team of horses from the plow. One thinks of Horatio Walker's French Canadian peasant-farmers and finds these Normans more modern than the colonizers who left the old stock long ago for homes across the ocean. "Moonrise, Old Town of Boulogne," is a harbor view with a fishing boat to the left on which a big gill net is suspended in the air. The moon has rose-colored clouds close about it, and the reflections of this sky upon the slightly undulating surface of the harbor is more than an ordinary performance; it is a masterly bit of work, which helps to place the picture in the front rank.

Another manner appears in "The Pool at Marenla, Picardy," where we have the red-tiled village roofs bright in the last rays of day and two white horses standing in the village pond as they drink. "The Popiars" is another village scene, perhaps in Montreuil; the time chosen, just after sunset, when the moon above the church hae turned from red or yellow to white, but has not yet reached the silvery stage. There is a matter-of-fact, almost dull character in "Pool at Marenla," and "Peaceful Hour," while the Boulogne harbor view and this nocturne called the Popiars have mystery and charm to an extraordinary degree.

But we are not at the end of Mr. Dearth's transformations. Here is a "Fantasy in Colors," with a temple of Vesta to the left and a statue of Diana the Huntrese to the right; groves of silver birch and groups of gayly clad people scattered about, as we see them in the pictures of Watteau and Monticelli. But they have no faces, these figurines; they are meant to serve merely as color spots in the composition. Similar is "Souvenir of Versailles." A crowd of brilliantly clad merrymakers groups itself on the marble steps that lead to a circular basin, and the lively colors repeat themselves in the smooth water.

Less violent in color notes, but still far from restful, is "Autumn Twilight," with its green sky and white, scattered clouds, its poplar groves and its half a moon peeping at itself in the pool—a lively color song!

"Russet and Gold" is exceptionally an American landscape; it has a cascade in the centre and a riot of color all round about the water. The same general theme is at bottom in "Golden Hour," where a circle of gold whirls about the central pool and the horizon is red. Scarcely more carried out, scarcely less a rounded picture, is "The Afterglow," wherein the sky above the horizon is all a raspberry red.

The dozen or more paintings to be seen at the Oehme Galleries during the coming week give little idea how Mr. Dearth used to work some years ago. He has felt the unsettling influences of art as it runs its course in France, and turned to ventures in sunlight ad color effects which carry him almost to the camps of the New Impressionism.

In all these pictures one feels a certain excitation like that from the brass instruments of an orchestra. You are taught nothing, of course, you are, indeed, told nothing of consequence, but your nerves are excited and you wonder what it is that gives you a sensation apparently without purpose or plan. It may be that longer study will find the miracle performed, and some of the pictures will become precious to you. In any case, go to see them and try to disentangle the sensations which they evoke.

Children's Lithographic Prints Pay 25 Per Cent.—Other Decisions.

In a decision by I. F. Fischer, the Board of United States General Appraisers sustained yesterday a claim filed by E. P. Dutton & Co. of this city against the imposition of a heavy duty on books for children's use with an illuminated lithographic print on the front cover, but none on the inside pages.

Collector Stranahan held the books as dutiable at the rate of 8 cents per pound under the provision in the Dingley tariff for "books containing illuminated lithographic prints," whereas the importers alleged 25 per cent. ad valorem as being applicable, this rate applying to "books not specially provided for" in the tariff act. General Appraiser Fischer, in finding for the importers, says that the Federal court in a former litigation found in favor of the contention now made by Dutton & Co., but that no opinion was handed down. Nevertheless, as the Treasury Department has acquiesced in the decision, the board finds accordingly.

A decision was handed down by the board adverse to the contentions of Robert Mayer & Co. and others of New York regarding the classification to accrue on importations of India transfer paper. Duty was assessed at the appropriate rates provided in Paragraph 401. The importers asked for duty under Paragraph 402 as paper not especially provided for, or else under the provision for printing paper. Neither of these claims is deemed well founded by the board.

Claims by Henry Gitterman & Co., regarding the classification of figured cotton cloth, and of G. W. Sheldon & Co. of New York, concerning the duty on magnesite brick, were overruled.

LONG BEACH, L. I.

Destined to be New York's popular and high-class seashore resort, and the home of its busy men.

An Island in the Ocean.

Twenty-four miles from the Metropolis and millions to spend in its development

Wednesday, May Fifteenth, will mark the formal opening of this magnificent stretch of beach between breaking ocean and glassy thoroughfare to the homeseeking and investing public.

We will have much to say to the world about Long Beach, after that date, about the new hotels and cottages we will erect, the piers, casino, wide boulevards, boardwalk, etc.

Prices will continually advance, but never recede. That has been the constant history of Atlantic City for thirty years. When the magnitude of this enterprise is thoroughly realized and the beauty and attractiveness of Long Beach is fully understood, with its there will be no holding it back.

Atlantic City Has Made Millionaires.

Long Beach, because of its accessibility and the magnitude of its assured improvements, will many times double the Jersey resort's wonderful record. But more of that later. Previous to May Fifteenth and the final adjustment and settling of prices and lots, an exceptional opportunity is offered to select the choicest sites.

The LONG BEACH HOTEL accommodates over 1,000 people, and cottages are erected on every side. We are preparing to build a 50-foot boardwalk, five miles long, with ocean piers, steamer landings, casinos, wide boulevards and parkways, and everything kept up on the highest type and highest class from a residential standpoint.

We have opened the Largest and Most Completely Equipped Real Estate Offices in America.

The County Seat of Nassau

MINEOLA

Greatest Railroad Center in Nassau

At no time in the year does the country look so beautiful and so enchanting as in the Spring, and if you want to see a magic country where hundreds of houses are building and thousands of people are migrating, take a train on Saturday or Sunday at our expense and visit the territory of Mineola.

You Have Read Where and How Fortunes Were Made.

You believed these advertisements were simply dreams created in the minds of visionary real estate men. But evidence and facts have proved to you that the County of Queens has made fortunes for men during the year 1906.

There Are Greater Chances To-Day Than Last Year.

And if you will only shake off suspicion and get speculative and take advantage of an excursion and go and look the ground over you can readily see there is a lot of money waiting on every corner in Mineola for the investor.

WHY?

BECAUSE IT IS THE COUNTY SEAT.
BECAUSE IT IS A RAILROAD CENTER.
BECAUSE IT IS THE CENTER OF TROLLEYS.
BECAUSE IT IS THE AGRICULTURAL CENTER.
BECAUSE LAND IS CHEAPER THAN ELSEWHERE.

WHY?

THE TIME TO GET IN IS NOW, TO-DAY, NOT NEXT MONTH.

FLORAL PARK is not a stretch of vacant land away from the railroad without a house or conveniences, but it's a beautiful, thriving town, with an all-the-year-round population of over 5,000 people.

Thirty-six new houses have been built in FLORAL PARK since last fall. Doesn't this demonstrate its rapid growth?

At present Floral Park has a service of 42 trains a day. When the great transit improvements are completed this service will be doubled.

There are stores, hotels, schools, churches, a fire department and all city conveniences, besides a charming little park.

Our property is within a few blocks of the railroad station, surrounded by attractive homes. Two-thirds of it has been bought up by investors and homebuilders since we placed the property on the market last spring.

If You Have Money You Want an Ideal Summer Home,

In the quiet of the country where you can rebuild your energies and indulge your hobbies—Ride, Drive, Shoot, Fish, play Golf, Bathe, Drive your car and enjoy yourself in the refined and exclusive circles of an old-established summer colony.

Shinnecock Hills (Long Island).

The most enchanting spot on the whole Atlantic Seaboard, is that place. Its natural features are unique, grand, imposing. Its water views are matchless—its facilities for outdoor sports unsurpassed in this country—its social advantages of the very highest character.

On Land and Yet at Sea.

At Shinnecock Hills Long Island narrows down to a mere isthmus—from one-half to two miles wide. The land there lies very high, rolling, hilly and decidedly different from any other part of Long Island. On one side of it sparkling Shinnecock Bay—on the other the beautiful blue Peconic.

It would be difficult indeed to find so perfect a combination of Land and Water as this, or a place so admirably suited to a summer home.

The climate is tempered by the cooling ocean breezes from both sides—so that summer life becomes a joy.

Another Newport in the Making.

Already some of New York's most exclusive families have established their summer homes among these grand old hills. Their mansions dot the landscape in natural settings of extreme beauty, their artistic facades harmonizing perfectly with their matchless surroundings.

Fortunate indeed that the development of this natural beauty spot, should have been deferred until now—when the experience of generations can be concentrated to make of it another Newport, with all of Newport's attractiveness, without any of Newport's objectionable features.

Already over $100,000 has been spent in improving this 2,700 acre property—the last high grade summer resort tract left so near New York where an ideal summer colony can be planted.

The making of roads and undergrade crossings is now under way and a modern inn with every home comfort is approaching completion.

If you want the perfection of a place for your summer home let us show you Shinnecock Hills.

Villa Plots--Sizes to Suit,

All highly restricted, are now being offered for the first time. Naturally there is a first choice.

If you would know more of this beautiful place send for our Free Illustrated Booklet, "On Land and Yet at Sea." It tells the whole story.

with a frontage of over a thousand feet on the famous Merrick Road, and also a frontage on the Springfield Road.

Convenient to the Springfield and Laurelton stations and the trolley line; directly opposite the Laurelton property and in the heart of Springfield.

As the land is nearly level, but little if any expense for grading will be necessary.

To be sold for $2,500 per acre, and at this price is an excellent opportunity, as nearly all the land in the vicinity is in the process of development and is being rapidly taken up by home builders.

Atlantic City.

Marlborough-Blenheim
Atlantic City, N. J.
April
The ending of Lent this year coincides with the beginning of April, the gayest and most distinguished mooth in Atlantic City's famous Spring season. During thie month more eminent visitors and "nice people" are to be found in the great hotels than in any other month of the year, and the absence of the Easter Sunday "INTERRUPTION" enables guests to completely enjoy all the attractions of olimate and artificial entertainment of this festive season with entire satisfaction.
The hotel claims distinction for ite location, its ample public epace devoted to its guests, its high-class music every night throughout the year, but particularly attractive with solo singers at the week-ends during the Spring season and ite ownership management.
All the four dining rooms (two American plan, with the excellent cooking heretofora so popular, and two a la carte, with separate kitchens and French cooks) have white service throughont, and in one of the American rooms, called the "American Palm Room," and in the a la carte rooms smoking is permitted. These are particularly attractive. Ocean and suites with large rooms 34 by 20 feet and a private bath (supplied with both sea water and fresh water and with running ice water) is with every alternate room in the Marlborough and with every room in the Blenheim, which in construction is reputed to be the most completely fireproof hotel in the world. Golf privileges.

COLUMBIA TAKES TWO-MILE TITLE

GREAT SERIES OF CONTESTS

Chicago Wins the One-Mile Race and Michigan the Four-Mile — Champions in Special Events.

PHILADELPHIA, April 27.—Columbia, Chicago, and Michigan won the intercollegiate relay championships on Franklin Field to-day, in the presence of 15,000 spectators, from the pick of the runners of the larger colleges in America. Columbia won the two-mile title from Yale, Dartmouth, Cornell, and Princeton. Chicago beat Pennsylvania, and Michigan downed Penn in the four-mile race. No records were broken, for, while the track was in fine condition, there was a bit of wind that handicapped the runners, and the day was brisk almost to cold.

The victory of Columbia was won after one of the most exciting races of the day. Taking the lead at the start, the Blue and White runers held it until the last relay. Then Jennings of Dartmouth shot ahead of Sanders, the Columbia representative, and led him all the way to the stretch, but he had not the stamina to sustain his great effort, and Sanders won out in one of the finest races of his career, finishing five yards to the good. Pennsylvania was without Taylor in the mile, and Chicago took the lead at the start and was never headed, while Michigan, too, led all the way in her race against the crack Eastern distance runners.

The results of the invitation events were even more notable athletically than the relays. Claude Allen of the Irish-American Athletic Club, the American champion, wearing the colors of Syracuse University, won the pole vault with a performance of 11 feet 10¼ inches. He then made a try to beat the world's record of 12 feet 4⅞ inches. Though he failed in this he succeded in clearing the bar at the remarkable height of 12 feet 1¼ inches. Shaw of Dartmouth won a remarkably close, interesting hurdle race from Hubbard of Amherst, McCullough of Pennsylvania, and Talcott of Cornell, who had qualified for the final, in the excellent time of 15 2-5 seconds. Garrels of Michigan narrowly missed a new world's record for the discus, hurling the missile 135 feet 9 inches. Moffett, Pennsylvania, won the high jump at 6 feet, Talbott of Mercersburg the hammer throw, with 153 feet 6½ inches, Krueger of Swarthmore the shot-put, with 43 feet 6 inches, and O'Connell of the New York Athletic Club the broad jump, with 22 feet 6 inches.

The championships for high schools and preparatory schools furnished fine sport, good time being made, notwithstanding the wind. Hill School of Pottstown won the preparatory school championship, and Brooklyn Manual Training captured the high school National championship. The Wendell Phillips High School of Chicago did not get a place. Summaries:

ITHACA, N. Y., April 27.—With Gov. Hughes as an interested spectator Cornell defeated St. Bonaventure at baseball to-day by the score of 5 to 0. The Governor hastened from a meeting of the Board of Trustees to Percy Field, accompanied by Dean Thomas F. Crane of the Cornell faculty. Crescent A. C. Downs Seventh Regt.

The pitching of Mackay, formerly of Yale, was the feature of the game yesterday between the Crescent Athletic Club and the Seventh Regiment teams at Bay Ridge, when the former defeated the military team by the score of 14 to 1. The game was in doubt up to the last half of the eighth inning, when Edwards went to pieces and the Crescents scored 11 runs. Mackay drove the ball over the left fielder's head with the bases full for a home run. Mackay kept the six hits scored against him well scattered and the only run scored by the soldiers was due to an error. Score:

PROVIDENCE, R. I., April 27.—A combination of poor fielding and free passes on the part of Killan in the first inning and heavy batting in the eighth inning of to-day's game gave Jersey City a 5 to 2 victory over Providence. Two or three times Providence made enough hits to fill the bases, but the following batsmen were unable to turn the trick. But one Jersey error was costly, and that one permitted Chadbourne to circle the bases when Woods threw the ball into the bleachers in fielding a short bunt. In the eighth, with two men on bases, Poland sent the ball clear out to the fence, Hanford's great catch preventing the tieing of the game. Score:

In the tenth inning of a fast, intensely interesting contest Washington yesterday won the fourth and final game of the series from the "Yankees" at American League Park. There was a great turn out to see the match, and the excitement in the closing innings was tremendous. After a pitchers' battle between Patten and Hogg in which the Senator had slightly the better of the argument, the game reached the final stage with the score tied at 1 to 1. Washington batted in one run and the Yankees tied the game again in their half of the ninth. Then Washington got another in the tenth, and though the Yankees made a game rally, they were unable to get the score across the plate. The game ended with the total 3 to 2 in favor of the Washington.

Washington was the first to score in the third. They held the lead until the sixth, when New York tallied on a base on balls, a wild pitch, and an out. Then in the ninth Hogg allowed Jones a single, then Perrine sacrificed him to second, and Ganley's single brought in the run. It looked like the finish for the Yankees, but Kleinow revived hopes by a pretty single. Thomas was sent in to bat for Hogg and sacrificed him to second, but Conroy flied out, and it was up to Willie Keeler. He came to time with a clean hit that sent the catcher scampering across the plate.

The enthusiasm was riotous as Kleinow touched the plate, but Elberfeld cut it short with a fly to Altizer. The crowd then settled down for the tenth inning. Keefe was sent into replace Hogg, and Schlafly opened up with a single. Cross followed with a second. On Anderson's hit to Elberfeld Cross was caught at second base. Altizer then drove the ball at Williams, who fumbled and allowed Schlafly to cross the plate with what proved to be the winning run. The two Senators then tried a double steal, but Kleinow caught Anderson at third and an instant later nailed Altizer on the same play.

In the Yankees' tenth inning Chase got a life on Cross's error and took second on La Porte's sacrifice. Hoffman, however, died at first base on a hit to Jones and Williams flew out to Anderson. The score:

Seeking to Spread Athletics to All Classes, to Encourage Physical Development on a Scientific Physiological Basis.

Improvement of the Individual the Means of Advancing the Mass---To Make the Whole Nation Athletic.

THE importance of the work that is being done by the Athletic League of North American, organized within and embracing all the athletic activities of the Young Men's Christian Association, is probably the least understood, the least appreciated, of all the agencies that are engaged in spreading athletics and the benefits of physical training throughout the world.

The importance of an athletic organization is judged superficially by its prominence in athletic competitions and the excellence of the records its individual athletes attain. Unlike almost every other athletic organization in America, the Athletic League of North America directs none of its energies to the development of champions, and the individual skill of its representative is a matter of comparatively small moment. The result of this policy naturally leads to the more proficient of its athletes attaching themselves to other organizations in which they will have more opportunity for competition and its distinctions, while the great body of the league strives for the attainment of quite a different purpose.

Seeks Wide Participation.

The plan and scope of the Young Men's Christian Association efforts for athletics are laid on quite different lines. The object is to interest in active participation in athletics the largest number of athletes that it can possibly engage, and, interesting them, to develop them physically along definite and scientific lines that are dictated by their individual needs and their individual opportunities. While competitive athletics plays its part, and a necessary part, in the general scheme, competition is absolutely incidental and is usually confined to contests within the various branches, in which the personal rather than the general rivalry is the incentive. The effect of this, and the emphasis of the play spirit, has been most beneficial in practice, and the league has grown to remarkable proportions.

It is estimated by the officials of the league, who keep very careful record of the participation in the athletic work, that 153,000 men took part in the athletic work, of one or another character, during the past year. This represented an increase of over 20,000 men, showing the growing sentiment toward physical culture. There were 400 physical directors at work with these men, all of whom were trained specialists who directed the athletic effort along lines that would be most beneficial to the particular needs of the individual.

To Develop an Athletic Nation.

These various specialists were assisted by 5,500 volunteer leaders, who were familiar with the general plan of the Y. M. C. A. work, and who were able to carry out the general instructions of the specialists specifically. These operated not only in the Young Men's Christian Association itself, reaching this vast number of men, but it reached as well churches, settlements, boys' clubs, department stores, factories, mines, and other industrial centres, of which no direct record could be kept. It is impossible to estimate how much this increased the number to derive benefits from the system.

Then the work of the league in inducing the establishment of playgrounds, recreation centres, public baths, and other places where the physical development of the masses would be advanced has had a most salutary influence, until its ramifications appear limitless. The whole effect of this has not been felt as yet, and probably will not be for a decade at least, probably not for a generation, but it is tending to make an athletic Nation of America and to lay the foundation for a sound wholesome development that will extend to the whole people eventually.

THERE are registered in the Athletic League of North America to-day over 30,000 competitive athletes, taking part in general open competition. This registration is similar to that employed by the Amateur Athletic Union, and for the same purpose. The league seeks to inculcate those principles of amateurism and honest sport for which the Amateur Athletic Union is striving. The two, in fact, are working hand in hand for the elevation of sport. The degradation of athletic purity is brought about by the failure to appreciate the enormity of the various deceptions practiced. In themselves they are insignificant, but in their moral influence they are most dangerous. The many instances of corruption that have been uncovered illustrate the necessity of teaching the principles of fair dealing to the competitor. The Amateur Athletic Union by its system and the Athletic League of America by its whole influence are doing just this sort of work.

Insidious Influences in Sport.

The proselyting of athletes is one of the most vicious practices that mars sport today. It had been practiced conspicuously in the colleges and schools and by athletic clubs until it came to be accepted by many of the competitive athletes that it was entirely proper to accept favors in return for competition which were in effect equivalent to pay for services. These favors took on all manner of insidious forms, and it was next to impossible to weed out those who offended against the amateur law or who evaded it in spirit. The most flagrant practice was that of playing Summer ball. In themselves the offenses were harmless except in that they involved false pretense, the parading of professionals in the guise of amateurs. The conspicuous example afforded about a twelvemonth ago by the confession of a prominent athlete illustrates the extent of the moral warp resulting. It is to prevent the continuance of such practices that the leaders of athletics to-day are most earnestly striving.

No Quarrel With Professionals.

With the avowed professional they have no quarrel, nor with professionalism itself, save, in that the fact that a man receiving pay for service leads him to seek victory by divers means that frequently involve injury of an opponent, taking unfair advantage of him, or the employment of petty trickery that has no part in games conducted primarily as an exercise and as a source of social amusement. The campaign against football recently waged so successfully in the colleges grew largely out of this tendency to employ foul tactics, and it is only one of the many ways in which governing influences are striving to control sport for its betterment. The Young Men's Christian Association is one of the most potential of these influences.

Trying to Eliminate Excess.

As the excessive desire for victory is responsible for most of these evils, the excesses of various other forms are being fought as tenaciously. The whole tendency of the Young Men's Christian Association training is toward restriction and moderation in all its athletic activities. Mental, moral, and physical ills are nearly all the outgrowth of excess, and the teaching of self-control is perhaps the most helpful of all that the Young Men's Christian Association undertakes.

In the wide variety of sports that are introduced in competition in the Y. M. C. A. there is probably more opportunity for abuses than there is in any other organization; yet, by its scheme of control that minimizes the importance of the individual, it has been kept singularly free from them. The whole gamut of sport is included. Baseball and foothall are the most extensively organized of the major sports. There are frequently as many as ten baseball teams playing in one branch. Basket ball has grown to such proportions that it may now almost be termed a major sport. In one branch in a Western industrial Y. M. C. A. there was a tournament held in which there were eighty-six teams entered. Naturally the skill of no one of the lot was very highly developed, but the keenness of the sport, the interest aroused, and the pleasure derived was far in excess of that of the usual tournament. The very fact that the skill was less added to the enjoyment, for the absence of the spectacular took away that nervousness that is inevitable in contests of whatever kind in the presence of an audience.

Wide Variety of Sports Employed.

In track athletics there is widespread competition throughout the Y. M. C. A. organization, and in such sports as wrestling, gymnastics, pushball, fencing, swimming, and the like, there is probably more interest and more actual tournaments than are held by any other athletic organization in the country, no matter whether it be purely athletic or not. In the drills and marches, the rhythmic exercises, and similar forms, the Y. M. C. A. competitions are probably the only ones held in the country outside, possibly, of the German turners. This particular phase of athletics is apt to be scornfully regarded by the ordinary devotee of sport, yet it is established by statistics that these exercises really engage a larger number of participants than any of the other forms, and that the participants seem to get a greater enjoyment and benefit from them than are derived from the more spectacular.

Furnishes Directors for Colleges.

In the colleges and schools throughout the United States 75 per cent. of the athletic directors are developed by the Young Men's Christian Association and all these are working on the scientific principles that have dictated all its work.

An important thing which the association worked out was its scheme of adapting the work to meet the particular needs of different classes of men. To meet the varying needs of these many classes was no small contract.

As at present provided there are schemes of development outlined to suit every varied usual condition, and the participants in the different activities run the gamut from the staid business man of middle age to the unformed boy of 10 years of age. The testimony of the physical directors is that the most boisterous and enthusiastic athlete of them all is the member of the business man or the busy man's club.

Special Plans for Various Needs.

Especial needs are provided, such as the teaching of first aid to the injured, which was introduced particularly for the factory men, and practical use has been made of the instruction again and again in the more dangerous occupations. The whole scheme is utilitarian to the highest degree, and designed to effect such physical development as will tend to advance the mental, moral, and material man. In these phases the work of the league has been most conspicuous.

With reference to morals, it may be said without question that many are bad only because they are weak. Good nutrition, well-toned muscles, give to men those nobler feelings, that consciousness of power that are more likely to give rise to the higher aspirations of life that lead to morality and good works.

This serves to indicate the general character of the athletic work and its wide spread. Its benefits, from a sociological aspect, are acquiring wider acceptance

THE introduction of American forms of athletics in foreign countries has been remarked in Europe frequently by those who have come into touch with European sports and provoked considerable comment. The work of the Young Men's Christian Association along physical lines in its Asiatic activities, however, is even more conspicuous and most surprising.

The effort has been made in these countries to introduce all phases of missionary work in schools on the principle that the educated will be the leaders of popular sentiment in the future and the molders of future development. It has been to the schools and to the universities that the Young Men's Christian Association missionaries have directed their attention, and in them the success attending the physical instruction has been amazing.

In Japan, where athletics have always been a national characteristic, quite as much as they were a characteristic of the ancient Greeks, the physical has naturally appealed, and with the adaptability of the Japanese they have taken hold of many features of American sport, while retaining the general scheme which they have followed for centuries. In this line, track and field games, especially in the field, jumping, vaulting, hurdling, and the like, have been taken hold of and are now a recognized part of the Japanese athletic life, while baseball has made a tremendous hit in Japan. It is being played by the schoolboys and the collegiate students with an enthusiasm that is almost fanatical.

Japan Adopts American Games.

So keen, indeed, are the Japanese for the American National game that it is likely to attain a similar position in the land of flowers. As an evidence of this enthusiastic interest, the contemplated trip of the baseball team of the Yokohama University to play against the University of California may be cited. This trip, which was postponed last year as a result of the San Francisco earthquake, is to be made shortly.

It was naturally supposed that an athletic nation like the Japanese would take hold of the American athletics and would absorb its good. But the surprising success attained by the Young Men's Christian Association athletic missionaries has been in China, where the whole system has been adopted with an enthusiasm totally unsuspected in the Chinese character.

The same influences have been sought in China as in Japan; the educational officials and the schoolboys and university students there are teaching the Chinese boy of the streets the American games and pastimes. The populace has taken hold of them to an amazing degree, and the carnivals and tournaments are attended by crowds that would put the American tournament managers to blush.

Dr. Hans Anderson, who has charge of the Young Men's Christian Association foreign work, attests that at a recent carnival in Seöl, Corea, a crowd of fifteen thousand people witnessed the athletic games of the mission school there, cheering the successes of the participants with an enthusiasm that would have done credit to the fanaticism of the American baseball crank. At Shanghai, at Tien Tsin, at Kioto, and other Asiatic cities similar demonstrations have occurred at the games.

Chinese Enthusiatic Over Sport.

A recent set of games at Canton was attended by the Governor of the province, who acted as referee, while at another carnival the prizes of the various events were presented with elaborate ceremony by the ladies of the Emperor's Court, who occupied a reserved space similar to that provided for the Kings of Mediaeval Europe at the jousting tournaments. In fact, the Chinese nobility has taken kindly to this innovation, and has accepted this foreign importation with an enthusiasm that is the more surprising in view of its bitter and fanatical opposition to other foreign influences, educational and commercial.

In India the same condition exists to a lesser degree, and Bombay and Calcutta are organizing school athletics, which are growing in popularity with the masses. In other countries where the Young Men's Christian Association is spreading its work in Asia and Africa similar movements are contemplated, or have actually been started, with what success may be expected from such undertakings.

Nor is the spreading of American athletics in foreign lands confined to Asia and Africa. Australia contemplates the adoption in toto of American methods, and physical directors are now about to be sent to Melbourne, Sydney, and other Australian cities to teach American athletics. New Zealand is another. Brazil and the various South American countries are petitioning for American instructors in physical education, and a teacher has just left for Mexico to begin the propagation of athletics there.

Interesting as are these manifestations, they are important in the proof they afford of the value of physical training methods as practised in America and attest most strikingly the influence which athletics may be made to have in general sociological development.

Study of Physical Education Produces System That Applies Scientific Principles to Men in All Walks of Life.

Plan in Operation Essentially Utilitarian---Introducing Play Spirit That Gives Zest to Otherwise Uninteresting Drills.

ABOUT forty-five years ago physical training was introduced in the Y. M. C. A. It was with considerable trepidation on the part of its leaders that this was done. As the association was primarily a religious movement, and as the early work was largely of the evangelistic and mission type, it caused uneasiness on the part of many. Some thought the association was swinging away from definite religious work and feared the results; many were greatly opposed to the movement, and some contributors withdrew their subscriptions, believing the gymnasium to be the agency of evil. Even the most broadminded men of the movement had no larger conception of the physical work than that it would prove a most helpful means of attracting young men into the membership, where perhaps they could be interested in the recognized higher forms of association work. There were a few men of vision, however, who recognized in this department an opportunity for rendering a helpful service to young men in ministering to their physical needs.

Bringing System Out of Chaos.

Physical training at its inception in the Young Men's Christian Association was crude and without form or order. Each association had its own type of work, which took its complexion largely from the physical director in charge. The great difficulty met with in these earlier days was the securing of competent physical directors. There was no trained physical directorship, and so the association had to accept what was available. Many of the men secured by the force of necessity were of meagre education, noted more particularly for their ability as expert gymnasts than as leaders of men. Some were ex-circus performers. The German Turner Society contributed some trained physical directors, and where these were in charge the German system prevailed. A few were acquainted with the Swedish system; others had military training, but most of them had no training.

As the success of the work depended upon trained leadership, the association sought to train its own men, and in 1885 the Springfield Training School was started and another followed at Chicago. These two have furnished 40 per cent. of the physical directors in the country to-day.

Combines Old and New Schools.

The association, in working out its own philosophy of physical training, borrowed much from the German turner and Swedish schools of physical education. It has, however, eliminated some forms of exercise peculiar to each. The turner system caters to the German temperament and type of mind, its calisthenic work appeals to the aesthetic. The calisthenic movements are comparatively slow, but are done with precision and accuracy with reference to beauty and effect. The Swedish school places emphasis on posture. The movements are slow and consist of exercises which are fatiguing. The new American system introduced by the Young Men's Christian Association is typically American, characterized by freedom from conventionality and restraint, the spirit of independence, change, and recreation, and decidedly utilitarian.

Training the Whole Body.

The training of the body is related to the efficiency of the whole man, experts declare. In its relation to mentality it is discovered that the motor area of the brain comprises one-half of the entire brain area, and that the development of the motor brain is related to the highest mental efficiency of the individual. In its relation to character it is maintained that restlessness, weakness, lack of skill of endurance, of control, are largely muscular faults, and the opposite characteristics of these are large muscular virtues.

RED RIVER WINS STAKES IN A ROMP

ELMHURST FOR LAURA CLAY

It was a long look back to form for the racegoers at Jamaica who picked the winner of the most important event of the card yesterday, but there was reward for those backers who had good memories when Red River, from the stable of R. T. Wilson, Jr., romped in first for the Paumonok Handicap. Some few persons, still more fortunate, who were fortified by the knowledge that the Wilson stable had every confidence in the colt's condition, on the strength of his trials in private, got the early betting against Red River, which at one time was as good as 30 to 1, while the general public picked all around the winner, Red River finally starting at 12 to 1. James R. Keene's colt Superman was the popular favorite.

It was a one-horse race from the moment that the barrier was raised, with La Londe the first of the field to move. Red River, second at the start, went to the front with a rush, and, only galloping, opened a big gap on his field in the first furlong of the three-quarters of a mile race. Superman, away badly, dropped far back, and did not begin to close until the horses were on the far turn, where he ran through to a place well up with his field, but never got near enough to make Red River stretch out in his gallop in front. On the straight Superman ran through into second place, but Red River, well in hand all the way, won with ridiculous ease, by five lengths, with Superman, far off before La Londe, third. The beaten field included three horses that have raced for the Keene stable, for, aside from the Keene colt Superman, other runners were Pantoufle and Oraculum.

In the second stake event of the day popular opinion came much nearer the truth in the estimates of the horses, though once more the public favorite failed, this also being a horse from the James R. Keene stable, Masks and Faces. The race was the Elmhurst Stakes, selling, for two-year-olds, five furlongs, with twelve runners, Masks and Faces starting first choice, with the R. L. Thomas entry Aunt Rose and Laura Clay the next choice. Masks and Faces broke best, with Blue Heron and Laura Clay in keen pursuit from the moment that the barrier was lifted, and in the first furlong the positions shifted to Blue Heron first, Laura Clay and Rustle, second and third, and Masks and Faces fourth. Blue Heron held his place in the lead into the stretch, where Laura Clay went on to the stretch, where Laura Clay went on to the front, and, ridden out, won by a length, with Blue Heron second, a neck before Rustle, and Masks and Faces a moderate fourth.

The Keene stable made a third trial for a race in the closing event, and then finally did get a horse first to the winning post, but only by a matter of a few inches, in the most sensational finish of the day. The Keene winner then was Sepoy, post favorite in the five furlongs for maidens, two years old, for which Sepoy and Woodlane raced out in front together all the way, and, though they went wide on the last turn, still lasted in the lead against the challenge of Rosario and McGregor, Sepoy, after carrying Woodlane out, lasting just long enough to win by a short head. CROKER AFTER DERBY.

Richard Croker has decided to take his best string of race horses to England this year and compete in the leading events. He aspires to carry away the Derby with a chestnut colt, Orby, out of his favorite mare, Rhoda B. Mr. Croker has decided to forget the rebuff he received two years ago when he was barred from training his horses on the Newmarket track, which resulted in his transferring his entire stable to Ireland, where he has raced since.

Danny Maher, the American jockey, was sent by Mr. Croker to Ireland last week to try out the Croker Derby candidate. Maher returned full of enthusiasm. He is under contract to ride Lord Derby's Olympian in the Derby, but as the horse is considered to have small chances in the race Croker hopes to get Maher released to pilot his own horses.

Orby stands at the head of the Croker string, and will be entered, according to present plans, in several leading events on the English turf. Croker took Orby to the Grand National meeting at Liverpool a few weeks ago and cantered away with Earl Sefton's plate, beating Lord Derby's Parsinus, on which the Prince of Wales and other members of Lord Derby's house party had gambled so heavily that Persinus started at odds of 2 to 3.

PARADE OF HORSES ON THE SPEEDWAY

Nearly Six Hundred Trotters and Pacers to Take Part in Road Drivers' Annual Event.

GROWTH OF ORGANIZATION

Light harness sport has become a fixed institution, largely through the instrumentality of the Road Drivers' Association, which is one of the leading organizations of its kind in the country. Thanks to the magnificent Speedway alongside the Harlem River, New York leads all cities in amateur trotting and pacing. Many of the most noted Grand Circuit performers have been seen on the Speedway, driven by road drivers. E. E. Smathers drove Major Delmar one season and C. K. G. Billings sent Lou Dillon down the drive at a two-minute gait many times when he was an active member of the association, and last Fall he was behind Blacklock, 2:04½, in several brushes. A. B. Gwathmey is a frequent visitor with Tiverton, 2:04¼, one of the best trotting horses of his time. These are only a few of the fast horses that have furnished sport for thousands of New Yorkers.

From the public's standpoint the most important event of the season is the annual parade and horse show of the road drivers, which will be held this year on May 4. Between 500 and 600 horses take part in this annual event, representing a value of half a million dollars. After the parade the horse show is held on the green opposite the clubhouse on the Speedway. These events have done much toward increasing the value of the light-horness horses, irrespective of furnishing keen enjoyment to a vast crowd of interested spectators.

Mathée racing meets are held once a week in the Spring and Fall, and brushing can be witnessed between forty or fifty fast horaes any fine Sunday morning. For the matinées a number of valuable cups are offered, which result in keen competition between the different classes. The Morosini Cup, presented by Miss Giulia Morosini, is one of the most valuable trophies ever offered for a speed contest. Unlike many of the championship cups offered for amateur trotting and pacing, the Morosini Cup is given outright every year. Valued at $1,500, it is one of the most coveted horse prizes in the country. The seven cup gift accompanying it is an exceedingly liberal one, as it is open to both trotters and pacers, and is awarded to the owner of the horse winning the largest number of heats during the season. Miss Morosini, who is an enthusiastic horsewoman and one of the best drivers in the country, enjoys the unique distinction of being the only woman member of a Road Drivers' Association in the United States. She owns a large stable of high-bred, spirited animals, and takes part in the Sunday morning turnout on the Speedway. She has stopped many runaways by her prompt actions and knowledge of driving, and has done more to promote the success of the Road Drivers' Association than any other member.

In addition to the Morosini Cup, a number of silver cups and trophies are donated by the Board of Directors, Executive Committee, President Crawford, Edward J. La Place, Charles S. Rice, George H. Huber, and other members. These are awarded to the horses winning the largest number of brushes, securing most points, and to the best trotter and pacer.

The Horse Show, which is held in connection with the annual parade, will have ten classes and for the first time silver cups will be awarded to the winners of five of the classes. The programme of events follows: Trotters in one-man speed wagons, pacers to one-man speed wagons; trotting teams, one or two man wagons; pacing roadsters to runabout, horse to count 60 per cent., general appointments 40 per cent., silver cup; trotting roadsters to runabout, horse to count 60 per cent., general appointments 40 per cent., silver cup; pacing team to one or two man wagons, short-tail horses to runabout, silver cup; short-tail teams to suitable vehicle, silver cup; special open for novelty hitches, short-tail teams to runabout, silver cup.

The route of the parade will be from 145th Street and St. Nicholas Avenue to 155th Street, to the Speedway. The parade will pass down the Speedway to Dyckman Street, and then return to the reviewing stand and be dismissed.

Brooklyn State Senator Bets $10,000 He Won't Bet $100.

Brooklyn politicians and race-going men were astonished to hear yesterday afternoon that Senator Patrick H. McCarren had stopped his heavy betting at the tracks and become a "piker." The Senator, it appears, has been forced into this class of bettor in order to save a forfeit of $10,000.

According to a story which was being told yesterday afternoon the $10,000 is involved in a compact entered into by the tall statesman from Williamsburg and ex-Senator William H. Reynolds. McCarren, Reynolds, Samuel S. Whitehouse, George F. Dobson, William S. Hurley, George Johnson, and other well-known Brooklyn men were in the clubhouse at the Jamaica track on Friday, discussing the races. Senator McCarren casually remarked that he thought the "piker" got as much excitement out of betting as the heavy bettor.

"Do you think you could enjoy the racing as a piker?" asked one of the group.

"I believe so," said the Senator smilingly.

Mr. Reynolds turned on him suddenly. "I'll tell you what I'll do, Senator, said he. "I'll bet you $10,000 that you will bet $100 or more on a race before I do."

"I'll go you," returned Mr. McCarren, and the compact was made.

Mr. Whitehouse then astonished everybody by offering to bet Mr. Dobson $500 to $500 that McCarren would not make another bet on the races during the year. Mr. Dobson snapped up the offer.

The fever seized upon Hurley and Johnson, and together they wagered one of the other members of the party $2,000 even that McCarren would lose his bet with Reynolds. It was said last night that McCarren had not made a single bet since he made the wager with Reynolds. The odds in Brooklyn political circles last night, however, were that the Senator would spot a "good thing" before the season was much advanced and would absent mindedly boost the hundred-dollar limit agreed upon with Reynolds.

GOULD IN SEMI-FINALS.

LONDON, April 27.—Jay Gould of Lakewood to-day reached the semi-final round of the international amateur court tennis championship tournament by defeating E. B. Noel in three straight sets by the score of 6—4, 6—2, 6—3. The young American champion completely outclassed his opponent and was never in danger. In the first set Gould did not settle down and lost a number of points to Noel, but quickly recovered and captured the set. The second and third sets were easy for Gould, whose form is improving with each game he plays.

Gould's strongest opponent in the tournament is V. H. Pennell, the champion of 1904, who is also left in the semi-finals, having defeated Major Cooper Key three sets to two. Last year Gould met Pennell in the final round for the second prize and won by 3 sets to 1, or 18 games to 8. Pennell is regarded as the strongest player in England, having defeated Eustace H. Mills in 1904.

April Shoot Ends at Riverside G. C.

There was a big turnout of gunners yesterday for the concluding rounds of the April shoot of the Riverside Gun Club, at Engleside, N. J. Weather conditions favored the competitors, and as a result some excellent scores were recorded. The April trophies were won by Dr. Richter, C. McClave, and M. Bessing, all of whom showed a good general average for the month. Yesterday's shooting consisted of competitions at 10, 15, 15, 15, 25, 15, and 15 targets, respectively. The score:

Hayes, 8, 9, 12, 11, 13, 7, 13, 15—94; Schoverling, 6, 11, 12, 15, 12, 11, 12—80; Glover, 10, 13, 15, 15, 15, 17, 15—100; Richter, 6, 13, 9, 12, 17, 10, 13, 13—93; Eickhoft, 6, 10, 12, 11, 18, 8, 10, 6—71; Haus, 6, 14, 10, 13, 16, 11, 9—79; McClave, 8, 9, 13, 14, 21, 11, 13, 11—100; Seymour, 8, 8, 10, 12, 15, 10, 14—87; Lawson, 8, 15, 12, 7, 17, 9—80; Metz, 7, 8, 8, 5, 9—37; Gillerlain, 7, 8, 10, 7, 11, 8—51; Bogart, 11, 13, 8, 17, 9, 10, 10—78; Lanlare, 7, 11, 7, 16, 10, 9—60; Stader, 7, 13, 8, 8, 15—41.

Horseshoe Harbor's Annual Regatta.

The Long Island Sound Yacht Racing Association has assigned Aug. 3 to the Horseshoe Harbor Yacht Club for its annual regatta. The regatta will be included in the association championships. A large number of the smaller yachts are expected to compete.

Activity Among the Schoolboy Athletes.

During the last Winter School No. 40 covered itself with glory in an athletic way. Some of the events it won were: 15c yards, Twelfth Regimental games, by Henry Marshall; midget relay Poly "Prep"; Irish American A. C. midget relay and New York A. C. relay 115-pound class; at Madison Square Garden; Andrews, Collier of New York 100 yards race for midgets, taking first, second, and third places, and the senior relay at the Thirteenth Regiment, Brooklyn.

The line-up of the baseball tenm of School No. 24 is as follows: Hellar, pitcher; Schwarz, catcher; Wallers, first base; Fleck, second base; Andrews, shortstop; Bass, third base; O'Hara, left field; Snyder, right field, and Gellwachs, centre field. Up to data the team has defeated schools Nos. 89, 5, 18, 6, 2, and 46.

The forty-first annual meet of the Roosevelt Athletic League, which takes in all the public schools in the Eighth and Twelfth districts, will be held at the Seventy-first Regiment Armory on May 11. The appended events will be contested: Eighty-pound class—50-yard dash and 360-yard relay; 95-pound class—60-yard dash and 440-yard relay; 115-pound class—75-yard and 440-yard relay; open class—100-yard dash, 880-yard relay and potato race. For special classes—Graduates' race and medley race. The referee will be F. W. Rubien of the Amateur Athletic Union.

A novelty will be introduced during the games of Public School No. 40, which will be decided at the Seventy-first Regiment Armory, on May 11. There will be a singling contest, in which schools Nos. 14, 18, 19, 27, 40, and 49 will participate. Ninety-six members will be in each chorus and Dr. Edward M. Stitt, President of the Roosevelt Athletic League, who is the father of the unique idea, intends to develop a few future Carusos and Jean De Reszkes.

The baseball team of Public School No. 40 has been selected. Two games have been played up to date. The first was with School No. 14 and the second with School No. 72 of Brooklyn. No. 40 taking both games. The line-up: Pitcher, Mavert and Wewer; pitchers; Baker, catcher; Roberts, first base; Lake, second base; Macvarrone, third base; "Buster" Wilson, shortstop; Walters, right field; Hall, centre field, and Bunge, left field.

The office of John E. Waters, Principal of School No. 24, is decorated with trophies won by the nimble athletes of the school within the period of a trifle over a year. There is

Earl Denroche is one of the crack athletes of Public School No. 40. He is a native of Canada, and has been in athletics several years. During his brief career as a runner he has won twenty-eight medals. He holds the record in the junior 100-yard dash. Denroche expects to win the championship in the event again this year.

Probably the most envied of all youngsters among the schoolboy athletes in New York is Charles Wilson, bettar known among his confreres as "Buster." "Buster" is the only lad in Greater New York who has the glorious privilege of trespassing on the sacred sward of the Polo Grounds during the progress of a game.

"Bustar," who is a scholar of Public School 40, and an ideal pupil, is the mascot of the New York baseball team. He was born in New York twelve yeara ago and has held his envious post since 1903 and expects to retain it as long as he wears knickerbockera.

Manager McGraw of tha Giants met young Wilson one day and took a liking to the boy. He asked him if he would like to travel with the team, and "Buster" promptly seized the opportunity. Ha sported a diminutive uniform and took up the task of bringing good luck to the team. "Buster" started on the Western trip of the Giants in 1903 and they won all but two games, so his position was secure.

In 1904 the team won the championship of tha league, and in 1905 the world's title. "Buster" came in for more than a lion's share of the honors.

There is no gainsaying that School No. 24 was represented through the season by a very capable basketball team. The team that succeeded in winning stellar honors in the tournament just closed was only able to defeat Public School No. 24 by the score of 24 to 23. The medley relay race to be run at the games of Public School No. 40 on May 11 will be a direct departure from similar races. It will be decided on basis of weight instead of distance. The first boy will weigh 80 pounds, the second 95 pounds, the third 115 pounds, and the fourth had any weight.

The boys of Public School No. 40 are predicting wonderful things for Charlie Sneider of that school. They look upon him as an embryo "Deerfoot," and think that before long he will usurp the laurels of Henry Marshall, the crack runner of No. 40. In the games held at No. 47 a week ago last Saturday night Sneider toyed with his rivals in the 90-yard dash. Sneider is also a capital pupil.

The four lads of the relay team of School No. 40, who won in the 115-pound class in the New York A. C. games recently, at Madison Square Garden, are arousing the envy of the older and well-seasoned athletes.

The baseball nine of School No. 24 has not lost a game so far, and if the youngsters continue the good work they ought to have more than a look in for the championship of Greater New York before the season terminates.

The Athletic Association of School No. 24 always remembers all the pupils during Christmas time. Last Christmas each boy in the school, about twelve hundred in all, received souvenir calendars. The best five pupils in scholastic work were presented with a No. 24 pin enameled in red and gray, the school colors. Principal Waters thinks it serves to stimulate interest in athletics, and at the same time makes the lads studious.

The senior basketball team of Public School No. 40 did not lose a game out of sixteen played until the boys tackled Public School No. 24, the former borough champions. Despite this No. 24 only succeeded in winning by the close score of 13 to 10. Athletic Director F. Graham attributes the Waterloo to overconfidence more than anything else.

From present indications it looks as if Public School No. 24 would secure permanent possession of the Jansen trophy and the Webber trophy, although the track team has not as yet taken up outdoor training. Still, the material at hand would seem to indicate that there will be little or no trouble in capturing the much coveted relay and novice championship at the public school athletic meets at Celtic Park in June.

Master Brodie, the star of the lightweight brigade of School No. 24, disputes Master Henry Marshall's superiority at any distance above sixty yards. Brodie would like to take a try at either Marshall or Deroche of School No. 40, and is just itching to engage in a test of supremacy under the above conditions.

One of the rising athletes of School No. 40 is Herman Kupfer. Herman is fleet of feet and keen of eye, and is the best runner at sixty yards in the Public School Athletic League. Although he has been running only two years, he has won seventeen medals, a watch, and a silver cup. Young Kupfer also excels at baseball and basketball.

NEW TENNIS RULE BEING AGITATED

Ex-Champions Advocate a Change Which Benefits the Challenger.

MISS MAY SUTTON DEFEATED

Mixed Doubles Event Starts on the Covered Courts of St. Nicholas Rink.

The idea of having the National lawn tennis champion allow his challenger a day of rest following the end of the tournament at Newport or of playing through is officially being taken up by the governing body. At the recent annual meeting of the association Frederick G. Anderson, president of the Kings County Lawn Tennis Club and of the Exeeutive Committee raised the question. With only slight discussion by Karl H. Behr, Jr., William A. Larned, and Frederick B. Alexander, action was left to the all-powerful committeemen.

Those who support the plan of a day of rest or a play through, the latter being the most favored, declare that the records of only six defeats of the champion since 1884, a period of twenty-three years, indicate the weakness of the present system. In order, O. S. Campbell beat H. W. Slocum, 1890; F. H. Hovey beat R. D. Wrenn, 1895; R. D. Wrenn beat F. H. Hovey, 1896; H. L. Doherty beat W. A. Larned, 1903; B. C. Wright beat H. Ward, 1905, and W. J. Clothier beat B. C. Wright, 1906.

Foremost in espousing the idea of playing through is Dwight F. Davis, the donor of the International Challenge Cup. According to his statement: "I have always favored the plan of compelling the champion to play through the tournament. The champion should be the best player in the country. The present system undoubtedly places a handicap on the challenger, due to the mental and physical strain of the week's play."

Davis was twice runner-up in singles and held the doubles title with Ward, being regarded as the most sensational player this country has produced. Clarence Hobart speaks against the present system in terms which leave no room for doubt. Winner of the All-Comers in 1891, he was called to play against the champion, O. S. Campbell, the day after he had won a grueling five-set match from Fred H. Hovey, who was later destined to defeat Champion R. D. Wrenn. Campbell was the victor, but only after five fiercely contested sets had been played, in which Hobart won the first and third. It is evidently this memorable match that Hobart alludes to when he says:

"I am of the opinion that the challenger has in many cases been handicapped in the challenge match by fatigue from his previous efforts. I can personally vouch for one instance. I believe that under present conditions a day of rest between the final match in the All-Comers and the challenge match is desirable, but I should regard this as merely a palliative, and am strongly in favor of doing away with the senseless and unfair advantage now given to the champion of the year before. All candidates for the championship should start on even terms, as they do in every other sport worthy of the name."

Behr, a tried and trained athlete, has come out against the system as unfair, and at best a barbarous method of physical torture.

National Champion Clothier is against any change. He says: "I might say that I do not consider a rest desirable or necessary between the final match of the Newport tournament and the challenge match."

The veteran ex-champion, Henry W. Slocum, also upholds this side of the question. According to his views: "I have been out of the game so long that my opinion on the subject under discussion would appear to be of little value. As to my personal experience, I remember that I won the All-Comers' tournament in two successive years, and that I was in extremely good condition on the last day and eager to play the championship match the following day. I doubt that a day's rest would have improved my game."

Skillful as was her raequet work Miss May Sutton met defeat at the hands of N. W. Niles yesterday on the court of the St. Nicholas Rink, Sixty-sixth Street and Columbus Avenue. The vigorous play of the masculine player surpassed the intuition of the girl from the Pacific Coast. Not that Miss Sutton was lacking in the elements of the game and played with a show of vigor that kept her opponent on the jump, but she failed to out-manoeuvre her adversary and lost the singles match at 6—4 and 6—3.

Niles, the Bostonian, champion at Harvard, and a former interscholastic title holder, was easily at the top of his game. He came fresh from praetice on the indoor court of the Boston Cadet Corps, and the sharp bounds of the ball held no terrors for him. He was likewise well primed as to what to expect from Miss Sutton's side of the net. It was a distinct compliment to the girl, however, to have her meet a ranking player on even terms, as in her mateh last year at Manchester, England, S. H. Smith perslated in giving the American girls odds and was soundly beaten in consequence.

Play in the mixed doubles was also begun, Miss Sutton and Niles pairing against Mrs. Barger-Wallach and Raymond D. Little, and winning by the score 7—5 and 6—3. This match was well played, and the air of the Newport Casino pervaded the contest as the veteran referee, Frederick W. Mansfield, officiated in the chair.

COLLEGE BASKET BALL.

Harvard Withdraws from the Intercollegiate League.

At a meeting of delegates from the colleges that make up the Intercollegiate Basket Ball League held yesterday afternoon in the Murray Hill Hotel, Howard withdrew from the league. This leaves Yale, Columbia, Pennsylvania, Princeton, and Cornell to fight it out for the supremacy next season.

Apparently Harvard has decided that it would be useless to continue under the same arrangement that held during the past season for, on account of a disagreement, she and Pennsylvania were not allowed to play each other on the court, and each played through the season with a handicap of one forfeited game. At the same meeting the new schedule, which a different number of teams will make necessary, was discussed, although the exact dates were not settled.

GOOD BOUTS FOR FENCING TITLES

WALDBOTE WON WITH FOILS

W. D. Lyon and A. G. Anderson of N. Y. A. C. Capture Titles with Dueling Swords and Sabres—Judging Criticised

The final bouts of the fourteenth annual National fencing championship tournament last night produced interesting and exciting competitions. The preliminary bouts of the amateurs on the previous night in the gymnasium of the New York Athletic Club, Sixth Avenue and Central Park South, had reduced the field to the best aspirants for the honors with the foils, duelling swords, and saores.

After six spirited bouts with the foils Frederico Lage and C. Waldbote tied for the championship. Their engagement in the fence off proved a fiery combat. The latter was the most skillful and aggressive and he won the championship title with something to spare in the estimation of the judges. Lage took second place, while third prize went to Curti.

Shortly before the bouts began there was a conference of the judges. Several of the competitors had openly protested on the first night that the judging was woefully inadequate. The marks last night were all made secretly on slips of paper, the judges being Charles Tatham, Fencers' Club; John Allaire, Turn Vereln; Charles Bothner, New York A. C.; W. Scott O'Connor, Fencers' Club, and Dr. G. M. Hammond, New York A. C. The summary:

Foils.—Valentine P. Curti, New York A. C., defeated G. H. Breed, New York Fencers' Club, lost to C. Waldbote, Chicago Turn Vereln; F. Lage, New York Fencers' Club.

Frederico Lage, New York Fencers' Club, defeated G. H. Breed, New York Fencers' Club; V. P. Curti, New York A. C., lost to C. Waldbote, Chicago Turn Verein.

Following the victory of the Chicagoan in the foils, both of the championships with the other weapons, the dueling swords and sabres, went to the New York Athletic Club. W. D. Lyon repeated his triumph of 1901, and won with the swords, with only one defeat, that which he experienced at the hands of Paul Benzenberg of the New York Turn Verein. The latter won the second prize after tieing with W. Eckard of the Chicago Young Men's Christian Association. The latter took third prize.

The manner in which the Chicagoans ran around and wrestled in the sword bouts aroused some caustic criticism and the declaration that specific rules would be framed to stop that sort of performance another year. Waldbote, Eckard, and Sauer, the Chicago trio, made interesting bouts, but even the judges admitted that they found difficulty in picking winners.

A. G. Anderson, New York Athletic Club, repeated his victory of last year with the sabres. He came through with a clean score, his clubmate K. B. Johnson winning second prize, and only losing to him.

BIG DUAL COLLEGE MEETS.

Columbia-Penn Games Next Week—Princeton Match Later.

The relay games of the University of Pennsylvania yesterday marked the opening of the collegiate track season. Next Saturday will introduce the first of the series of dual meets that annually precede the intercollegiate championships. Columbia has two dual meets scheduled, one with Pennsylvania and one with Princeton, and both of these are to be held this year at Columbia Oval.

The meet with Pennsylvania is scheduled for May 4. It will be Columbia's first try-out of the season, when she will have an opportunity to judge the strength of her track men. Zink, Hetherington, Hoyns, Bull, if he is then eligible, and Ryan are counted on to win points, but they will be up against a pretty stiff proposition when they meet the array of cracks that Mike Murphy has in training. With Cartmell, Whitham, Bonsack, Taylor, Root, Jones, and Haskell, Murphy has the greatest lot of runners in the colleges, while McCullough, Swain, Moffett, Greene, and Folwell round out the team pretty well. Columbia has no hope of victory, and will be satisfied to make any sort of showing.

On the same day Cornell and Princeton meet at Ithaca in a contest that will be important, as indicating the former's chances to beat Pennsylvania in the championships and showing just how much of a figure Princeton can cut in the big meet. Brown will meet Williams, Dartmouth compete against Harvard, Wesleyan against Haverford, the Naval Academy against Johns Hopkins, and New York University against Rutgers at New Brunswick.

Strong Demand for Hill Climb or Track Meet on Decoration Day —Events in New Jersey.

With the announcement last week of the four days' sealed bonnet contest by the Automobile Club of America and the prospect of favorable touring weather, a marked awakening has taken place in automobile circles. A good motor contest of some sort to be conducted by a local club and partially, if not entirely, within the metropolitan district has been in demand for some time, and, judging from the general favor that has been accorded to the A. C. A.'s test, the trade as well as private owners will be well represented.

That a starter of some sort was needed to encourage other events has also been apparent in the widespread demand during the past week for something of automobile competitive interest on Decoration Day. Various plans have been proposed, from a hill climb to a track meet at Empire City track, with a number of short races for stock touring cars and runabouts. The four days' test of the Automobile Club of America will be held from June 19 to 22, and there is a strong feeling that something should be devised to keep the motor activity alive before that time. Nearly all of the neighboring clubs have made preparations for runs and tests before the middle of June. The Automobile Club of New Jersey has planned the most ambitious event, as it will hold a three days' entrance run covering about 400 miles from May 30 to June 2. A committee has already gone over the course, marked out the controls, and a number of entries have rewarded its efforts. The Bridgeport Club and the Quaker City Motor Club of Philadelphia will hold hill-climbing contests on May 30, and several New York cars are likely to be represented in the Philadelphia event, provided that nothing of general competitive interest is arranged for local motorists.

Besides the more serious competitions active work has been done by all of the clubs outside of Manhattan Island in arranging pleasure runs and other enjoyable features for the members. The Long Island Automobile Club has already inaugurated its series of club runs, and with sixty cars that took part in the first run of the season from the Brooklyn clubhouse to Oyster Bay, the complaint sometimes made that club runs have ceased to be popular seems to be an entirely mistaken idea. Encouraged by this interest among its 400 members the Runs and Tours Committee is planning for a much bigger run next Sunday, which will be the regular annual event of the club, always an occasion looked forward to with considerable enthusiasm.

NOTES OF INTEREST TO AUTOMOBILISTS.

Nearly all of the members of the Executive Committee of the American Automobile Association will be in the city to-morrow for the regular monthly meeting, to be held in the rooms of the Long Island Motor Parkway, 527 Fifth Avenue, to-morrow. The racing situation will be discussed, and some belated announcement may be made regarding the date for the Vanderbilt Cup contest.

Frank Cheney, Jr., of South Manchester, purchased a 50-horse-power Welch car last week, and immediately left the Broadway agency for Hartford. E. G. Burnham of Bridgeport purchased a similar car, and, accompanied by Manager P. W. Strong, W. E. Burnham, and Miss Burnham, made the run to Bridgeport in three hours.

A non-stop run with sealed bonnet from Detroit to New York has been arranged by Walter C. Martin to demonstrate the qualities of the new 20-horse-power Cadillac. Mr. Martin has sent L. R. Burns to Detroit to drive the car, and the start is scheduled for to-day. An observer will ride in the car, and the distance to be covered over the route selected is 1,000 miles.

Each month sees an increasing number of motorists who use their cars to travel back and forth between their offices in the city and their country homes. This fact was commented on yesterday by E. B. Gallaher, who referred to two recent purchasers of Cleveland cars, Whitney Lyon and Edgar Park, residents of Larchmont, who use their cars to make the daily trip to the city. Mr. Lyon now owns two Cleveland cars.

A letter from M. Brasier, the French manufacturer, concerning the claims recently made on behalf of Gustave Chedrue, has been given out by E. B. Gallaher. M. Brasier states that the only position Chedrue ever held at his factory was that of a draftsman, and that he had no part in the designing of the Brasier racing cars. Chedrue is now with an American manufacturer.

S. B. Stevens, the amateur racing motorist and President of the New York Motor Club, took delivery of a six-cylinder 40-50-horse-power Rolls-Royce last week. The car is a touring model with a 135-inch wheel base. Mr. Stevens was attracted to this new car by the performance of the Rolls-Royce in the English Tourist Trophy contest of last season, which it won very handily.

Automobilists who examine the Elmore cars are impressed by the simplicity of the two-cycle motors, due to the absence of valves. The motors of the Elmore cars have only twelve moving parts, about 8 per cent. of the moving parts found in the average four-cycle motor. A. Elliott Ranney & Co., metropolitan agents for the Elmore, state that the excellent running of the Elmors and its power on hills show that the two-cycle motor has other advantages besides simplicity.

In no other portion of the country is the demand for American cars so strong this Summer as in California, and especially in San Francisco, where the work of rebuilding evidently leaves ample time for motoring. A favorite car with the Westerners is the Autocar, made by the Autocar Company of Ardmore, Penn. On a single shipment of Autocars that were ordered by San Franciscans last week, the express charges amounted to $2,178.

Owing to the large number of cars that had been received last week for the regular sale of the Automobile Auction Company of America, at 41 West Sixty-third Street, it was impossible to dispose of all of them, and the balance will be offered at an evening sale to-morrow night. On most of the cars a deposit of 10 per cent. is required, with a guarantee of the return of the money if the machine is not found exactly as represented after a demonstration.

Fifty-two cars made up the single day's shipment of Reos to R. M. Owen & Co. on April 20, thirty-four being touring cars and eighteen runabouts. This is the record shipment made to the Owen Company by the Reo factory in one day.

To better provide for the testing of Reo cars during all seasons of the year the Reo Motor Car Company of Lansing, Mich., will replace the brick and cinder trackway, now used for outside testing, with a plank track. By having a wooden track it is expected that many of the difficulties which in the past have been experienced during the Spring and Winter months will be done away with. The track, when completed, will be sixteen feet wide and about a third of a mile long.

President John Kane Mills of the Dragon Automobile Company is in receipt of a letter from Jefferson de Mont Thompson, Chairman of the A. A. A. Racing Board, complimenting the Dragon Company on its entry of two racing cars for the next Vanderbilt Cup race. Mr. Thompson says: "I take this opportunity to congratulate your company on the proposed entry of two cars for the Vanderbilt Cup race, and I assure you that the Vanderbilt Cup Commission will afford you every facility for a fair showing."

The motor boat Simplex VII. has been sold to Charles G. Zug of Pittsburg. The boat is thirty-two feet over all, and capable of making high speed.

The H. H. Franklin Manufacturing Company has found a traffic department necessary in order to properly care for its steadily increasing business. Mr. Herbert Hess, who for sixteen years was connected with the New York Central Railroad in the traffic department, has been secured as manager.

ITALIAN AERONAUTS BARRED.

Word was received last night from Paris by the Aero Club of America that at a recent meeting of the International Aeronautical Federation it was definitely decided that owing to the fact that the Italian entries for the international balloon race this year were received too late, no extension of time could be granted and the entries therefore will not be accepted. This action was taken by the federation, of which Prince Roland Bonaparte of the French Aero Club is President, despite the strong requests presented by the American and English clubs that the Italian entries be received. According to the deed of gift of the Gordon Bennett balloon trophy, entries for the international race closed on Feb. 1. The Italian team was not entered until March, and Frank Lahm, the representative of the Aero Club of America, who has been in Paris for the last three months, has been making efforts to secure an extension of time so as to admit the Italian team. The teams that will compete in the race at St. Louis on Oct. 1 are the American, German, French, English, and Spanish.

The Aero Club of America has entered the balloons Orient and Initial for the cup offered for a long-distance flight next Saturday from the grounds of the Jamestown Exposition at Norfolk, Va.

SOCCER TEAMS IN TIE GAME.

Brooklyn and Camerons Each Score One Goal in Championship Contest.

The Camerons and Brooklyn Football Club teams played a tie game yesterday at Van Cortlandt Park, each eleven scoring one goal. The contest was the final game for the championship of the New York Amateur Association Football League. The Brooklyn players were on the defensive during the first half, and changed their style in the second.

The Camerons and Robert Burns teams have both finished their schedules, with eighteen points each, and it is probable that a final game will be arranged between these two. There is a likelihood of the Camerons protesting the game lost to the Brooklyn Thistles earlier in the season owing to the latter playing two men who were under suspicion as professionals. Should this game be thrown out by the League committee the Camerons will then have a clear lead for the championship. Line-up:

Ensor	Goal	Tierney
Guthris	Right back	Milne
Saunders	Left back	Kinnard
Clerke	Right half back	H. Owsn
Hastings	Centre half back	Armstrong

Isaac	Outside right	Jeffries
Pierson	Inside right	Stiles
A. Lane	Centre forward	Watts

"Soccer" Football Guide Out.

A very interesting and comprehensive article on association football, by Sir Ernest Cecil Cochrane, Bart., is the feature of the "Official Soccer Football Guide," which is the latest addition to the Spalding Athletic Library. Sir Ernest recently toured the United States and Canada with the British team, and is recognized as a leading authority on the game. The book contains the complete revised playing rules, pictures of prominent teams, together with a well-written article on "Association Football Among the Schoolboys," illustrated by the pictures of the many teams representing the Commercial High School of Brooklyn and other schools throughout the East and West, showing the popularity attained by the sport.

POWER BOATS FOR BERMUDA.

The large power boat building at City Island for the Bermuda race for the Bennett Cup has been much delayed, and probably will not be in the water until June 1. She is completely planked and decked and her sixty horee power engine is in place.

The other boat for this race is almost completed at Stearns & McKay's yard at Marblehead, and will have a trial trip in a few days. She is equipped with a twenty-five horse power standard engine and is owned by Peter Shields of Philadelphia.

Five entries have been received for the long-distance power boat race from New Rochelle to Marblehead. Two are from Boston, two from New York, and one from Bridgeport. The Bridgeport boat is the latest entry, and is the Argo owned by John Armstrong. She measures 36 feet over all.

Lehigh No Match for Stevens.

The lacrosse team of Stevens Institute won its first league game here to-day by defeating the team representing Lehigh University by the score of 12 to 2. Stevens played aggressively throughout. That Lehigh was no match for the Jerseymen was plainly evident after the first few minutes of play, for the Stevens team quickly made several goals in rapid succession. Stevens had made five goals before Duncan shot the first goal for Lehigh. Much credit is due to the Stevens goalkeeper, Sturken, who made several sensational stops. Four more goals were added to the Stevens total before the end of the half, making the score 9 to 1. In the second half Lehigh played a much better game, holding Stevens to three goals, while Prechtel made their only other goal.

Richard Mansfield in Auto Club.

With the additional increase of 200 to the active membership limit of the Automobile Club of America sixty-six new active members have just been elected by the Board of Governors, making a total club membership of 1,066, in addition to the 230 non-resident or associate members, which has also been slightly increased. Richard Mansfield, who has been an enthusiastic motorist for several years, is among the new members, and others who will now enjoy the advantages of the new club in West Fifty-fourth Street are Amory S. Carhart, George McKesson Brown, William Manice, Isaac Untermyer, Charles A. Singer, John S. Huyler, Benjamin Briscoe, Pierre A. Proal, Percy R. Pyne, 2d, John O. H. Pitney, John D. Chapman, John L. Waterbury, George B. Post, Jr., Henry U. Palmer, E. C. Converse, G. G. Frelinghuysen, Jay F. Carlisle, Austen Colgate, Austin Flint, Jr., Charles F. Mathewson, and William W. Caswell.

Chicago's Unique Automobile.

The most unique equipage seen on the boulevards of Chicago, and one which attracts the attention of the observer, is the automobile used by Charles A. Coey as his private car. The motor is of the sixty horse power type, but it is with the body and impedimenta carried that Mr. Coey has allowed his imagination to run riot. The car is painted a pure white with delicate striping of gold, with a gold monogram of the owner's name on each door. The interior is upholstered in white kid leather. The ceiling is sky blue, with fleecy clouds, stars, and a full round-faced moon, the moon and the stars being made to shine by means of electric lights. Two clocks keep check on each other for the correct time, while a mirror and a complete toilet outfit are on the wall. An electric signal tells the driver to go ahead, turn, go home, go slow or fast. The car seats four comfortably, and a meal can be served on the small table, the provisions being carried in a buffet fastened to the running board of the car.

Auto Party Views Parkway Course.

PORT JEFFERSON, L. I., April 27.—William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., Harry Payne Whitney, and about sixty other men who are interested in the Long Island Motor Parkway, came here to-day by train and in automobiles, and were the guests at luncheon of Dean Alvord. They spent the afternoon in looking over the proposed route for the automobile parkway, which is to be built this Summer.

Air-Cooled Motor Test Stopped.

The motor of the 12-horse-powr Franklin car which was started last Wednesday in the salesrooms of Wyckoff, Church & Partridge, Broadway and Fifty-sixth Street, to show a practical test of their air-cooled engine, was stopped shortly after noon on Friday. It was found that two spark plugs had short circuited at the same time, causing the engine to stop.

HERRESHOFF VICTOR IN LAKEWOOD GOLF

GOOD FIELD IN HANDICAP

Best Gross and Net Scores Made by Philadelphia Player—Fogerty Has Close Cup Match.

Special to The New York Times.

LAKEWOOD, N. J., April 27.—Frederick Herreshoff, the young Garden City golfer and the present metropolitan interscholastic champion, won the Lakewood Cup to-day after giving a splendid exhibition of golf in the concluding rounds of the Country Club's tournament. In the morning he had a close match with the Westbrook player, Charles L. Tappin, winning by 2 up and 1 to play, but in the afternoon, when he met the Philadelphian, H. M. Forrest, Herreshoff played a fast game from the start and won by the good score of 5 up and 3 to play. P. A. Fogerty of the Midland Golf Club, Garden City, won the second trophy in the closest game of the day, twenty-one holes being necessary to determine the winner. W. B. Potts of Seabright took the third cup, beating D. H. Thomas of Dunwoodie by 1 up.

In addition to these final match play rounds for the leading trophies of the tournament, the open handicap was an interesting feature of the day, over forty local golfers competing, and the best gross and net scores were made by H. M. Forrest. By the rules of the contest he was only permitted to take one trophy, and he selected the gross score prize, and the net score cup then went to W. B. Potts of Seabright, whose net score was seventy-seven, while Forrest, from a handicap of six, had a net score of seventy-six.

Announcement was made from the office of the Park Commissioner of the Borough of the Bronx yesterday that the golf links at Van Cortlandt Park are now ready for public use and are in good condition.

Columbia Badly Beaten at Lacrosse.

CAMBRIDGE, Mass., April 27.—The Harvard lacrosse team had little trouble in defeating the Columbia players this afternoon in the Stadium by 9 goals to 3. The Blue and White had a good defense, but in pushing it out to assist the attack, which was having no luck in forcing the Crimson line, they weakened their good stone wall and Harvard made four goals in the first half, while Columbia could get none. Good Word for Cup Tour Rules.

Now that the first wave of objection to the rules compiled by the American Automobile Association for the coming Glidden Cup tour is passing away, many motorists who have made a critical study of them are finding many things to favor. John D. Maxwell of the Maxwell-Briscoe Company said last week that one great improvement was the care that has been taken to prevent excessive speeding by any of the contestants.

"Excessive speeding between controls is admitted to have been a handicap to the complete success of the tour last year," he added. "The present rules have been so drafted that this difficulty should be eliminated, or at least greatly remedied. Another commendable feature of the rules this year is the fact that a variance of two minutes is allowed in the control. The penalization of lats controls and also the penalization by cost at the manufacturer's list price should give a much fairer basis of comparison than a year ago. Still another improvement is that the pace-making car, which starts out first and lays the confetti, will regulate the speed, since no competing car will be allowed to pass the pilot."

Johnson Suspends Chicago's Captain.

CLEVELAND, April 27.—Fielder Jones, Captain of the Chicago American League team, received notice of his indefinite suspension from President Ban Johnson here to-day. The action was taken as a result of trouble between Umpire Stafford and Jones at yesterday's game on the local grounds. Frank Isbell of the Chicago team received an injury to his thumb in yesterday's game, and will be unable to play for several days.

MIDDIES READY FOR YALE.

Glendon Declares Crew Is the Best He Ever Saw in College Boat.

In view of the permission granted to the Naval Cadets to enter a crew ut Poughkeepsie in the big Intercollegiate Regatta in June, there is lively interest in the boat race to be held next Saturday on the Severn, between the "Middies" crew and Yale. The race is to be two miles and should thoroughly try out the possibilities of the Annapolis boat, for Yale is reported to be going extremely well. The Midshipmen have the advantage of earlier work in the shell than has been possible for Yale, but though they made a runaway race against Georgetown, two weeks ago, the Blue is regarded as an altogether different proposition.

Rowing on the Severn at the short distance gives Annapolis an advantage over most of the college crews. The Middies have been able to train specifically for the short distance, and having no big later contest to look forward to can be gotten on edge for the early races. The big fellows who look forward only to the later and longer race are not able to whip into anything like their best form. Then there is usually rough water on the Severn, with which the Naval Cadets are familiar, while the visiting crew is invariably bothered. This does not detract materially, however, from the very excellent record they have made in the races recently rowed.

At Poughkeepsie they will not have the big advantage they enjoy on the Severn on account of familiarity with the bend in the river and the current, and on account of the rough water. Then they will have to row four miles instead of two. This is not so great a difference as is generally imagined, for the Middies actually cover four miles conetantly in their practice work as well as sprinting, and have been in such superior physical shape in most of their races that it is believed they will have no trouble in staying the course.

Challenge for Rowing Championship.

TORONTO, Ont., April 27.—Wray, the Australian sculler, who has been coaching the Detroit Boat Club, has challenged Durnan to row on Toronto Bay for the championsip of America. Durnan, it is thought, provided the stakes are big enough. The race will have to be rowed in July, if at all.

Western 'Varsity Crews Swamped.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 27.—The 'Varsity eight-oared race was declared off to-day after the three competing boats had been swamped in succession, Stanford first, California second, and Washington third. The water was rough, and the accidents occurred soon after the start.

STATUS OF TOM LONGBOAT.

The investigation into the amateur status of Thomas Longboat, the Indian runner, has been completed, and awaits the action of the Executive Committee of the Amateur Athletic Union. The trouble with the Canadian A. A. U. and the peculiar suspension and reinstatement of Longboat were all thoroughly investigated. The gift of $500 by the City of Toronto to Longboat may serve to complicate matters, however. The outcome is important, not only in that it will determine the standing of one of the very best long distance runners in the country, but in that it may seriously affect the relations of the A. A. U. in the United States and in Canada.

Longboat ran in the Marathon race at Boston last week under protest, and this race still hangs fire. The Indian won handily and established a new record. The showing he made in that race was remarkable. For the winner is far from full maturity of strength. He is now only 20 years of age, and if a bona fide amateur has a long and brilliant career ahead of him.

He has already declared his intention of training for the Olympic run at Athens and says he has no fears of the investigation into his amateur status.

The Phoenix Fishing Club will fish from the motor yacht Kingfisher, Capt. Louis Kindt, from Stapleton, S. I., on May 15, 19, June 2, 16, 30, July 14, 28, Aug. 11, 25, Sept. 8, 22, and Oct. 6.

The Glendale Pleasure Club has elected the following officers for the ensuing year: William Oldenburg, President; Fred Borcherding, Vice President; George Roschian, Recording Secretary; William A. Miller, Treasurer, and Samuel Manchester, Sergeant at Arms. The first fishing trip of the club will take place to-day.

The Greenwich Village Fishing Club announces that the first trip will be held on board the motor yacht Tartar on Sunday, May 12, leaving from the Eldert Pier at Hammels, Rockaway Beach.

The Social Fishing Club will fish from this Georgie M., from Wreck Land, as follows: June 23, July 1, 21, Aug. 4, 18, and Sept. 1. The officers are: J. Dunn, President; H. Stagg, Vice President, and C. Ziegel, Secretary.

The first trip of the Widgeon Fishing Club was a most successful one. The sailing dates for the season are: May 5, 19, June 2, 16, 30, July 14, 28, Aug. 11, 25, Sept. 8, 22, Oct. 6, 20, and Nov. 3, 17.

The Lafayette Fishing Club has just completed its clubhouse, situated at Broad Channel, on the trestle. The cost of the building was $1,500, exclusive of labor, which was donated by the energetic members.

The formal opening of the deep-sea fishing season will take place to-day when the Mohican Fishing Club will make its initial visit.

The next meeting of the United Anglers' League will be held Thursday, May 2, at 6 P. M., at 64 Sumner Avenue, Brooklyn. Anglers are invited.

Blackfish are habitual residents of local waters. Any month they may be taken in such places as Seabright, off the Jersey Coast, and Seventeen Fathoms, a popular place for anglers about eight miles off Sandy Hook.

Smelts are reported to be biting at Raritan River. James Golden on Friday caught fifty-four large ones. Other good catchee have been reported.

Blackfish are feeding off Seahright, and the hand line fishermen are catching many of them. Codfish are still taking the bait at the Fishing Banks.

The prospects for a successful deep sea fishing season were never better than this year, judging from the way favorable reports come in. Local anglers have good reason to believe this year will be an exceptionally good one.

While some catches of cod are being reported, it is evident that they will not run in such quantities as they did last Fall. The cod that are in the local waters are simply the "strays" that seek shallow water on their way to the Banks of Newfoundland.

Local tackle and bait dealers say this is to be one of the best flounder seasons, judging from the way the business in bait and tackle has been since the report that flounders were out of the mud.

There are ten varieties of flounders to be taken in New York waters. The largest of these varieties are known as the halibut, and are often taken weighing twenty pounds. The Winter flounders, which are now the chief source of delight among local anglers, are the smallest, and differ from the other varieties by the fact of their having no teeth.

The steamer Angler will begin the regular season on Tuesday and will make regular trips daily, except Mondays, leaving Eighteenth Street at 7:15 A. M. and Battery Landing fifty minutes later. Fishing during the past week has been very good, and among the best catches have been codfish, blackfish, bake, ling, whiting, and cummers. The best catchee last Friday were made by Gus Eitel, G. Kemple, A. Keyser, J. Rand, John Rogler, H. Heyman, J. Neal, M. McLean, and Charles Seibert.

The Widgeon Fishing Club caught codfish and ling on their trip of April 21 aboard the sloop Widgeon.

The Glendale Pleasure Club will leave from Canarsie to-day aboard the Duans for a deep sea fishing trip.

Fluke, or plaice, make their appearance in local waters about Decoration Day, but the height of the season is generally around Independence Day. Fluks offer the best sport for the deep-sea variety of anglers, and a catch of 100 pounds in one day is not a rare thing among anglers.

Two 50 to 1 Shots Won.

LEXINGTON, April 27.—The largest attendance in the history of the Kentucky Racing Association was present to-day at the opening meet of the season, and saw a number of the best races ever contested over the course. Most of the races were won by long shots. Beatrice K. and John Marrs, both as good as 50 to 1, won in succession.

FINAL SHOOT AT TRAVERS ISLAND

GREAT DAY FOR W. N. BAVIER

Wins Three Trophies, Including Coveted April Cup, After Twice Tying with Competitors.

Trap shooters experienced a banner day at the traps of the New York Athletic Club at Travers Island, yesterday. It was the wind-up shoot of an exceptionally interesting season, and the conditions were all that the most exacting could have wished for. The wind was not strong enough to make a difference in the scores, and the light was perfect throughout the six events on the card. W. N. Bavier captured no less than three of the trophies, twice tying with his competitors, and winning in the shoot-off, and once capturing the prize outright.

The most important of Bavier's victories was that in the April Cup, at 50 targets. In this he tied with Fred Hodgman, each having two legs on the piece of plate. Bavier, handicapped at 14, and Hodgman, handicapped at 4, engaged in the deciding contest, with the result that the former "killed" 45 of the clay birds, while Hodgman scored but 41.

The Huggins Cup, the next important trophy on the list, brought about a triple tie with Bavier, Fred Pelham, and F. H. Schauffler. Each had a record of two legs, but Bavier again filled out his 25 targets, with Schauffler at 23 and Pelham at 21. The same trio tied for the Frick Shield, an annual trophy. In the shoot-off Schauffler scored 24, while the others fell behind him. Scores:

Y. M. C. A. YACHT TO CRUISE.

Plans to Make Five Trips to Jamestown During Summer.

The Young Men's Christian Association is planning a novel undertaking, cruises from New York to Jamestown and back on the yacht Amazon, presented to the association last year. The cruises are outlined to take thirteen days, and there will be five trips to Jamestown during the Summer. The first will start on June 15, the second on July 6, and the others on July 20, Aug. 3, and Aug. 17. The privileges of the cruise will be opened to the senior members of the association who are also members of the Y. M. C. A. Yacht Club, and the charge of $30 made for the yearly dues, including one cruise.

The Amazon is a schooner yacht, 108 feet long, 90 feet on the water line, with 21 feet beam, and 10 feet draught. She has 95 tons displacement, and will accommodate twenty-five men on each cruise. Those who make the trip must do seamen's work, standing watch, assisting with the sails, manning the small boats, running the launch, and doing the lighter work about the vessel. The heavy work will be done by a small crew of sailors.

NINE YACHTS FOR MAIER CUP.

Fife Cutter Zinita and the Yawl Lila Latest Entrants.

Two more entries have been received for the race to Bermuda to be held under Brooklyn Yacht Club auspices for the Maier Cup, one in the first and one in the second class. The former is the Fife cutter Zinita, owned by Herman Cohen of New York. The new entry in the second class is the yawl Lila, owned by R. D. Floyd, which competed in last year's race, and met with such unfortunate mishaps.

Details of the Bermuda boat, designed by H. C. Masters and entered for the race have been received by the committee. She is 36 feet 6 inches over all, 27 feet 6 inches on the water line, and 10 feet 6 inches beam.

The yawl building at New Rochelle for Rear Commodore Maier is planked, and the joiners are now at work on her interior fitting. She will be launched May 15. She will be the largest boat in the class, and will have to allow Lila six hours, and the Bermudian nine hours.

Timely Assistance of Fishermen Saves F. G. Wacker from Drowning.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., April 27.—Frederick Glade Wacker of Chicago, a Yale freshman, was capsized to-day in the annual regatta of the Corinthian Yacht Club. He would have drowned but for the timely assistance of two fishermen's boats. The fishermen pulled him from the water and took him and his boat to shore. The regatta was won by Stephen L. Langdon, 1908, of New York City, who finished 1 minutes and 50 seconds ahead of the yacht of Elward Boles Cowles, 1910, of Rye, N. Y.

No Harvard Cricket This Spring.

Capt. C. G. Osborn of the Harvard cricket team has announced that cricket will be abandoned for the Spring at Harvard, as there is no available crease left on Soldiers' Field since the new tennis courts have been started, and because there is not sufficient material. There is considerable material in the freshman class, but the team is prevented from drawing upon it by the new eligibility rules.

IN THE REAL ESTATE FIELD

The Ogden estate sale has monopolized the market's attention—at least since 9 o'clock Wednesday morning—and well it might, since not in recent years has there been a real estate auction sale in this city possessing so meny remarkable features.

The offering has been a most convincing demonstration of the apparently unsatiable demand for well-located property on the part of casuel real estate investors and the general public, for it has been one of the noticeable facts in connection with the sale so far that the professional buying has been practically nil. It was this fact that led many to think—and they were not chronic pessimists, either—that Auctioneer Dey was shouldering an almost impossible undertaking in trying to dispose of 1,100 lots of such character at the present time. The Ogden tract, it was pointed out, while in the direct line of the city's growth and admirably located from a geogrephical point of view, is not to eny great extent made up of lots ready for immediate building—of the sort to tempt the general real estate public—while, on the other hand, the professional operators, the developers, and the "jobbers in lots" are, as a class, pretty well loaded up.

Suffice it to say that this prognostication has been knocked into a cocked hat. For three whole days, from 9 o'clock in the morning to 5 in the afternoon, the Vesey Street Salesroom has been thronged and in the crowd were few faces familiar to the auction room regulars. About 650 out of the 1,100 parcels included in the offering have been sold for over $1,100,000, and there is no reason to suppose that there will not be just as active bidding for the first lot offered when the sale is resumed to-morrow as there was for the first lot put up on Wednesday morning. The prices on the whole have been excellent, while the successful bids of $17,800 for one of the more desirable corners and of $18,500 for three-fifths of a lot at another commanding point, must have astonished even those who had looked upon the success of the sale as a matter of course.

In the private sales branch of the market ths week has yielded a creditable volume of business, with a few transactions above the average in point of size. No. 574 Fifth Avenue was sold for the fourth time within as many years, the price having advanced in the series of deals from $222,500 to $425,000. Downtown there was a quick resale of the property 441 Broadway, and smaller deals on Walker and Lafayette Streets, as well as an investment purchase covering a group of buildings on Cliff Street, just north of the Brooklyn Bridge.

BUILDING AT GARDEN CITY.

Operations at Garden City Estatea are going forward with renewed activity. Maxson & Co. of Westerly, R. I., who recently purchased sixty lots there, have already begun the construction of a large number of houses, and the large amount of building material now arriving has necessitated the laying of a new siding at the Garden City station of the Long Island Railroad. A large force of men is at work laying out the new subdivision of Garden City Estates.

The Rickert-Finlay Realty Company has sold in Broadway-Flushing to Catherina Haarje the plot, 60 by 100, on the east side of Eighteenth Street, 320 feet north of State Street; to William Yude the plot, 60 by 100, on the cest side of Eighteenth Street, 360 feet north of State Street, and to John P. Lubbe the plot, 60 by 100, on the east side of Eighteenth Street, 300 feet north of State Street. In Douglas Manor the company has sold to Louis Hall the plot, 60 by 100, on the south side of Ridge Road, 270 feet west of Douglas Road; to William J. Cady the plot, 60 by 100, on the south side of Ridge Road, 210 feet west of Douglas Road, and to Carrie Trabaud the plot, 40 by 100, on the south side of Knollwood Avenue, 220 feet east of the East Drive; also, in Westmoreland, to Anna Pelzer the plot, 80 by 214, on the west side of Westmoreland Avenue, 140 feet north of Locust Place; to Alfred L. Campbell the plot, 60 by 179, on the west side of Westmoreland Avenue, 223 feet south of Bayview Avenue; to Anna G. Norman the plot, 40 by 100, on the north side of Locust Place, 100 feet west of Westmoreland Avenue, and to W. R. Anderson the plot, 40 by 100, on the west side of Bayview Avenue, 205 feet south of Summit Avenue.

The Queens Borough Corporation has sold a large parcel at Kissena Park North to an out-of-town syndicate for $30,000. The property will be improved this Summer with cottages costing from $6,000 to $9,000 each.

NORTH SHORE DEVELOPMENT.

Much Building Expected This Year—Lot Market Shows Good Demand.

In discussing the present demand for property on the north shore of Long Island E. S. McKnight of the McKnight Realty Company said yesterday:

"The records of the Building Department of Queens Borough show that in Bayside, Flushing, Whitestone, and Murray Hill 425 dwellings and etores were built in 1906. I expect that this record will be broken this year, and it ie safe to predict that in the above pleces over a thousand houses will be crected. The Bayside-Flushing Company hava recently purchased the Bell property at Bayside and 1,500 lots in this tract will be put on the market through the McKnight Realty Company. Ae soon as the improvements are completed the company will erect fifty housee—a fair illustration of the demand for homes."

The McKnight Realty Company has sold to varioue buyers eighteen lots in Lawrence Manor, Bayside, at prices ranging from $475 to $650; also, seven lots in Kenmore, Whitestone, at from $325 to $500 each, and to Frank S. Tolman and Thomas H. Davies a plot of fifteen lots on Fourteenth Street, Flushing Terrace, for about $15,000.

The following sales at Elmhurst Heights are reported: To L. A. Messinger the plot 40 by 100, on the north side of Penfold Road, 80 feet east of Kensington Terrace; to Frederick Eckles the plot 60 by 100, on the south side of Arlington Avenue, 100 feet west of Woodside Avenue, to L. G. Brimmer the plot 40 by 100, on the north side of Hillcrest Avenue, 80 feet east of Kensington Terrace; to John O. Gallander the plot 60 by 100, on the north side of Colonial Parkway, 120 feet east of Kensington Terrace, and to A. L. Cuthert the plot 20 by 100, on the east side of Woodside Avenue, 40 feet south of Pennsylvania Avenue.

AT SHINNECOCK HILLS.

Development Work Now in Progress on Tract of 2,700 Acres.

The development of a tract of 2,700 acres at Shinnecock Hills is being carried forward by the Shinnecock Hille and Peconic Bay Realty Company. Over $100,000 has already been spent on the improvement of the property, and a new inn is now approaching completion.

The tract is about three miles east of Southampton and near the new course of the National Golf Association, which, it is expected, will be made the finest in the world. The high, rolling land of the Shinnecock Hills, overlooking Shinnecock Bay on the south and Great Peconic Bay on the north, has long enjoyed popularity as a place for Summer residence which will be enhanced by the development work now in progress.

BETTER OUTLOOK FOR TENEMENTS

Adjustment of Supply and Demand Now Going On in Various Sections.

END OF PAPER TRADING

Comparison of Present Conditions with Those of a Year Ago—City's Growth.

A year ago we were in the midst of the wildest speculative activity which this city or any other city in the world hes ever witnessed. The rising flood of prices had threatened to swesp away all conservative standards of value, and nearly everybody took a most roseate view of the feature. To suggest a cessation of this activity or even to hint at any break in prices was to invite the title of an alarmist or an old fogy. Nevertheless, even at that time, I essayed to sound a note of warning as to overspeculation in land and overbuilding of tenements in the upper end of Manhattan and in the outlying boroughs, and at the eame time called attention to the sound condition of well located tenement property in the Borough of Manhattan.

A elight comparison of the symptoms that then existed and those that we now find might not be unwise or unprofitable. The transactions siuce Jan. 1, 1907, are not nearly as numerous as those for the corresponding period last year. In plans filed for tenement houses we find a far larger shrinkage. The number of new buildings of this class at present under construction and that will be ready for occupancy during the Spring and Summer is negligible, while last year tenements and apartments were under way which when completed could accommodate, I think I may safely say, fully 500,000 inhabitants. The loen market, in spite of tha repeal of the annual mortgege tex law, is tight, and mortgages are even more difficult to obtain now than they were last Spring, albeit the interest rate is somewhat lower.

Small wonder, then, that those novices who were carrying too much sail before the propitious breeze of prosperity with never a thought of a possible change in wind or of a sudden squall, and who were thoroughly delighted with their swift progress—progress too swift for safety—should be surprised to find their frail craft capsized as soon as the wind veered. And yet, although in March, 1906, the firmament was sunnier and more cloudless, I am by no means prepared to say that we are more liable now than then to sail into a storm. I believe that the clouds which hover over the preaent market will fest disappear, and that the prospects for a clear, calm sea are more propitious now that they were a year ago.

Less Paper Trading.

To-day we have fewer sales, it is true, but thoae we see reported are sales of real estate not of mere paper contracts from one operator to another. There is less speculetion but more genuine investment. Wall Street methods that had obtained in the real estate field are giving way to conservative, genuine real estate buying and selling. This likewise is by no means an unmixed evil, as it puts an end, for the present

PREPARED AND POWDERED LIME ARAGON For Finishing PEERLESS For Scratch, Browning and Cement Mortar.

No other Lime can be compared to this for

QUALITY, ECONOMY, and SPEED IN WORKING.

STRONGER than lump Lime, because all impurities are removed in the process of refining and hydrating.

MORE ECONOMICAL than lump lime, because it not only sells at a lower price, but makes more and better mortar, requires less calcined plaster, spreads over a greater surface, takes less troweling, and effects an IMMENSE SAVING OF TIME, for it

REQUIRES NO SLAKING, but is ready, when mixed with water and sand, for immediate use, and

GUARANTEED NOT TO PIT OR BLISTER on the walls.

Can be mixed on the upper floors of tall buildings and applied to the walls immediately.

GREATLY IMPROVES CEMENT MORTAR by making it denser and stronger, smoother, and very much easier to work, and waterproof.

WILL NOT AIR SLACK OR SPOIL, even though kept for years before using.

WILL NOT HEAT, SWELL, OR CAKE IF WET; water just limbers it up. Put up in barrels, cloth, and tough paper sacks.

THERE ARE TIMES

when an opportunity presents itself to buy a good parcel at a price that is below the market value of property in that section, where the present owner needs ready cash. To the one who can step in and buy at that time a desirable investment can be secured with a future profit assured.

I have handled several propositions of this kind to advantage for my clients and they have taken a profit on their investments.

I know of a few parcels that to-day can be bought on these lines, and if you want to make some money it is to your interest to get the particulars.

They are all located in the Borough of Manhattan.

SPECIAL

I want $50,000 for a special fund for some matters that have been submitted to me and which will assure of good returns in the very near future if acted on at once. In order to secure these I will receive subscriptions of $1,000 or more from individuals to make up this amount. This particular matter is one that requires prompt action, and your immediate consideration is desired.

Living on a Mistake.

When you have made a MISTAKE and have to LIVE ON IT, and get up EARLY in the morning TO GET AWAY FROM IT, and have to pull a tired heart BACK TO IT every night, you commence to think hard thoughts about the man who told you what a "beautiful suburb" you were buying in.

DON'T CUSS your bad judgment for having bought a cheap "cabbage patch" lot:—you were probably a "free rider" on a "special train,"—the track was clear and you were rushed through so quickly that your judgment got warped, and you bought where the train stopped. But before you invest AGAIN go out on the REGULAR week-day train and see how it works out. See how you will like to ACTUALLY LIVE there. If it is NOT a good place for you to live, it is NOT a good place to buy or for you to figure on SOMEBODY ELSE buying FROM YOU.

YOU CANNOT figure on profitable investments if you make the mistake of investing along ONE line of transportation—transportation is the first thing to figure on—it's the only sound reasoning basis to determine Real Estate investments on, and ONE line of transportation is little better than NONE at all.

In New York City, THIS SPRING, every investor has a ONE-TIME CHANCE to buy REAL New York City property in a City sub-division, within the limits of the OLD CITY, which is to be served by SIX RAPID TRANSIT LINES—property that you could not be buying at FOUR TIMES to-day's prices, were it not that it had been fenced in and used for racing for many years.

THIS BEAUTIFUL, FAMOUS OLD RACE TRACK PROPERTY,

is now opened up for building or investment, and to those buying at PRESENT PRICES it offers an UNPARALLELED OPPORTUNITY.

Now within FORTY MINUTES of the Shopping District ANY HOUR of the DAY or NIGHT; soon to be within TWENTY-FIVE MINUTES of the Shopping District at ANY HOUR of the DAY or NIGHT, and by ANY ONE of SIX lines of transit.

Don't wait—New York can only grow in ONE direction—NORTHWARD—and there are 350,000 new inhabitants each year to be housed—call or write for particulars—and the present LOW prices.

Come to see us TO-DAY or send for particulars.

22 Minutes From 34th St. Ferry. At Whitestone Landing Station.

In natural beauty and environments this Suburb has not its equal anywhere near New York. Being situated on a high bluff, every point commands magnificent views of the Sound and the shores beyond—even unto the distant Palisades.

HEALTHFULNESS IS INSURED BY ITS HIGH SITUATION.

The evolution of Beechhurst into a high-class and exclusive suburban colony is now in full progress. Houses ranging in cost from $6,000 to $15,000 are being constructed and will be finished in May.

The improvements for which we have spent over a quarter of a million dollars are all but completed. They include sewer and water mains, electric light, graded streets with cement sidewalks, a sea wall along the shore front, and various ornamental landscape effects.

As for transportation conveniences—there are trains every half hour during the busy hours of the day, and the railroad station is within four minutes' walk from the choicest part of the property.

Prices of lots are not based on inflated valuations. We have not discounted the transportation improvements which will bring BEECHHURST as close to the heart of New York as 135th St. is to-day.

BOOKLET "T," CONTAINING PHOTOGRAPHS, WILL BE MAILED ON REQUEST.

According to Captain von Reventlow It Will Be Between the United States and Japan Over the Philippines

AT the next Hague Peace Conference the predominant question will be the problem of disarmament. Last Tuesday a rumor came from Washington that Baron Speck von Sternburg, the German Ambassador, who went home ostensibly for a vacation, was in reality the bearer of an important message to his war lord from President Roosevelt on this very subject. It was said further that two other Ambassadors, the Spanish and the French, might have to rearrange their plans for the Summer. The cause of this diplomatic turmoil is the fear of what may happen in case Germany and Austria refuse to discuss the proposal.

Germany's objection to disarmament was displayed again last Wednesday, when the Minister of War, von Einem, in a speech to the Reichstag, intimated that Germany must complete her rearmament with the newest weapons in order to be ready for "the next war."

Only a few weeks ago there was published in Berlin a book which sought to prove that what Germany needs for self-preservation is not disarmament, but the immediate increase of its navy to a point where it could hope to fight with England on something approaching equal terms. The author is Graf von Reventlow, a "Captain Lieutenant" in the navy and editor in chief of the Armee und Marine, (Army and Navy Journal.) In view of the author's official position it is fair to assume that the work was submitted before publication to the authorities in the Leipziger Platz and was at least permitted by them. THE TIMES has received a copy of the volume from its correspondent in Berlin. "World Peace or World War, Which Way Is Germany to Turn?" is the title, with a sub-title: "Political-Military Reflections Before The Hague Peace Conference."

Is the Next War Ours?

What makes the book of especial interest to American readers is the author's matter-of-fact assumption that the next war must be between ourselves and Japan over the Philippine Islands. He regards these as the great disturbing factor for the world's peace to-day and calls them "the burning question of the future." His end and aim in writing the book was to demonstrate the instant need of a prompt aggrandizement of his country's navy. He never doubts that it will be needed soon to be an effective menace to the secret but implacable foe (England) of Germany's dear friend the United States in our rapidly materializing war with Japan.

The stronger the German fleet the more useful as our ally, he insists. President Roosevelt's action in the California school crisis indicates that America is afraid of Japan and seeks to prevent a present war. If Germany wishes to profit by the inevitable conflict, she must hurry to make herself an ally worth our while. All ideas of disarmament have been done away with by the Japanese-American crisis and even before it occurred he believes the American Government proved itself alive to the danger by voting a battleship to excel the Dreadnought and by planning three similar ones. He draws up a table of the German shipyards to show that his own country could build a dozen new ships a year if it wished and that every one of them could be completed within thirty months of its inception.

Our best friend among the powers is Germany, our bitterest though secret foe is England. That is Capt. Reventlow's contention. Germany is our friend, not because she loves us more, but because we endanger her less. His discussion of the peril of Pan-Americanism, whether, all things considered, Germany should help or hinder this, our National aim, (as he thinks it,) is one long disclosure of enlightened selfishness. Which would pay Germany better in the long run, to fight the Monroe Doctrine or to uphold it? Which would be more to her advantage, to stand by the Triple Alliance or to throw it overboard? Would she get more out of it if she insisted on the use of floating mines in war, or on their prohibition? on a liberal or on a strict interpretation of contraband of war? Nor does he hide his selfishness in any cloudy phrases. He states again and again in so many words: "Which would pay us better?"

The following extracts from the book, largely in the author's own words, will show how he develops his ideas:

"Before the Russo-Japanese war the trading countries of the world enjoyed approximately free competition in the Far East; Russian and English influences predominated, and the United States was making rapid progress. America was jealous of Russia, dreaming even then of making the Pacific a 'closed American sea.' To her sorrow she therefore joined Great Britain in her hostile attitude to the Muscovite.

* * * Disappointed in the hope of mutual exhaustion after the Manchurian conflict, England cleverly made an ally of the conqueror, seizing her opportunity to strengthen herself in Persia and Thibet, while diminishing the influence of Russia. Though thoroughly exhausted financially, Japan seized the trade of Manchuria with celerity and determination. In the other provinces of China she is acting according to the principles of 'peaceful penetration,' with similar rapidity and adaptability. At the courts of the Viceroys, in all centres of administration, even down to the Tao-Tai, in the army corps, and everywhere, the Japanese are at work.

"Neither Korea nor Manchuria is a poverty-stricken country, and Japan is sure to secure her war indemnity therein. The Siberian Railway, the partly finished Vladivostok, the pecuniary straits of Japan will be inconsiderable hindrances should the call to a race war go forth. What a commanding position is that of Japan, her self-confidence full-grown as the result of a successful conflict, at the height of her powers, and conscious that, save for the English navy, no power on earth can endanger her. It is true she is economically depressed for the moment, but the desired power of expansion has been attained; rich provinces have been conquered by the Mikado, or are his de facto, and await only their exploitation. He needs nothing but time, and it has been indubitably proved that the Japanese can wait if they see any object in so doing. It remains to be seen whether they will care to do so.

"The battle of Tsushima gave Japan absolute control of the seas of Eastern Asia, and thereby also of the coasts. All the other powers withdrew their fleets whose purpose until then had been to secure the 'open door.' Great Britain profited thereby this much, that she could concentrate her fleet in the German Ocean and thus keep vigilant watch over her German cousins. At this time, also, she announced her purpose of making of Singapore a second Gibraltar, nominally to prevent Germany from using Kiao Chow as an effective base. The real reasons were twofold: England sought a naval base outside the Japanese striking distance on the one hand, on the other the United States had begun to fortify Cavite and Olongapo. In place of the former conglomerate of lesser naval powers—of which Russia and Japan were considered as about equally the leaders in strength—she had now only one really powerful one to face in the Far East, and that one very much at home in those waters. Erecting a naval base in the Philippines threatened her with the coming of a second mighty navy in that distant region, where her only haven was the comparatively useless one of Wei-hai-Wai. That port was too near Japan to be safe, to say nothing of the fact that an adequate strengthening of it would clearly have been an unfriendly act. Wherefore she fell back on Singapore.

The Apple of Discord.

"Spoils of war, the Philippines are the undisputed possessions of the United States, which has spent on them up to date 1,232,000,000 marks (about $300,000,000.) The Panama Canal once completed, they will be of inestimable value as a trade centre between the American continent and the Far East, harmful to the commerce of both England and Japan. For Japan the danger is, of course, an immediate one, since it feels itself threatened in its own domain, both military and economic; England's dangers are merely economic. The Philippines are without doubt the apple of discord of the future. A powerful, well-found American navy, with a strongly fortified and convenient base, would compel Japan to struggle once more for the command of the sea in the Far East, and its predominating position and commercial supremacy on the Asiatic mainland and that also under much more difficult conditions than two years ago. The American Navy could not be caught in Rojestvensky's dilemma of two narrow straits; a Japanese fleet, were it never so strong, could not interrupt the communication between the islands and the Continent of America. Neither would the Americans allow themselves to be trapped in that fashion, as is shown by the concentration of their navy on their Pacific coast. It is worthy of mention that ever since they have begun the increase of their navy, they have paid particular attention to enlarging the coal capacity of their fighting ships; furthermore, there must be noted the magnificent coast line of the United States and the extreme difficulty of transportation for an enemy from the Atlantic to the Pacific seaboards.

When Japan Will Strike.

"The Japanese would thus be confronted by an enemy well skilled in an over-seas war; their statesmen have thus far proved themselves far-seeing men, able to forge forward successfully to a predetermined goal. Their two great wars have shown they can labor and wait; mediaeval as their country was but yesterday, they are fully alive to all the tendencies of today. Nothing is more probable than that the rulers of Japan see in the United States of America the great danger of their future, though it is not likely that they covet the Philippines for immediate occupation. These naturally exert their influence also, for it is a group of islands of great natural wealth; they produce what Japan needs, and require no such lengthy development as Korea and Manchuria. Great as the desire for their conquest may be among the mass of the Japanese people, the Government would be strong enough to hold them in check until the psychologic moment could be seized. But should the question of pride of race arise it would be a different matter. Then populace, Government, and Mikado would be united to strike for supreme dominion of the Far East, the fetich of the Japanese.

"A symptom of this feeling is the memorial prepared by the then Governor of Formosa and later Field Marshal Kodama a year before the war with Russia. It took for granted that that conflict was imminent and unavoidable, and expressly stated it would be but the first stage in Japan's path of progress. After Russia had been fought, France was to be despoiled of Cochin-China. This was by no means the theoretical disquisition of a general staff man, but the well-considered and fully feasible plan of one of the most important Generals in the Japanese Army, who was at the same time a very prominent statesman. It purposed to enumerate the military means and methods, though only in the barest outline, by which a fixed political programme might be realized.

"France was badly scared when Kodama was so promptly justified by the ensuing war with Russia, supposing her provinces were to be attacked without delay. She did not appreciate the fact that such a plan takes years for its full fruition; nevertheless she is to-day utterly incapable of warding off the blow when it does fall; Germany must lose Kiau-chow whenever the Japanese see fit to take it away, though they would return it to China, whose good-will is of the utmost importance to them.

"Their intimate relations with the Celestial Kingdom were demonstrated last year, when the American boycott was declared in revenge for the Chinese exclusion. This boycott was engineered by Japan, at one with its yellow brothers in their hatred of the United States. This is admitted just as little as it is a vague assumption. Englishmen and Germans living in China have affirmed it unanimously; whoever failed to believe it at that time has doubtless changed his opinions since the Japanese-American quarrel over the schools.

"Japan's population increases about half as fast as that of Germany, while the Japanese Islands have proportionately even less room for them and powers of nutrition. So the overflow inundates the Philippine and Hawaiian Islands, and the stream of emigrants to the American continent waxes rapidly greater. The negro question furnishes quite enough of a race problem in the United States; the overrunning of its island possessions by the Japanese has caused an increasing bitterness and anxiety, and the race conflict in California may be considered as the resultant of all these forces. Japanese immigration into South America, into Argentina especially, is a constant menace to the imperialistic idea of a Pan-America. The race feeling of the Americans has been intensified by the negroes, the local economic competition by the sober, simply living Japanese is doing its share; the Governments of the States as well as of the Union must see in the Japanese immigration a growing hindrance to the ever more consciously desired exclusiveness of the Federation of States as a National State. The consequence of this discontent came to a head in the school quarrel, race hatred showing itself openly. The colonization of the island provinces acquired by the war with Spain has cost the United States infinite pains and expense, with very little success thus far. This is another irritating factor in view of the enormous Japanese immigration into these very islands. It is clear, therefore, that friction between the two countries is bound to increase, even if the completion of the Panama Canal did not constitute a life-and-death problem for Japan's economics.

Anglo-Japanese Entente Not Lasting.

"The Anglo-Japanese alliance is still new and strong, but the little yellow man does not look on his British friend as a peculiar and superior brand of white man," says the author. "Prominent men in Japan said plainly enough that force of circumstances compelled intimate relations with Great Britain, but that there was not the least intention of preserving these a moment longer than absolutely necessary." A clear indication of this feeling he finds in the promptness with which Japan, its strained finances notwithstanding, began to build its own navy and munitions of war, practically all of which had formerly been purchased of its ally. Russia, he thinks, can find nothing but profit to herself in any conflict, European or Asiatic. Her attitude in the event of a war on the Pacific Ocean would simply be one of friendliness to China.

"From a military point of view there is nothing to prevent the Japanese from seizing the Philippines and thereby precipitating a war which is bound to alter the political map of the world. The United States is not ready for this war. It could be considered as prepared only in case it had a fleet with a Philippine base equal to the Japanese; or if it possessed a far more powerful fleet which, coming from the American coast, could recover the already invaded Philippines by a successful contest for the dominance of the East Asiatic waters. Neither the one nor the other is true in this case. The Japanese can make themselves masters of the Philippine Islands any day with perfect ease and at a minimum cost. Then the American fleet, defective as it is in training and in personnel, would no longer have a base in the Far East. Thus the defense is impossible."

Should Germany want to take sides with the United States, her only direct aid could be to put Tsing-Tau at the disposal of our fleet. A useless procedure, he decides, since the town is practically defenseless by land; even though the United German and American flotillas should strive to defend it until our main fleet arrived, it would thus be taken behind their backs.

"Germany would only lose all Kiau-Chow and profit as little as the United States. Nevertheless I believe that in a war in which the stakes are so prodigious no sentimental considerations should hinder us from risking Kiau-Chow.

Importance of England's Attitude.

"The great question is: What will England do? * * * Probably she will station a powerful fleet at Singapore or Hongkong and await developments." It might even be sent to Vladivostok if the inevitable Anglo-Jap-Russian alliance had reached that stage by that time. Should it appear advisable for us merely to enter a strong protest against the seizure of the islands instead of sending a fleet to recover them, we would have to exert commercial pressure on England and to strengthen our armament while concluding alliances with Continental Europe; on the other hand, this course might cause a serious manifestation of popular antagonism. Our National recklessness might force an unwilling Administration into an unready conflict.

"In all probability the result must be a serious weakening of the military powers of the United States. Inevitably a commercial weakening would follow, putting off a Pan-American union indefinitely, since all the enemies of America would naturally do their best to assist the centrifugal tendencies on the South American continent. This again would mean an enormous increase of English influence and the death of the Monroe Doctrine, with all this implies. In any case, the East Asiatic market would be practically lost to the United States; no one can doubt this who realizes that the 'open door' is kept open only by force.

"Should we assume that the United States does not expose its fleet to the danger of annihilation, America would lose only the Philippines, Hawaii, the East Asiatic trade—and prestige. That would be a serious loss, but would be counterbalanced by the preservation of the fleet and the certainty of a successful war of revenge. Money, shipyards, and technical knowledge would enable the Americans shortly to build a monster fleet far outstripping the Japanese. It is undoubted that such a humiliation would cause an enormous activity and an outburst of patriotism as yet unprecedented." England would prefer that America and Japan should fight each other to exhaustion, so that the British world empire could dominate the trade of all the world.

"Maximilian Harden said recently in the Zukunft, quite correctly, that any economic weakening of the United States could only be profitable to Germany." While true enough, the author says, it would be England that would seize the Atlantic trade. Military dangers must not be forgotten. England would be freed, for ten years at least, from the fear that after destroying Germany's sea power she might be unable to cope with the navy of the United States. The author has no doubt that in such a case Great Britain would find it absolutely needful "in the interests of civilization and the peace of the world" to annihilate the German fleet. "My conclusion is, therefore, that so long as the antagonism subsists between England and Germany, so long as our navy is so inconsiderable compared with the English, in spite of a lively sense of the Pan-American danger, it is against Germany's best interests that the military and commercial standing of the United States should be seriously injured at the present time."

How Germany Could Aid.

Reventlow then proceeds to show that Germany can prevent England from helping Japan to crush our fleet, by bringing her own to a reasonable state of strength. Japan, he has shown, can seize the Philippines at will; our fleet is a good one, he admits, excellently manned and armed. Japan's casualties would, therefore, be large, even though be has no doubt at all that she would be successful. England would, therefore, be the predominant power in the Far East, until we could build our new fleet, "which no power could prevent."

England, he says, is politically dependent on Canada, commercially on the United States. Probably we should grasp these advantages in case of hostility with Japan. With or without moral sanction, "for that would be unimportant," we should certainly make Japan's ally responsible and seize Canada; should we then refrain from sending our fleet to the Pacific and keep it at home instead, Great Britain would be in a most uncomfortable dilemma: either she could repudiate her alliance with Japan, according to Bismarck's maxim that no State could be required to sacrifice its vital interests for the sake of fidelity to an ally; or she might be actively hostile to the United States. For the first course England might find justification in a technicality. The terms of her treaty demand only a defensive alliance with Japan; she would not find it difficult to show that that country was the aggressor, even though we had been provoked into opening hostilities.

"Furthermore there is no international supreme court, and in such cases a national egoism replaces international hypocrisy as a matter of course." The English Government would then say, as in the Russo-Japanese war, that it had been of service to the peace of the world by seeking to restrict the war to a duel between Japan and ourselves. Her concern for India, the French fears for Indo-China, would de facto compel a French-English-American alliance. As this would run counter to her settled policy of weakening the United States, we should have to make appropriate concessions.

Should she, therefore, become actively hostile, our one true and useful friend would be the German Empire—if her fleet were by that time strong enough to be of use to us. War with us, even for a fleet like the English, would be a very serious undertaking. Our distance from her coasts, our commercial self-dependence would tax the entire military and financial resources of the English. Should an adequate German fleet be prepared to threaten her in addition, she would surely give up the idea altogether. That the English are fully aware of this state of affairs is, the author believes, the sole explanation for the recent attempts to promote good-fellowship between his own country and herself. He is inclined to ascribe to this cause also the efforts to come to a better understanding with Russia. "England may even be considering the probability, in an extreme case, of coming forward as the champion of the white race against the yellow one." He comes to the conclusion, that if Germany rises to the occasion, England will want no unpleasantness with her, much less a war, and would do her utmost to keep the Germans friendly in the event of a crisis.

"Of the United States the same is true to a still greater degree and with no qualifications whatever, should the Japanese volcano continue active, which seems inevitable. It is quite probable that it will not come to an eruption quite yet, and America is doing all she can to delay it, as shown by the case of the California schools, meanwhile preparing herself as best she can for a crisis. The fleet of the Union will concentrate as soon as practicable in all possible force on Honolulu, (a base which, unfortunately, is but in its inception,) meanwhile the work at Guam and in the Philippines will be rushed at all possible speed. Will the Japanese await their completion? That is a question that cannot be answered, though it is certain that all the powers will do what they can to delay the conflict."

Remarkable Book That Describes Germany as Our Best Friend and England as Our Bitterest Foe

"The Philippines are, without doubt, the apple of discord of the future."

"Germany must lose Kiau-Chow whenever the Japanese see fit to take it away."

"Nothing is more probable than that the rulers of Japan see in the United States of America the great danger of their future."

"The colonization of the island provinces acquired by the war with Spain has cost the United States infinite pains and expense, with very little success thus far."

"The Anglo-Japanese alliance is still new and strong, but the little yellow man does not look upon his British friend as a peculiar and superior brand of white man."

"The friction between the two countries is bound to increase, even if the completion of the Panama Canal did not constitute a life and death problem to Japan's economics."

"There is nothing to prevent the Japanese from seizing the Philippines and thereby precipitating a war which is bound to alter the political map of the world. The United States is not ready for this war."

HOW THE ARMY USES WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY

Compact Apparatus That Can Be Easily Transported Now an Integral Part of Every Military Outfit—Twenty-five Miles the Present Limit of Easy Communication

WIRELESS telegraphy is destined to play an important part in the wars of the future, but it is of practical value every day to the armies and navies of the world, even in the piping times of peace. There is not a war, or navy, department in the world that has not proved the utility of the wireless. The warships of almost all nations are equipped with the apparatus and by its means they talk with each other, and with the stations on shore, receiving instructions and delivering reports.

After the warships, it is in the signal service of armies that the wireless is most used. The German army has its Funkentelegraf Battalion, as well as its Balloon Battalion, and the rapidity of its work has delighted the general staff. Since the signal corps of the United States Army adopted the wireless system as a part of its regular equipment its efficiency has become even greater than before. The corps has been commanded by Brigadier Gen. James Allen since February, 1906, and the progress in wireless signalling is due largely to his efforts.

Simplicity a Great Advantage.

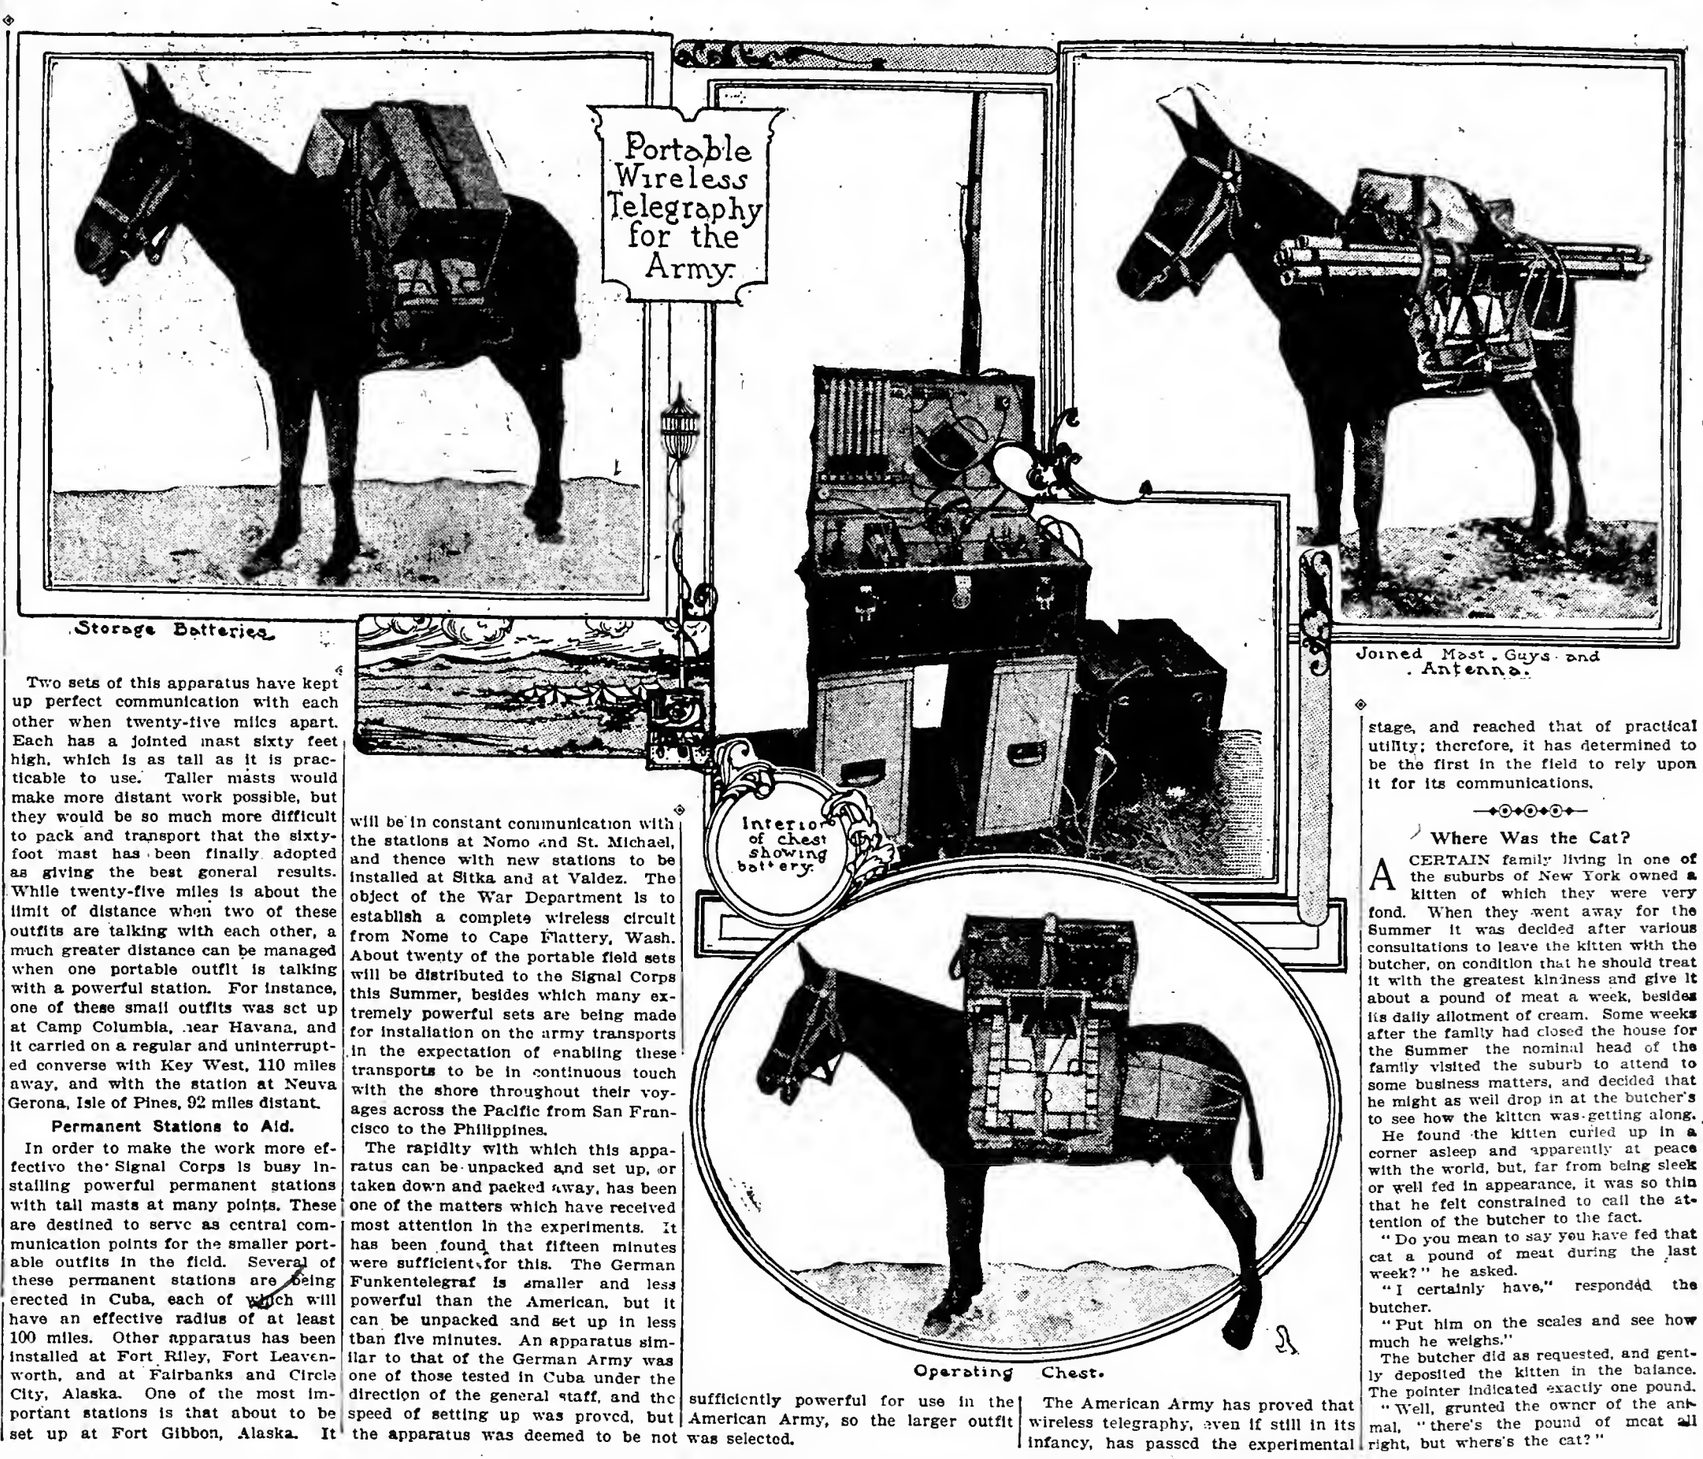
The great value of wireless telegraphy lies in its simplicity. Communication between two armies, or between two posts, has hitherto been carried on by regular telegraph. This, of course, requires wires, but when an army is moving rapidly it cannot carry its telegraph wires and poles with it. The advance of an army is often delayed by the necessity for planting poles and stringing wires, and there is always present the fear that a sudden raid by the enemy may cut the wires and thus render all the work in vain. With a wireless outfit, on the other hand, an army may advance as rapidly as men and horses can go and still be always in touch with its base.

It does not take a soldier to see the value of the wireless to the signal corps; any man can appreciate it. Of the navy the same is true to an even greater extent; for the wireless telegraph places each warship in constant communication with shore, and also with every other vessel within several hundred miles. In the event of an accident on board news of it can be signaled to shore or to another warship, and aid can be sent instantly. The Navy Department often has orders which it wishes to send to distant warships, and without the wireless system these orders would have to wait indefinitely. Time and space have been almost eliminated by the new invention.

The chief difficulty in the way of the use of the wireless in the army hitherto has been that of transporting the apparatus. The most important part of this apparatus is a tall pole bearing antennae, a pole far too tall for transport in any vehicle hitherto used by the army. To solve this difficulty the Signal Corps and the Quartermaster's Department have been co-operating in conducting a series of elaborate experiments.

These experiments have had a wide field, extending from Fort Leavenworth, Kan., on the west, to Cuba on the east, and from Mount Gretna, Penn., on the north, to Key West on the south. All the portable wireless apparatus that has been invented has been tested, and the system which is deemed most suitable for field use has now been selected. Chief Packmaster H. W. Daly of the Quartermaster's Department has devised a method of packing and transporting it in three loads aggregating 425 pounds. The operating apparatus is packed in one chest, weighing 145 pounds; the storage batteries which furnish the power form a second load, weighing 180 pounds, and the mast, which is jointed like a fishing rod, with its antennae and guys, forms a third, weighing 100 pounds.

This apparatus was selected after the most rigorous tests. At the Signal School, Fort Leavenworth, these tests have been going on for almost a year; at the camp at Fort Gretna, last Summer, some elaborate practical tests were made; in Cuba, since October, 1906, the tests have been almost continuous, and at the laboratory of the Signal Corps in Washington the apparatus has been subjected to the investigations of the most critical men in the army. The experiments in Cuba have been especially valuable, as they have partaken of the conditions of active campaigning.



Two sets of this apparatus have kept up perfect communication with each other when twenty-five miles apart. Each has a jointed mast sixty feet high, which is as tall as it is practicable to use. Taller masts would make more distant work possible, but they would be so much more difficult to pack and transport that the sixty-foot mast has been finally adopted as giving the best general results. While twenty-five miles is about the limit of distance when two of these outfits are talking with each other, a much greater distance can be managed when one portable outfit is talking with a powerful station. For instance, one of these small outfits was set up at Camp Columbia, near Havana, and it carried on a regular and uninterrupted converse with Key West, 110 miles away, and with the station at Neuva Gerona, Isle of Pines, 92 miles distant.

Permanent Stations to Aid.

In order to make the work more effective the Signal Corps is busy installing powerful permanent stations with tall masts at many points. These are destined to serve as central communication points for the smaller portable outfits in the field. Several of these permanent stations are being erected in Cuba, each of which will have an effective radius of at least 100 miles. Other apparatus has been installed at Fort Riley, Fort Leavenworth, and at Fairbanks and Circle City, Alaska. One of the most important stations is that about to be set up at Fort Gibbon, Alaska. It will be in constant communication with the stations at Nomo and St. Michael, and thence with new stations to be installed at Sitka and at Valdez. The object of the War Department is to establish a complete wireless circuit from Nome to Cape Flattery, Wash. About twenty of the portable field sets will be distributed to the Signal Corps this Summer, besides which many extremely powerful sets are being made for installation on the army transports in the expectation of enabling these transports to be in continuous touch with the shore throughout their voyages across the Pacific from San Francisco to the Philippines.

The rapidity with which this apparatus can be unpacked and set up, or taken down and packed away, has been one of the matters which have received most attention in the experiments. It has been found that fifteen minutes were sufficient for this. The German Funkentelegraf is smaller and less powerful than the American, but it can be unpacked and set up in less than five minutes. An apparatus similar to that of the German Army was one of those tested in Cuba under the direction of the general staff, and the speed of setting up was proved, but the apparatus was deemed to be not sufficiently powerful for use in the American Army, so the larger outfit was selected.

The American Army has proved that wireless telegraphy, even if still in its infancy, has passed the experimental stage, and reached that of practical utility; therefore, it has determined to be the first in the field to rely upon it for its communications.

Where Was the Cat?

A CERTAIN family living in one of the suburbs of New York owned a kitten of which they were very fond. When they went away for the Summer it was decided after various consultations to leave the kitten with the butcher, on condition that he should treat it with the greatest kindness and give it about a pound of meat a week, besides its daily allotment of cream. Some weeks after the family had closed the house for the Summer the nominal head of the family visited the suburb to attend to some business matters, and decided that he might as well drop in at the butcher's to see how the kitten was getting along.

He found the kitten curled up in a corner asleep and apparently at peace with the world, but, far from being sleek or well fed in appearance, it was so thin that he felt constrained to call the attention of the butcher to the fact.

"Do you mean to say you have fed that cat a pound of meat during the last week?" he asked.

"I certainly have," responded the butcher.

The butcher did as requested, and gently deposited the kitten in the balance. The pointer indicated exactly one pound.

"Well, grunted the owner of the animal, "there's the pound of meat all right, but where's the cat?"

War Horses at Training School

IT RARELY occurs to the average person what an important part the horse plays in the economy of war, for without well-trained, trustworthy horses even the magnificent cavalry and artillery of France and Germany would collapse, and the whole war machine come to a full stop. Thus it is little wonder that France spends $1,100,000 a year on her troop horses, Germany $970,000, and Great Britain $400,000.

The great military Nations, too, maintain State breeding establishments, as well they may, seeing that on a war footing imperial Germany is supposed to put 201,100 horses on the battlefield, France 202,040, Austria 105,196, Great Britain 100,000, and Russia the enormous number of 548,400. The Czar's vast Asiatic dominions yield an inexhaustible supply of hardy animals for the imperial army.

No doubt one of these days the horse will have disappeared from the battlefield altogether in favor of the motor. Already inventors and general staffs are discussing the feasibility of gigantic armored cars, powerful enough to cross any kind of country—land Dreadnoughts, in fact, capable of blowing towns out of their path.

Price of Horses Doubled.

It is worth noting, however, that in spite of the vast number of automobiles in this country, the price of horses has doubled in the last seven years. Efficiently to horse an army is a vast and complicated business. The work of training, classifying, and allotting the animals to the various branches of the service calls for a large and expensive staff of veterinary experts. For there is much difference between horses for heavy, medium, and light cavalry, and also between those needed for the horse artillery, field artillery, transport, and commissariat.

Of late years the burden borne by the cavalry charger has been somewhat lightened; but, even so, what with the stalwart trooper, his arms, ammunition, baggage, and spare stores, the figure may well touch 300 pounds—a very serious load for rough cross-country work and all the wear and tear of active campaigning.

It was notorious that the hundreds of thousands of "green" young animals bought recklessly by Great Britain during the Boer war utterly failed the British army on the veldt, besides hampering Lords Roberts and Kitchener, prolonging the costly war, and causing thousands of soldiers to sacrifice their lives, simply through inability to avoid a better mounted enemy. In one "bunch" 25,872 Argentine horses were sent out, and altogether the vast number of 265,000 journeyed 7,000 miles across the seas to take part in that great war.

"There were occasions," wrote Lord Roberts, "when the presence of an adequate supply of remounts would have enabled our generals to deal a crushing and decisive blow at the enemy. This was instanced during the second invasion of Cape Colony, where a few trainloads of useful horses issued to flying columns would certainly have resulted in the capture of De Wet and his commando, an event which would have brought the war to a speedy conclusion, and so saved fifteen months of further warfare, the expenditure of thousands of lives, and scores of millions of treasure."

Very interesting are those great establishments of the military powers where horse and man are trained as a fighting unit under the direct supervision of the General Staff. For the horse is the cavalryman's other self and arrives as a recruit either half or wholly broken. At the dépot he is trained, and then drafted according to size, color, and weight-carrying capacity into the various regiments, where he makes the acquaintance of his other self, and where the twain shall, for all military purposes, become one—on drill and parade, in peace or war.

This training of horse and man is seen in all its perfection in the great French cavalry school at Saumur, which was founded in the eighteenth century. Hither come all the smart young lieutenants from the great military school at St. Cyr, to learn equitation and horse training, as well as veterinary work, shoeing, saddle making, and military telegraphy.

Here you will find a whole hierarchy of riding instructors, captain-professors, jockeys, and trainers, and the scene in the great practice ground is vastly picturesque, especially when officers and men of the Mohammedan North African regiments are in training with their horses.

At Work Before Dawn.

Work begins before dawn by the light of great electric arcs, and the younger horses are broken to every kind of trick, while carefully confined between two padded columns. You will see gay dragoons and hussars galloping, leaping hurdles, hitting the Turk's head, mounting and dismounting at full speed. Or here will be recruits trying to maintain their seat without bridle or stirrups, while the riding master flicks the horse with his whip, causing him to send the exhausted cavalryman high up in the air, as if shot by a living catapult.

Through no less than 112 separate lessons does the French cavalryman go before he is thought fit to get upon his horse. Meanwhile, the charger's education is also under way. He is taught to swim rivers, for the time may come when all the bridges will have been destroyed in an enemy's country, and victory or defeat may depend upon the swimming ability of the cavalry horse. Nor would it ever do for these animals to be what sportsmen call "gun-shy."

The war horse of to-day must be indifferent to all sorts of startling reports, from the crack of a service revolver to the dread roar of parked artillery. Some of them take the flash and report very quietly even at first, and pass on to more severe trials. Others are very timid and require much patient and gentle treatment before they are broken. At last, however, a fifteen-pounder might be fired almost over their back and they would hardly flinch.

After this they are taught to face fire, that is, to gallop fearlessly up to a line of infantry blazing away with their rifles. Curiously enough, many of the horses that would face guns firing black powder a few years back will now shy and grow terrified at flash and roar not accompanied by smoke.

There is something pathetic about the education of these faithful creatures. The most intelligent among them are selected for scouting work and develop a sagacity almost human. On the slightest whisper they will lie down and entirely conceal their rider or turn themselves into a living shield for him as he lies prostrate behind, with his carbine barrel resting upon their flank.

Years ago the mortality among horses in actual warfare was terrible. In the Franco-German conflict at least 55,000 horses were killed, while in Napoleon's campaign beyond the Niemen 65,000 out of 80,000 were either killed outright in battle or else succumbed to wounds and sickness.

Great attention, however, is paid nowadays to wounded horses on the battlefield, and the veterinary surgeons go in search of fallen animals, for whom, as for the ordinary soldiers, there are ambulances and hospitals replete with electrical appliances, operating tables, and every device that modern science can suggest.

OFFICERS IN COLLAPSIBLE BOATS TEACHING CAVALRY HORSES TO SWIM THAT THEY MAY BE ABLE TO CROSS RIVERS IN AN ENEMY'S COUNTRY WHEN THE BRIDGES ARE DESTROYED

How He Caught It.

THERE are a thousand and one ways in which contagious diseases can be communicated from one person to another, but the strangest case that I have ever heard of came to me during the tonsilitis epidemic that broke out in this city several days ago," said the man who dabbles in medicine. "While walking along Broadway I saw in the distance the tall figure of a man who looked like a human wireless telegraph receiving station. His tall neck was swathed in a silk handkerchief. On closer scrutiny I recognized an old college friend.

"'Hello, Smudgkins, old boy,' I said, wringing his hand warmly, 'What's the matter up above?' Looking at him closely I noticed that he was exceedingly pale and very much down in the mouth, like a man who has lost his last friend.

"'Ton-sil-i-tis,' he managed to reply, chokingly.

"'Too bad. Take——'

"'Let me tell you how I got it,' he said, interrupting me. I knew Smudgkins was an interesting fellow, who worshipped the truth, so I listened attentively while he continued. 'Several days ago I called up a friend of mine on the telephone. I noticed that her voice, which is usually sweet and well modulated, sounded strangely thick. I inquired the cause and she told me she had been ill with tonsilitis for a week. I told her to cheer up, and then knowing how painful it is to talk over the telephone when one has tonsilitis, I rang off. Within a few minutes I felt a peculiar sensation in the side of my throat. By night my neck was stiff and my body aching with cold. I consulted a physician. "Tonsilitis," he said. I had caught it over the telephone.'"

Better Facilities in Subway

NO more painful and dangerous crowding on the Subway stations; no more fighting mobs forcing their way into the trains through the narrow doors, like wild cattle struggling into a corral; no more noisy guards, yelling boisterously, "A little lively, please!"; no more needless swinging on revolving straps, that toss you into somebody's lap; no more long delays by trains at stations, and no more of many additional obnoxious features of the Subway at present.

This sounds like an idle dream, but it is nearer reality than universal peace. The day is not far distant when such conditions will prevail in the "tubes," provided certain investigations being made by the present administration of the Interborough Rapid Transit Company are productive of the ideal results they seek to obtain, which from information to hand it is reasonable to suppose they will be. It means something so radically different from present deplorable conditions that the skeptical New Yorker will fail to grasp it and will scoff at it. It is about as incomprehensible to him as were the possibilities of the telephone to the financiers from whom Bell solicited aid.

When Theodore P. Shonts became President of the Interborough-Metropolitan Company he announced vaguely, after investigating conditions, that although he realized the difficulties of the problem which had come to him for solution he would labor honestly and conscientiously in the interests of the public to remedy conditions. Other men have said as much before, and the situation has grown worse instead of better. But the public, so often deluded, has faith in the new energetic student of the situation.

Studying the Problem.

"We are making extensive investigations at present with a view to remedying these conditions," said Mr. Shonts to a representative of THE TIMES in his office yesterday in the rush of work that comes only to a man in Mr. Shonts's position. "Personally I am riding around in the Subway trains seeing conditions for myself. I have engaged experts to study the situation in other cities and the best means of remedy. These men are examining the best types of side-door cars that are to be found in this country.

"At the same time I have a corps of employes of the company taking data at all the stations. This data shows the number of persons entering and leaving a train, the length of the stop, the distribution of the persons on the platform, and many other essential details. On the results of these investigations will depend largely whether we adopt the side-door car for use in the Subway and what other improvements we shall undertake."

While Mr. Shonts was in the middle of this statement a telephone bell at his elbow rang persistently. Then followed a brief businesslike conversation, in which Mr. Shonts made an engagement with the person talking to him. "Mr. Harahan of the Illinois Central," said Mr. Shonts to his secretary. J. T. Harahan is President of the Illinois Central, which has used successfully for years side-door cars on its suburban traffic in Chicago. Mr. Shonts announced without reserve that he was going to consult with Mr. Harahan about these very cars. This shows the type of man who has undertaken to solve New York's traction problem, which has defeated so many men before him.

One Phase of the Problem.

An idea of what this problem is so far as the Subway is concerned may be had at any of the express stations during the rush hours, when traffic is heaviest. Take the Grand Central Station, for example. Here locals crowding rapidly upon one another discharge hundreds of passengers. Very few of these mount the stairs leading to the street. The great majority remain to catch the expresses. The congestion on the station, with its limited capacity, is exceedingly bad, the passengers distributing themselves aimlessly, not knowing just where the entrances to the cars are going to be. At the same time the expresses are coming in. They discharge very few passengers. Their arrival starts a general rush on the station for the doors of the cars. The result is a jostling, shoving, pushing mob, struggling over the entire length of the platform. Finally this mob in single file—only one person can enter the present Subway car at a time—fights its way into the train. The doors are slammed to and the express moves on. But it is many minutes behind the schedule. "Fifteen minutes to Harlem" is thus made a farce. In an attempt to govern the distribution of the passengers on this station the company recently installed signs announcing "Broadway Express Stops Here," or "Lenox Avenue Express Stops Here." These failed to solve the problem, for Lenox Avenue expresses often stop abreast of the Broadway express signs and vice versa.

"In this country, with the steadily increasing density of passenger traffic upon railroads having suburban business, and particularly upon the elevated and Subway lines handling a heavy metropolitan traffic, the limitations of the end-door cars have become apparent," recently commented Railway and Locomotive Engineering, which has studied the situation exhaustively. "The remedy usually applied of increasing the number of trains does not afford the desired relief, for the reason that no improvement can be effected in the crowding of passengers at the ends of the cars with the incidental surging, struggling efforts of many persons to gain immediate entrance through the end doors.

"The remedy lies in preventing the formation of the crowded groups at the ends of the cars and of distributing the passengers evenly over the entire length of the station platform, so that when trains arrive people may step directly and conveniently from the platform to the side doors of the cars and avoid the uneasy movement up and down the platform to get opposite the end entrances at their more or less uncertain points of stoppage."

Continuing, this comment declares that the side door is the only practical solution of the problem.

In the Boston Subway during the rush hours passengers leave the cars through the side door and enter them through the end doors. Guards on the stations cry out instructions to them. Thus there are two streams, one entering and the other leaving the car, which do not conflict. In the New York Subway there are also two streams, but they collide head on and cause most of the trouble. In controlling these streams lies the crux of the problem. The ability to handle the living load at stations is practically the carrying capacity of the road.

The side-door car of the Illinois Central has many advantages over the Boston Subway car, and is said to be favored by President Shonts. The design of this car has been worked out by A. W. Sullivan, General Manager of the Missouri Pacific, and William Renshaw, Superintendent of Machinery of the Illinois Central. The car has twelve openings on each side, as well as the usual vestibule entrance and end doors. The floor space within the car is most advantageously used. There is an aisle running along both sides of the car. The seats are arranged back to back across the car, there being accommodations for four persons on each "bench." This arrangement provides a door for the entrance or the exit of a group of eight persons. In all there is comfortable accommodation for 100 persons. This is a decided advantage over the present Subway car, with its long side benches and four pew seats in the centre, which accommodates only forty-eight persons.

Unloading a Side-Door Car.

When a train composed of side-door cars of this description draws into a station the whole of one side practically becomes available for entrance and exit. This is a great time saver. The average length of stops on the Illinois Central suburban trains with these cars is seven seconds. In the Boston Subway, with its side-door cars, the stop is seventeen seconds, and in the New York Subway, with end-door cars, thirty seconds. The superiority of the Illinois Central side-door car over other forms of cars here again is manifested.

Many difficulties stand in the way of the installation of these cars in the New York Subway. Principal among these is the curved station. At such stations the train of side-door cars would present too great a space at the centre or at the ends of the cars, and the danger of accident to passengers stepping across the gap would be great. This difficulty readily could be obviated. The cars could be equipped with a lattice slide underneath, which could be shot out automatically when the train approached a station. Or the stations could be straightened. It has been said that the Interborough Company is thinking seriously of straightening and also of lengthening its stations.

TWENTY FOUR HOURS WITH GOVERNOR HUGHES

How the Chief Executive of the Empire State Conducts the Business of the Commonwealth and Keeps His Pledge to the People to Look Out for Their Interests

NOT long ago, while filling an engagement in a second-class theatre at the capital, where he was occupying the centre of the stage most of the time, John L. Sullivan—celebrated in the annals of the roped arena, and still, despite his age, a splendid reminder of his former fighting self—took it into his head to drop in and "look over" the man who at this moment is holding the centre of the political stage in the Empire State.

The old-time fighter made his way to the Executive Chamber to find an open door and that ready cordiality with which Charles E. Hughes greets all visitors. When he came away from the Governor's presence with eyes beaming and face reflecting the pleasure, the fighter, now out of the game, had experienced in meeting one who was just getting into it, he was anxious to tell all about his visit.

"He squeezed my hand and looked at me for a long, long time out of his keen blue eyes," John L. declared, "and then he said: 'John, sometimes I wish I had your constitution.' Now, what d'ye think of that?"

Some of those who heard the old fighter out didn't know just what to make of it. The Governor's utterance was variously interpreted. At that particular moment the "Old Guard" in the Senate—known as such partly because Governors had come and Governors had gone but they had remained forever, partly because, like the famous Old Guard of the First Bonaparte, they had never been known to surrender—was lining up for a fight to the finish with the Governor over the Kelsey case. For that reason there were some who jumped at the conclusion that the Governor's remark was an allusion to the hard-hitting qualities of John L., born from worry over the outcome. But others put a different interpretation on it. They were those who knew of the almost fatalistic unconcern with which the "Man Down Stairs" was forging ahead on his Gubernatorial way regardless of any obstruction, corrupt conspiracy or political cabal which the men in the legislative halls on the floor above might throw in his path to prevent progress or retard reform.

To these knowing ones the remark indicated merely that Gov. Hughes in one of his rare moments of impulse had voiced a foreboding that must have come to him many times in surveying the gigantic task before him. Mr. Hughes has already succeeded in convincing most men that he has taken his oath of office seriously. His ambition is to do, while Governor, the full duty of a Governor. And though equipped with tireless energy and a rare faculty for sizing up vexing problems and reaching a swift decision, and in addition to that possessed of a greater measure of physical strength than generally falls to the lot of most men of his training, he must have felt apprehensive more than once lest, even with all that, he should fall short of bridging the wide gulf between ambition and supreme fulfillment.

A day behind the scenes with Gov. Hughes would go far to justify the latter interpretation. It would mean a survey of a man arduously applied to a continuous round of duties that to most men would seem irksome, to many dull and monotonous, but which the Governor declares give him the keenest enjoyment.

The Governor is not an extraordinarily early riser. He is generally called at seven. After breakfast at the Executive Mansion, he glances through the morning papers. When he first went to Albany he was in the habit of walking from the Mansion to the Capitol. Recently he has used the carriage which is furnished by the State to its Chief Executive. Punctually at 9 he arrives at the Executive Chamber.

The Correspondence Problem.

Until a few days ago it was the Governor's custom to allot the first hour at the Capitol to his morning mail, which is voluminous and covers the widest range. Besides the purely personal letters, which are numerous, there are communications with a bearing on all the various departments of the State government, requests for appointments, complaints against State officials, with requests that grievances be redressed, petitions for pardons from inmates of the penal institutions or persons interested in their fate, invitations to dinners and public functions, and last, but not least, long and frequently rambling epistles brimming over with advice how to run the office from persons who have not the responsibility but an abnormal confidence in their own superior ability as counselors—the bane of political life in its every stage.

How to get time to give mercly the ordinary care of a business man to this vast correspondence, the Governor has found a problem in itself. Some time ago, in conversation with a friend, he declared that should he devote the time he could wish to his mail, he would have time for nothing else.

To get around this difficulty the Governor recently devised an ingenious scheme. With the aid of Robert H. Fuller, his secretary, Mr. Hughes had drawn up eighteen different formulas of letters, varying from a brief acknowledgment of receipt to a long reply to be sent in response to communications received at the Executive Chamber. All these formulas are numbered, and as the Governor goes over his morning mail he may indicate by scrawling a figure on the letter what sort of answer he wishes sent. While nothing within the ken of human foresight has been left undone to render this system as comprehensive and complete as possible, there still remains a pile of letters every day which require the personal attention of the Governor.

Public Audience to All Visitors.

To avoid interruption while going over his mail the Governor spends this first section of his official day in a little inner room where his predecessors in the Governor's chair practically did all their work and received all their visitors. Promptly at 9:30 Gov. Hughes emerges from his seclusion and takes his seat behind the large square mahogany desk in the Executive Chamber, where in the meantime a long line of visitors has gathered.

All the time up to the hour when the two houses of the Legislature meet is devoted to the reception of members who may wish to consult the Governor in regard to pending legislation. There is a standing rule that visitors should be admitted in their order of arrival, but the Governor has as nice a sense of official etiquette as he has of official dignity, and exception is made for the President pro tem. of the Senate and the Speaker of the Assembly, who are recognized in the Executive Chamber as the official representatives each of his branch of the Legislature, and for the Chairmen of the Senate Committee on Finance and the Committee on Ways and Means of the Assembly, who, in a sense, are responsible for the financial policy of the State. Like the Judges of the Court of Appeals and the heads of the State Departments, in the hours allotted to them, they are always received immediately on arrival.

Until Gov. Hughes became the head of the State administration this large outer apartment was one of the show rooms of the Capitol and served almost no other purpose, except when some large delegation called to see the Governor or a public hearing on some bill was held. It was a mecca for the constant flow of sightseers that go through the Capitol every day with official guides to call their attention to points of interest among the splendors of this sumptuous seat and centre of the governmental activities of the Empire State.

The "Throne Room."

It bore an approximate relation to the Throne Room of a royal palace in some European capital. In design and appointments it is well adapted to impress upon the visitor the fact that government is vested with dignity even in a democratic community. It is vast, has many windows, and from gilded frames on the walls the images of a long line of Governors look down on the $100,000 worth of furniture, frescoes, costly hangings, and heavy carpets. It has an enormous fireplace which has cost a small fortune. To the right of this is hung a life-size picture of Washington and to the left a picture of Theodore Roosevelt. Opposite the fireplace, in a dominant position, stands the Governor's desk.

During past administrations the pictures of Washington and Roosevelt, the fireplace, and the Governor's desk, which in those days had a vacant chair behind it, but was nevertheless always pointed out to the Capitol "tourist" crowd, monopolized the attention of the sightseers.

In these latter days this stately symbol of the pomp and power of government has been provided with a living soul, for the chair behind the Governor's desk is no longer vacant. The picture of Theodore Roosevelt, loved and admired though he be, and the picture of George Washington, Father of His Country though he be, are less the cynosure of sightseeing eyes than the breathing bearded figure who is attending to very serious business just across the room from these images of the past and of the present.

How this large outer apartment, vacant practically ever since it was fitted and adorned for the first Governor who ever occupied the present Capitol, came to take on life is a story in itself. Gov. Hughes for the first few days after his inauguration followed in the footsteps of his predecessors to the extent of transacting official business in the inner sanctum. Visitors who came to talk official business were ushered in there—among them the politicians who ostensibly only had come to pass the time of day and offer their well wishes but showed an inclination to stay long in the secluded presence.

It was after one of these politicians—a man who had borne an important part in the campaign—had called that Gov. Hughes declared he had found the sanctum stuffy and not sufficiently lighted. Whereupon he ordered a fire lit in the large fireplace in the outer room, and transferred himself, together with the Bible and the copies of the Constitution of the United States and the State of New York, from the desk in the inner room to that in the outer, facing the pictures of Washington and Roosevelt.

It might well have been that Gov. Hughes found the inner room stuffy and dark, though none of his predecessors had voiced a similar complaint. One Governor—Odell—had not even found it "dark" enough. There is a large stairway leading to the third floor and running parallel part of the way with the corridor outside the Executive Chamber. One landing of the stairway is so situated that it presents an unobstructed view of the chamber and the inner sanctum through the transoms above the various doors. He hastened to have this defect remedied—even at the expense of the magnificent stairway—by having an ugly wooden partition erected to shut off the view.

While these defects were officially assigned as the reason for the Governor's change of base, persons who know tell a different story. They relate how this particular politician, whose visit closely preceded the change, had entered the inner sanctum with the air of proprietorship, how he had sunk into a comfortable chair and bade the Governor to be seated by way of preface to a long political discussion of the old order. It was then that Gov. Hughes decided that these political talks would be shorter and less embarrassing if they occurred in the comparative publicity of the outer room, and accordingly he transferred the household gods of the State Government to the Executive Chamber.

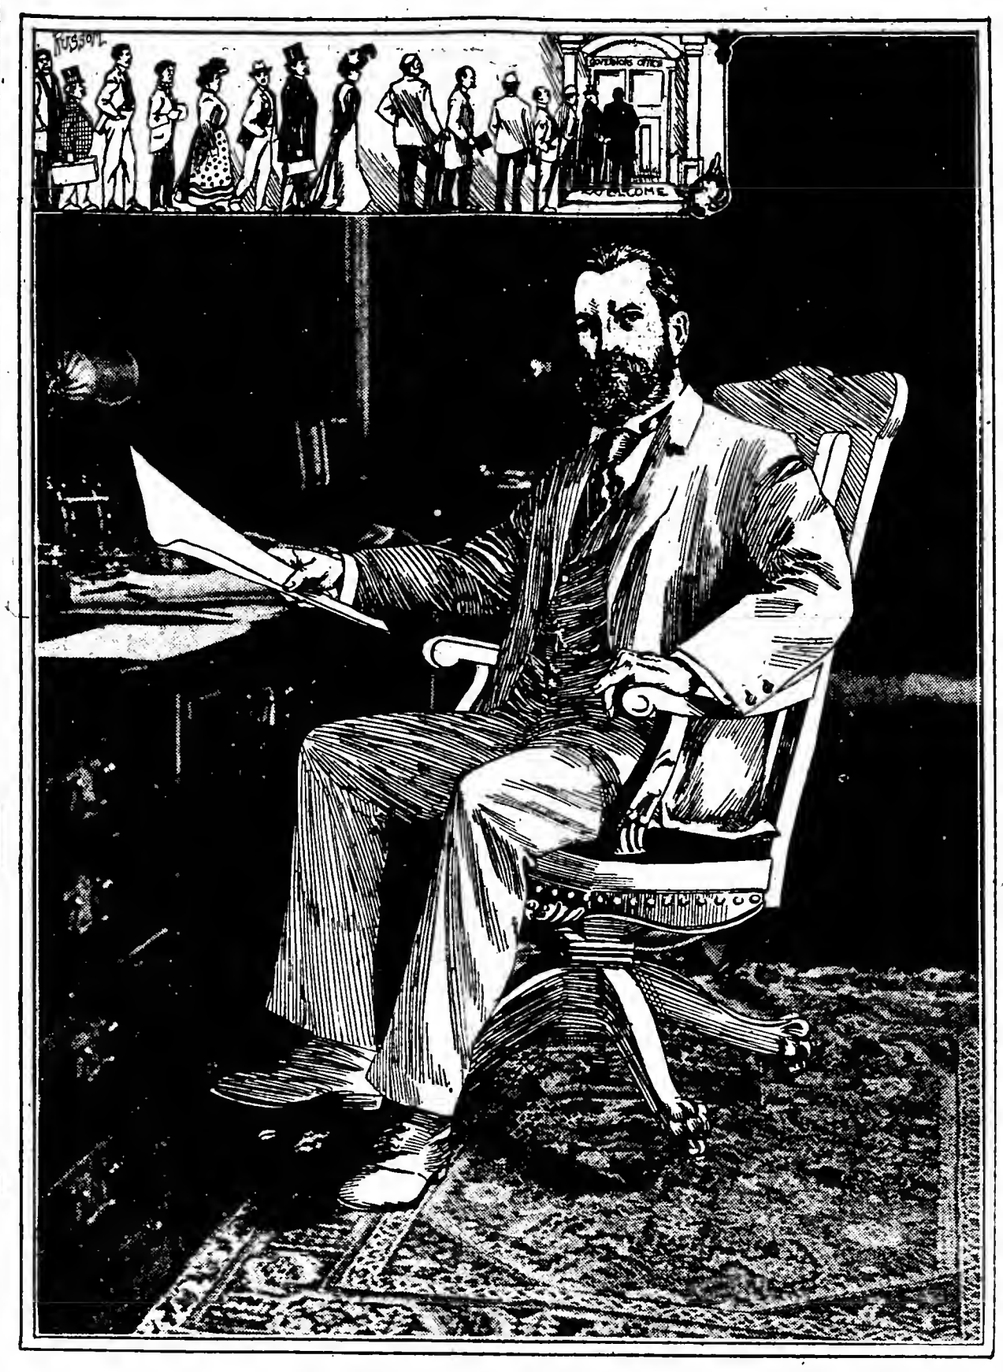
Since then all political talks have been held there. Politicians call on the Governor to-day, but the procession is an ever narrowing one. As a rule they don't like the publicity incidental to a place where a group of sightseers are liable to burst in upon the conference at any time. The Governor has not yet framed up a formula entitled "Answer to a Politician," to be used at such confabs, as he has in connection with his correspondence, but he might as well have done so. His answer to requests for political favors is an almost uniform one, and it runs something after this fashion:

"I am a Republican, but no political expert. I have been an enrolled member of the party ever since I reached voting age, and will be glad to do anything I can in a legitimate way to further the interests of the organization. But I must decline to be influenced in my actions as Chief Executive of this State by party considerations."

And if the request should be for an appointment that might seem undesirable to the Governor, he is likely to add, as he has on several occasions: "I am a good Republican. For that reason and for the welfare and honor of the party we both love I shall consider it my duty to keep certain Republicans out of office."

In this sort of talk the politicians have found little to encourage them. And while they still come, it has become a saying traditional with the Hughes administration that "they just walk in and then turn around and walk right out again." The sprinkling of politicians among the visitors at the Executive Chamber is daily growing less, and if it were not for that fact, the Governor would be seriously hampered in the earnest effort he is making to "give his best effort and his best intelligence to the service of the State," as he pledged himself to do when he assumed office.

The hour between 11, when the Legislature meets, and noon is designated for the reception of State officials. If there is any time left the Governor receives and greets visitors who call by appointment, and, as frequently as this can be done, persons who have some request or petition to place before him and who have not been able to make arrangements for their visit ahead of time. As a general rule, however, this is made a condition, as the Governor's time is filled for days and weeks ahead.



GOV. HUGHES AT HIS DESK.

His Time Carefully Apportioned Between Interviews, Correspondence, Consultations and the Study of Measures Sent to Him by the Legislature

Col. Treadwell, who acts at the same time as his military aide and his social secretary, has a big diary in which all such appointments are recorded. Every morning when the Governor emerges from the seclusion of his inner sanctum to the fulfillment of the duties of his official day a sheet containing an abstract of the diary for that particular day is placed on the Governor's desk. On this sheet, which contains divisions for every half hour, all the appointments made in advance are recorded, and as a rule this schedule is followed out to the end, though as many as half a dozen visitors may have to be edged in within the short space of thirty minutes.

At 12:30 the Governor takes luncheon. On the floor above the Executive Chamber, on what is known as the "Midway"—a corridor connecting the Senate and Assembly chambers—amid clicking telegraph instruments which spell out the story of the day's doings at the Capitol with loops working into the various newspaper offices, and with typewriting machines grinding out the copy, there is a little restaurant where legislators snatch a hasty luncheon between the sessions of the two houses in the forenoon and the committee meetings in the afternoon. This restaurant furnishes the Governor with his noonday meal.

A Half Hour for Luncheon.

It is a frugal meal. Generally it consists of a couple of chops, some bread and butter, and a cup of tea. A standing feature on the Governor's luncheon menu is a large red apple. The food is brought up to the third floor on a small tray and placed in the Governor's inner room, where he takes his meal, away from the public gaze. He is not always alone, though. Not seldom he has some visitor with him when he receives word that his noonday meal has been served.

"I don't wish to seem discourteous," he will say on such occasions, "but even a Governor must eat. Will you come with me and smoke a cigar and we can chat as I have luncheon."

In a niggardly allowance of half an hour, which the Governor reluctantly concedes to his midday meal, he manages to get a few whiffs at a cigar, for he indulges in the weed to the extent of five or six cigars a day. He smokes a long, thin and extremely light Havana. His cigars cost 20 cents each.

The little inner room will furnish somewhat of an index to the Governor's personal tastes. When he moved in he found the walls bare, and they are dark and gloomy hardwood walls. He set about to remedy this defect at once by having some pictures hung there. There are about half a dozen of them. Directly in front of his desk is an etching of Mount Vernon, the Washington homestead. Behind it is a picture of the church of Stratford-on-Avon, and a diminutive Inness landscape. To the right as he sits at his desk is Bouton's picture of the "Pilgrims Going to Church." On the left is a reproduction of Sargent's "Prophets," the original of which is in the Boston Public Library. The centre of this engraving is held by Moses the Lawgiver, and the two tablets of the Decalogue traditional to sacred legend, and on either side is ranged a line of bearded figures representing seers of the Old Dispensation.

With its walls lined with heavy bookcases, one side occupied by a long sofa that reminds one strongly of the lounges in a stateroom on board a transatlantic steamship, and the large desk in the middle of the floor, the room looks small and cramped indeed. The sofa is usually littered with official documents. The bookcases are filled with law books and annual reports of the State departments, and the Governor on moving in had the glass doors removed so as to render these more easily accessible. Side by side with the report of the Armstrong Committee, bound in red, a copy of Lawson's latest output, "Friday the Thirteenth," seems strangely out of place.

The afternoon hours are filled by visitors. Frequently delegations call at the Executive Chamber. The Governor steps from behind his desk. He has a handshake and a friendly word for each member, and frequently makes a short speech. Then the afternoon hours also are set apart for public hearings on bills, hearings on complaints against officials preferred by citizens, and by meetings of the various boards, such as the Building Board, which has the custody of State Buildings, and of the Board of Award, organized for the erection of the new Educational Building.

Two Daily Newspaper Interviews.

Twice a day the Governor receives the newspaper correspondents stationed at the Capitol during the legislative session. Frequently as many as thirty newspaper men are grouped about the Governor's desk at these interviews. Mr. Hughes answers all their questions briefly and to the point. He has not missed one of these interviews except when absent from the Capitol. Of course there are many questions it would be improper for him to answer. Then he says so. But wherever it is possible for him, even though he may not feel at liberty to talk for publication, to enlighten the newspaper men on some subject which he deems it necessary the public should know all about, he never hesitates to take them into his confidence. He has had no reason to regret his frankness. The hours for these interviews are at noon and at five in the afternoon.

Then the doors of the Executive Chamber are closed to the public. But the Governor's day of toil is by no means over. He frequently, when his evening engagements permit, remains at his office as late as seven, and in the last two hours, when he is free from interruption, performs the most important work of the whole day. Those are the hours generally set apart for consultation with Dean Huffcut, his legal adviser, with whom he confers regarding every bill before he signs it. There are many of these. One day last week there was an aggregate of seventy bills which the Governor was compelled to act upon if he did not wish them to become law without his signature, as they would if ten days were permitted to pass after their passage by the Legislature before he took official action.

The Governor's Human Side.

It is generally in these hours also that he confers with Judge Joyce, the pardon clerk, and E. L. Murlin, who has charge of appointments. The petitions for pardons, executive clemency and restoration to citizenship that come from unfortunates who are in the shadow of the electric chair or who have strayed in ways less grave from the path of rectitude are always before the Governor. They are kept constantly on his desk for fear that he may forget them. And it is in the consideration of these that the human side of the Governor comes more sharply to the front than in any other realm of his official duties.

Not long after he had taken office the Governor was called upon to pass in one day on applications for clemency emanating from two young men, neither over 20, who had been condemned and were awaiting execution. That night the lights in the Governor's inner room were gleaming far into the night, and it would be hard to say who spent the most anxious hours—the two condemned men tossing on their cots in the death house at Sing Sing or the Chief Executive of the State, pacing up and down the floor in the little room while the cathedral chimes told off the hours of the night, and seeking strength and inspiration from the picture of the prophets and the two tablets of the law, on one of which stands written: "Thou shalt not kill."

"It was the hardest and most difficult work I ever did," said the Governor to the newspaper men the next day, as with a careworn and haggard expression on his face he announced that the death sentence of the two men had been confirmed.

Gov. Hughes has had no time for recreation since he took office. He spends his night hours with his family at home, except when social or other engagements make that impossible. But even these hours are crowded with work. Every night when he leaves the Capitol he brings with him papers with the contents of which he has not had time to familiarize himself during the office hours. And frequently that work occupies all of his time until midnight and sometimes longer.

The Governor is fond of outdoor exercise. He is a great pedestrian. Last Summer he toured Switzerland on foot and on bicycle. He plays golf, and having joined the Albany County Club expects to be able to devote some time to this sport with the advent of Summer and some ease-up in his official duties. His favorite reading is fiction and he is especially fond of Conan Doyle, but any novel with a thrill in it generally finds favor with him during his leisure hours.

MOST railroad men have a heap of fun when they get together in a quiet, out-of-the-way place, but the conductors and motormen known as "extras" always create fun while waiting to take a car out of the barns. As a rule in these waiting room debating clubs the subject discussed is either of a past occupation or an experience to show what the man might have been if he had adopted some occupation other than railroading. The stories told in these discussions, particularly the stories of the success attained by men who had once railroaded, are as a rule pathetic. Others teem with matters of interest to young men studying how to become successful. For instance, how one conductor drifted out of the game, studied medicine and became a successful physician, now having probably the largest practice of any doctor in Brooklyn; how another who failed utterly as a car conductor studied law, and was elevated to the bench of the District Municipal Court in Williamsburg; how a man like The McManus, tired of railroading, drifted into politics, became a successful leader in Tammany Hall, and was chosen as Assemblyman and then as Senator; how another man who had worked at railroading with McManus—John Daly—drifted away from the car barns to become a policeman, and is now Captain of the biggest precinct in New York.

The humorous stories usually come along when a crowd of old-time railroaders get together in the barns on Eighth Avenue, between Forty-ninth and Fiftieth Streets. It was an old-time crowd of this sort that was assembled in the car barn a few days ago when an argument started on the age of Fort George. This led to a discussion as to when the Summer car schedule would go into effect on the lines running to Fort George. A little fat conductor stretched his head out of the folds of his turtle-like neck and piped:

"We ain't got no particular time as to when Summer should git here," argued Murphy, the Inspector. "Bill Colton sez that every month is a month behind this year because the earth got fifty years behind the sun in revolutions some time ago. That gives us March in April, and Juno won't come till July."

"Well," said the pipey conductor, "Spring skiddoos June 23. Up till that time anyone kin write poetry. Here's one I composed Sunday on the inspector:

Everybody knocks the Inspector man,
The passengers josh him whenever they can,
For he fries the conductor upon the pan,
The public upon him is sore.

The Inspector,
The Inspector,
A grouty old boss,
If he dies it's no loss,
The public upon him is sore.

"It ain't square ter knock the inspector," said Murphy. "They have ter earn a livin' just like youso do. But if I was a literary compositor I'd write something about the motormen. Them's the fellers what gits the public's goat. Listen to this one:

See the mad motorman jumping his switch,
Dashing through crowded streets clanging his bell,
Breaking the speed limit 'cause it's the law;
First he hits one man and then twenty-four;
Scaring truck horses, the children, and dogs,
Filling asylums, poor houses and morgues.

"There's wan thing about it," remarked Big Reilly, "and that is motormen can't be gentlemen all the toime, for ivery toime he tries it he gits his car done up by an automobile. Take them motormen crossing the Brooklyn Bridge, and trying to act gently while passing a truck loaded with barrels of spinnach. The barrels stick out over the wheels and punch holes in the car windys. Is the truckman arrested? No. The motorman's suspended. I'd like to go back to the old horse-car days for mine—the days whon you could control your own car with a word to your team. Git airp! Them were the good old days, and when ye think of 'em it makes yer feel thirsty for a cold drink out of the old oaken buckct."

"Hey, Casey," said the Inspector, "put that in poetry."

How dear to my heart is the old-fashioned horsecar,
When fond recollection presents it to view;
The boney old horses, the whip and the switch-bar,
The track-jumping blockade that every one knew;
The wide-spreading rail and the stone placed upon it,
The rickety lamp filled with kerosene oil;
The boy, who with bean shooter, riddled your bonnet,
Amazed you, then crazed you, and made your blood boil.

The old musty horsecar,
The old dusty horsecar,
The old rusty horsecar
No longer does toil.

"That's fine," said the crowd in chorus, and then called on old Dave, the switchman, to give them something. Dave said that the worst thing he knew about railroading was the clang of the trolley car bell. It was worse than any other bell sound he had ever heard. Then he recited the following, which he explained was a poem he wrote with his eyes shut:

You may talk of mellow wedding bells,
and Bells of Shandon, too;
Of bells that ring at dinner time, perhaps you've heard a few;
The fire bells, the steamship bells, the bells that ring at night
Are all skinned by the trolley gong; yes, skinned way out of sight.

"Ain't there any more poets in the crowd?" asked the Inspector.

"Yes," said Casey. "Louis, the German conductor, has one about a fellow he knew ten years ago. Give us that one on the ladies, Louis; go ahead."

Louis stood up, and scratching his head said: "I got it in my own think, but I can't speech it oudt much. It goes like dis:

I vant to tell one on der ladies,
Who always got too much tao say,
Because vhen dey talk dey say not'ing,
Und sometimes der fare dey don't pay.
Dot makes der conductor excitement,
He steps on deir toes to git square,
Und den he excuses his feetsteps,
Und puts oudt his hand for deir fare.

The next in line was a motorman who got off what he described as a lullaby. It was entitled:

WHEN MICKEY BROKE THE CLOCK.

A good conductor, Michael was, and always quite polite;
But now and then he pinched a dime and soaked it out of sight;
Each new Inspector found him straight, for Mike was up to snuff;
Sometimes he rang it on the clock, but only for a bluff.

Though Mike had never gone to school, somehow he learned square root;
He said it meant, "Root out the coin and soak it in your boot."
The Super liked him very much, and spoke of him quite high,
He thought Mike never smoked nor drank; Mike did it on the sly.

One night—'twas in the Summer time—the night was very dark,
The crowds that came from Coney Isle had been to Luna Park;
Mike Git-it-Quick had lost that day down at the Brighton track,

He had six score upon his car, but rang up twenty-nine,
Then let his pole go flying high, for Mike had cut the line.
The lights went out, and Mike went in, the people could not see;

He turned it once, he turned it twice until he cracked the lock;
The company got no more fares when Mickey broke the clock.

So the crowd laughed long and loudly When they heard the little joke,
They heard just three Inspectors say "I guess the clock is broke."
Mike Git-it-Quick had soaked the coin Far down into his sock;

"That's a good one," said the inspector, "but if I had been Mickey's boss I'd have had him on the carpet Monday morning.

"Rats!" exclaimed the crowd in chorus, and then the railroad poets' convention adjourned.

MR. HENNESSEY CONSIDERS PRESIDENTIAL BOOMS

The Junior Philosopher Is Much Impressed by Globe Trotting as a Means to the End Desired by So Many Statesmen — Taft's Long Start in the Race.

THIS an airly season f'r thim," said Mr. Hennessy.

"Fr' phwat?" asked Mr Dooley.

"Praysidenshul booms," answered Mr. Hennessy. "'Tis eighteen months befoor iliction time, yit th' bur-rnin' quistion iv who is to become famous by sair-rvin Tiddy's third term is agitatin' th' patriotic bosoms iv a host iv politicians an' a few statesmen. 'Tis a pretty subject that will make th' lyres of all th' Spring poets hum:

"Softly bloom, softly bloom,
Taft an' Root an' Fairbanks boom!

"Can't ye see those wor-rds, signed Clinton Scollard, in th' Poet's Cor-rner iv th' Congrissional Rieord? Sure 'tis a lovely theme. An' I don't doubt that iv-ry wan iv th' local poets iv Lincoln, Nibraska, is sittin' up nights tryin' to rhyme "conservatives" with "Autumn leave.'

"Who will be nominated? Ye may search me, Mar-rtin. I have always believed that th' prophicy iv an ivent should yield pricidince to th' ivint itsilf. I'll be contint to say, 'I told ye so!' whoiver gits nominated. Th' best prophets seldom do more thin that. But I'll give ye wan piece iv good advice, Mar-rtin.

"Don't ye bet on inny wan who hasn't a thrimindus ricord iv thravel behind him. Th' men who are goin' to be nominated will be globe-trotters. A new kind iv Praysidenshul boom has loomed up on th' horizon, as Hogan sez. F'r want iv a betther name let us call it th' 'Ar-round th' Wor-rld in Eighty Ways Boom.'

"Do ye think ye cud git nominated f'r Praysident by standin' behind ye'er bar, sair-rvin' free drinks? Niver a bit. If ye were wise ye'er first stip wud be to take a long, long tr-rolley ride through th' wildest suburbs iv Chicago. That wud make a most plaizin' imprission on ye'er adherents. Thin ye wud most likely take in th' Philypines on ye'er way to Cuby to inspict th' Pannyma Canal. Th' number iv ye'er political fr-rinds wud swell outrayjisly. Thin, doubtless, ye wud come home an' rist a month. Half ye'er fr-rinds wud pr-romptly make faces at ye, and pass over to th' Hinnissy Boom. Why? Because Hinnissy had spint that same month in Tahiti. Off ye wud go to Porther Ricky an' Guam, an' all ye'er fr-rinds wud oome tr-roopin' back to ye'er banner. Why?, Because Hinnissy was sick in bed at home with campaign thr-roat.

"Yis, Mar-rtin Dooley. Kapin' close to th' voters no longer manes kapin' close to th' votes. All th' wise min who ar-re now nur-rsing' tinder, dillycate Praysidenshul booms have tumbled to that astonishin' new divilopmint in Amirican politics.

"Bill Bryan was among th' first to understhánd th' new tindincy. 'If voters see me,' he sez, 'they don't vote f'r me,' he sez. 'Pr-robably th' converse is also thrue,' he sez. So he wint ar-round th' wor-rld by megaphone. Ye raymimber that tr-rip, Mar-rtin? Even in th' raymotest par-rts iv th' Orient he held his own on th' fr-ront page iv th' newspapers against th' most disastrous four-alarm fires. Th' headline, 'Bryan Arrives at Nagasaki,' or 'Th' Kaiser Bows to a Cr-rowd Containin' Bill Bryan,' made th' discription iv a thr-riple murder look like a Knights iv Pythias dinner. Ther-re is no doubt that Bill Bryan's long-distance boom was th' most phinominally successful wan iver attimpted. Th' only flaw in it was that he came home.

"Another wonderful ixponent iv th' goin' away fr'm here boom is Bill Taft. Wher-re is he now? Phwhat a quistion, Mar-rtin? Ther-re's not a man in th' land, includin' Bill Taft, who wudn't have to think befoor he answered that quistion. I feel sure that Bill makes turr-ble breaks in th' far-away lands which he visits, by rayson iv th' confusion that doubtless ixists in his gr-reat mind as to his whereabouts. 'Welcome to our city,' sez th' inhabitants iv Manila to Bill, meetin' him at th' whar-rf with sivin br-rass bands. 'Naughty, naughty,' sez Bill, shakin' his finger at th' Mayor iv Manila. 'How dare ye have a rivolution amongst ye. How dare ye spile th' tobacco business by unsheathin' th' disgustin' machete? Th' idea!' 'Ye'er ar-re not in Cuby,' sez th' Mayor iv Manila, tur-rnin' his back on Bill, an' motionin' th' bands to stop playin'. 'Right! I beg ye'er par-rdon,' sez Bill, 'my mistake, old sport. 'Twas a slip iv th' itinirary, that's all. Give me a sthraw hat, call out th' camera risirves an' lead me at wanst to th' canal. I want to fire all th' ingineers an'—' 'Ye'er not in Pannyma,' sez th' Mayor iv Manila, idgin' away fr'm Bill in disgust. 'Right, agin!' sez Taft, offerin' th' Mayor a cigar. 'Three cheers f'r Hawaii. How's ye'er sugar cr-rop? I do love Honoluiu. Phwat's ye'er national game? Surf-ridin, iv coorse. Well, run along an' git me a sthrong boar-rd an' a rilliable wave, an' I'll inter into th' sport with a zist that will go sthraight to th' hearts iv th' voters at home. Now, boys, all togither: three long cheers f'r th' Isle iv Pines!' At this inthristin' pint one iv th' mimbers iv Taft's suite stheps up rayspictfully to Bill. 'Tur-rn over, ye're in th' Philypines,' he whispers. An' Bill at wanst lays a risthrainin' finger on th' Mayor iv Manila, who is bitin' chunks out iv a triumphal ar-rch.

"But in spite iv th' confusion that must make his mind look like a conver-rsation with Tiddy, Bill kapes his boom movin' along at a most rispictable pace. 'Which wud plaize th' voters most,' he cables Tiddy fr'm Yokohama, 'wr-ritin' an ixhaustive rayport on th' raysoorces iv th' Philippines or thr-rowin' Nick Longworth overboord?' 'Go slowly on both,' Tiddy answers. 'How do they feel in th' votin' belt rigardin' Guam?' Bill cables fr'm Iloilo, th' town with th' name like a busy tilliphone cinthr'l. 'They don't know wher-re Guam is an' they don't care,' Tiddy answers. 'Cut out Guam,' sez Taft to Cook's riprisintative. 'I'm on me way home,' he cables th' nixt day. 'Git me overcoat away fr'm th' mothballs.' 'No need iv it,' sez Tiddy. 'Ye will have to run so fast fr'm San Francisco to catch th' nixt stheamer f'r Cuby that ye wud discar-rd ye'er overcoat in insultin' ter-rms befoor r'achin' Chicago.'

"An, sure enough, whin Bill lands on th' Pacific Coast they ar-re gettin' steam up f'r him at th' foot iv Wall Sthreet, New York. 'Cuby is pacified,' he cables th' nixt day. 'Iv coorse it is; Ohio is yures,' Tiddy answers. 'Now char-rm th' votes out iv Illinois.' 'May I rist a week in Havana?' asks Bill. 'Why, ye blamed fool, Matsachoositts will go Dimmycratic if ye do,' sez Tiddy. 'Pannyma f'r yures, me fr-rind.' Poor Bill sighs as he sthips aboord th' Pannyma boat. 'I hope,' he sez, 'they have sea level gin rickeys down ther-re,' he sez.

"Taft's success pullin' cable wires f'r a nomination makes Ilihu Root jealous. 'Phwhat shall I do to buck up the Root Boom?' he asks Tiddy. 'Give it th' gr-rand tour,' sez Tiddy. 'To make it life-size ye must take a long, arduous, an' dangerous jour-rney.' Root's face falls. 'Do ye mane Brooklyn?' he asks. 'No,' sez Tiddy. 'Only South Amirica.' Root's face clears. ''Tis well,' he sez. 'I will work my boom fr'm that favored land' coyly hidin' its golden treasures in th' hear-rt iv—iv—by the way, wher-re is South Amirica, Tiddy?' he sez.

"'Ilihu, ye sur-rprise me by ye'er phinominal bur-rst iv geographical ign'rance,' siz Tiddy. 'South Amirica, th' land that gave bir-rth to Bolivar and—and—others, is—is—somewhere near th' middle iv th' atlas,' sez Tiddy, takin' that versatile book fr'm a shilf. 'R'ally, Ilihu, ye must sind out ye'er geographical attainmints to be sponged an' prissed. South Amirica is th' nat'ral outlit f'r our gr-rowin' ixport trade, an' why th' Ger-rmans should have that trade is wan iv our gr-reatest grievances against th' man Wilhelm. F'r years Amirican ixporters have been writin' to South Amirican buyers tellin' th' latter just what they need, yit th' benighted Dagoes per-rsist in buyin' fr'm German ixporters, who give thim what they want. Did ye iver, Ilihu? Ye must change all that. Ye must work ye'er Praysidenshul boom fr'm th' dark zone iv Ger-rman influence in South Amirica. Ar-re ye on? Good. Ye'er steamer sails in twinty minutes.'

"So Root dashes off. 'How I love Chile!' he sez prisintly to th' inhabitants iv Lima. 'Why, whiniver I hear th' name iv Chile con carne I—' 'Tur-rn over, ye're in Peru!' whispers his suite. 'Three cheers f'r Peruvian bark!' sez Root, with gr-reat prisince iv mind. Thin he runs to th' cable office.

"'How are they comin'?' he asks Tiddy. 'Th' newsboys is sellin' atlases insthid iv papers,' answers Tiddy. Whin Ilihu gits this inspirin' communication he dashes ar-round th' Hor-rn at wan jump, an' lands in Buenos Aires.

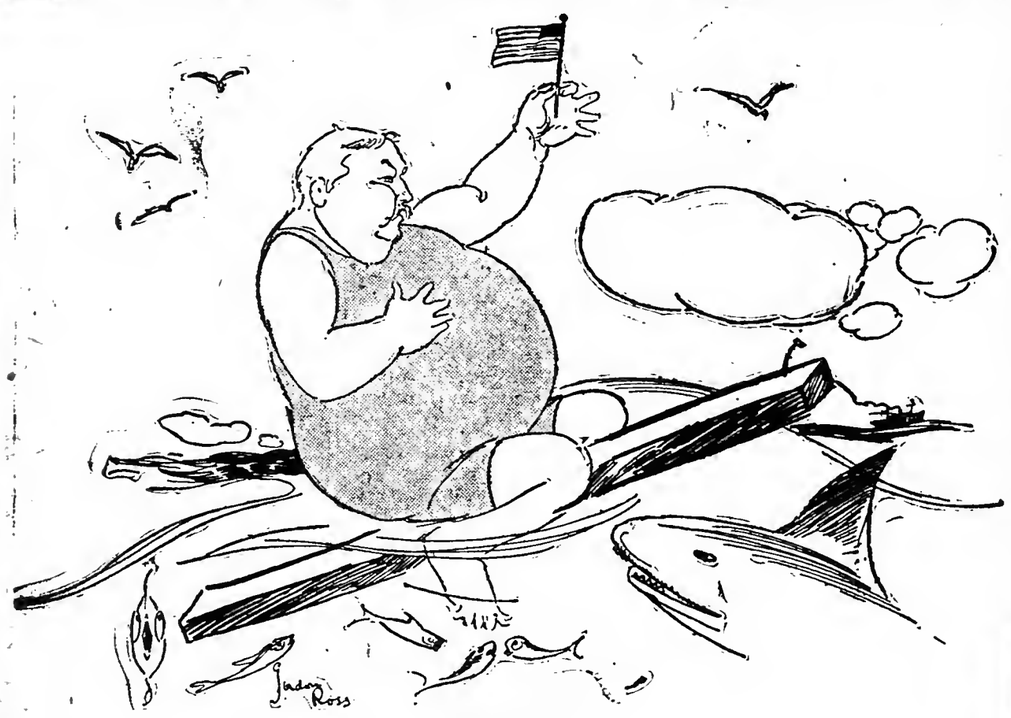
"'What a joyous occasion it is f'r me to set me foot f'r th' fir-rst time on th' soil iv—iv—' He makes a rhitorical pause. His suite begins to stheal toward him. 'Iv th' Argentine Raypublic,' continues Ilihu. 'Fooled ye that time,' he adds, grinnin' at his suite. 'Whin I think iv th' wavin' palm trees, iv th' dinse tr-ropical wilderness that is bickonin' to me cold Northern heart, iv th' gr-reat coffee plantations an' sun-dazzled ixpanses iv sugar cane—' 'Turn over, they're wearin' overcoats!' bawls his suite. 'Whin I think iv these things I'm glad I lift Peru,' sez Ilihu, thumbin' his nose at thim. Thin he butts his way through th' Wilcome to Buenos Aires Committee an' lands in th' cable office. 'How ar-re they comin'?' he cables. 'Ye'er spache is bein' committed to mim'ry in th' high schools,' answers Tiddy. 'an' Fairbanks is so jealous he's afther packin' his gr-rip.'

"Yis, Mar-rtin. Even C. W. Fairbanks—Cold-Water Fairbanks, that is—will have to thry his hand at th' Thravel Boom. 'Phwhat do ye prescribe f'r me languis'hin' Boom?' he is doubtless askin' Tiddy this minute. "Jine Peary,' sez Tiddy. 'He won't have me,' complains th' Ice Prisidint iv th' United States. 'An' why not?' inquires Tiddy. 'Because if he takes me,' sez Fairbanks, 'he sez he's sure th' North Pole will be a disapp'intment to him.' Tiddy lays his hand paternally on Fairbanks's cold shoulder. 'Cheer up, Baffin,' he sez. 'Take a shor-rt tr-rip to Spitzbergen, me boy, an' ye'll absolutely cinch th' Alaska vote.' An' Fairbanks wipes th' icicles fr'm his eyes an' goes out to look f'r Peary with ditarmination in his face.

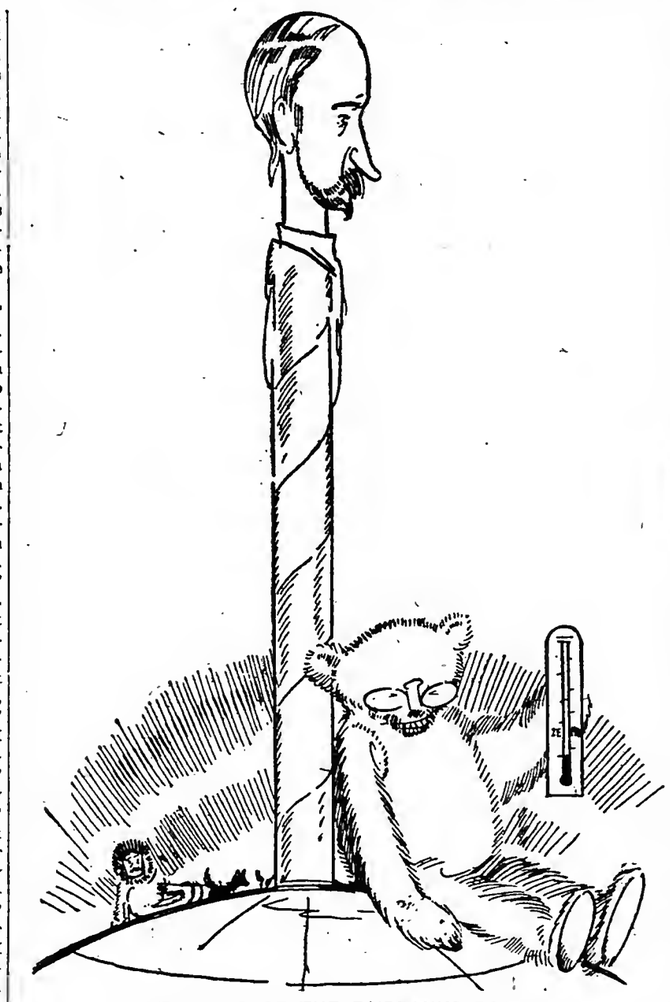
"That's th' way to git th' Prisidincy, Mar-rtin. Why, Tiddy himsilf, iv'ry time he thinks that some day he may listen to himsilf an' run a thir-rd time, yells, 'Loeb, pack me bag!' an' rushes off somewhere. Thin, ye see, if he runs he will have a thravel ricord behind him. An', by the way, Mar-rtin, I understhand that ye're goin' to Ivanston ye'ersilf to-morrow. Fine, Mar-rtin. 'Twill hilp ye'er Boom."

"Jnwn, I cudn't command more thin wan vote," declared Mr. Dooley.

"'Tis enough f'r a boom," said Mr. Hennessy.



ON HIS TRAVELS.



THE END OF THE FAIRBANKS BOOM.

How Mme. Nazimova Mastered the English Language

WHEN I began to yam, yam, yam in English," said Mme. Alla Nazimova, the Russian actress, "I was so terribly discouraged that I almost gave up in despair." By "yam, yam, yam" Mme. Nazimova gave her original conception of the simple sound of English. We have heard of the exquisite poetry and tunefulness of our language as recognized by ourselves, and again various literary and artistic visitors have rather brusquely contradicted the native good opinion, but never before has "speaking English" been so queerly expressed as by the beautiful Russian.

"Well, now, why is it that you do laugh at me?" she asked. "I said 'yam, yam, yam,' because that is exactly the way it sounded to me. When I arrived in this country I knew not one word of your language, and if I had not persevered I would be back in Russia; but when the managers tell to me that I must learn if I wish to stay then I listen well, and I say to myself, 'It is funny, but I must do it,' and pretty soon, before I really know it myself, I too am yam-yamming. And now I am glad; but, oh! such a time as I have! But now I can talk all day. Last week I went to the reception at the Players, and I was so pleased to think that I could talk as much as the rest of the ladies."

"What was the first English word you learned, Madame?"

"My first word? I know you will never believe when I tell you, but I feel pretty sure not many other people had the same for a beginning. It was on the steamer coming to your country. I had the most horrible feeling I have ever had in my whole life. 'What is it—oh, what is it that can be the matter with me?' I asked in Russian, French, and German, but no one understood me. At last the stewardess came to me, and she couldn't understand either. She was American. I say to her in all the languages I know, finally I said 'urr, urr, urr,' and she did not answer. I then say 'urr, urr, urr' once more, and point to my stomach and throat. She look at me and said, 'sea sick.'

"'Uh?' said I.

"'Sea sick,' she answered, and then she said it several times. While talking I had another spell come on, and as I leaned over the side of my bed she pointed at me and said, 'sea sick.' When I got enough breath to open my mouth again I nodded my head and said 'sea seeck.'

Merely Conversational.

"Oh, I make such awful mistakes in learning your language. I am often embarrassed, but, mon Dieu, what will you do? They tell me it is all right to say my God in French, but that it is wicked, awful wicked, to say the same thing in English. That seems so funny to me. All the Europeans say 'my God' just as you would say, 'oh, I am in despair.' In Russian we say 'O Bothe,' and it is no more than 'mon Dieu,' but here if I want to call on God I must use some other language than English. I learned this one day when a woman friend of mine told me that I eursed too much. 'I do not curse,' said I, 'you are mistaken. I am just speaking to my Creator.'

"Another thing I cannot understand is about that little word 'damn.' It seems to me for such a simple word it makes a great deal of trouble. In your plays if a man is mad he says 'damn.' If he talks about the weather he says 'damn.' If you want to make the audience laugh when the play is not funny enough to do so, just put in a few 'damns' and they will laugh until they are tired. A funny little word! I heard it so much in your plays that one day, just to make some people laugh—it was an afternoon tea and everybody was so solemn—I just said it. A man I know whispered to me that it was perfectly proper for men to say it, but ladies were not supposed to do so except in private. 'But the stage is not private,' I said.

"'Oh, that's different,' he answered. Therefore I must keep on saying things that make people laugh until I know better. I can't help it.

"One day Mr. Miller asked me about a new production we were making on the east side. During my description of it he inquired how many people were in the cast. 'Fifteen people and twenty-six suppers,' I answered. Mr. Miller laughed and laughed and said that that would be too many suppers for fifteen people. Then he told me that what I wanted to say was 'supers.' It's wonderful what a difference just one letter makes.

"Another time I heard Mr. Miller ask the press agent if he had any of Mme. Nazimova's eight sheets.

"'Now, Mr. Miller,' I said, 'what on earth would he be doing with my sheets, besides I do not take them around with me? I use those belonging to the hotel, for I left my own in Russia.'

"Then Mr. Miller explained that my eight sheets were posters of myself, which he sent out to be pasted on walls and fences.

A "Grease Painting" of Madame.

"One story Mr. Miller likes to tell on me is the ono about my portrait, which was wanted for the lobby of the Princess Theatre. I told him that I had one ready to send down. 'What kind is it?' he asked. 'It's very kind,' I told him, thinking he meant 'good,' because some one had said that 'good' meant 'kind.'

"'You don't understand,' he said. 'Is it a photograph, a pastel, a water color, or what?'

"'It's grease paint,' I answered, for I knew that word well on account of using it so much in the theatre.

"'Greaso paint,' said Mr. Miller, and then he laughed until I thought he would never stop. 'Do you mean an oil-painting?' he inquired.

"'Certainly,' I said. 'Isn't grease paint and oil paint just the same?'

"Sometimes I learn a word which New York people do not use at all. I told a young man over the telephone that I would accept an invitation which he had made me if he would come and fetch me. I don't know where I got that word 'fetch,' but my maid called me away from the 'phone to tell me that nobody except people in little towns in the South ever say that. I thought it a good word, however, and used it just the same. And," added Madame with a mischievous twinkle in her merry eyes, "he came and fetched me.

"I have so often heard American actresses say that interviewers printed things they never said. Imagine what a time I must have had when I had an interpreter to tell them what I wanted to say! On one occasion a man called to talk with me, and he asked me about the drama and Ibsen, Maeterlinck, Sudermann, and Hauptmann. I criticised them according to my ideas. He then asked what I thought of melodrama. I told him I had never seen but one in this country, and that was 'Why Girls Leave Home.' 'I thought it very amusing,' I said, or at least my interpreter said for me. She made the mistake, however, of saying that I liked 'Why Girls Leave Home' very much indeed, and the interviewer printed it that way. I was almost sick when I read that article, for I wondered what kind of a woman the public would think I am to have such terrible taste.

"One evening I made a dreadful mistake. Some one had told me that if I wanted to answer somebody who had said something to please me that I might say, 'You're a monkey,' or, 'Oh, you monkey.' Well, I said that to a person who doesn't like monkeys any more. I felt so embarrassed afterward, but he just laughed.

How One Man Got Lectured.

"I was very angry, one day, before I knew English well, and I asked the husband of a friend of mine to teach me something in his language which would express all the rage I possessed. I wanted to say everything in English. He told me lots of things, but he didn't tell me that I mustn't use them except when alone, so one day when his wife took me to her dressmaker's I found occasion to use them. My gowns did not fit at all, and I was terribly mad. I could not find enough words to say in French, besides the dressmaker did not speak French. Suddenly I said all the words the man had taught me. The dressmaker looked at me as if she were dazed with horror, and then she left the room. During her absence my friend told me I must never say such things out aloud, especially if any one were listening. 'Where on earth did you pick up such awful language?' she asked.

"'From your husband,' I told her. I know one man who got a lecture that day.

"Other words I used to mix up are 'quill' and 'point.' I always asked for a quill when I should have said a pen point. One day a friend who had been telling me something said, 'Do you see the point?' Thinking she meant a quill I said, 'No, I don't, but I'll look for one.' I never have been able to understand why I can't say a person has 'too much meat,' or has 'no meat,' instead of saying 'fat' or 'thin.' Flesh is meat, isn't it? I shall never become accustomed to those words. I don't like them. There are words, however, which I love, and I say them over and over again. One sentence in 'Hedda Gabler' is a favorite of mine, and I often say it at night just before I go to sleep. It is: 'Deeds shining with unintentional beauty.' I like long words, too. I love to say 'irresistible.'

"American slang is fascinating. I enjoy hearing people say 'skedoo' and 'twenty-three.' I learned to say 'twenty-three' by watching a big electric sign on Broadway. It is the advertisement for a cleansing house and shows a big spot which disappears while you watch it, and the figures 23 take its place. It was some time before I understood, but now I say it often. Then the 'lemons'! I've handed lots of lemons to people, and they have handed me a few.

"Oh, I'm learning new English every day."

HER REGULAR BREAKFAST FOOD.

Commuting Local Color

HAVE you ever noticed the typical or type appearance of the commuters from any given section?" asked the man who was boarding in a commuting family, and so knew all about commuters.

The other man said he hadn't, so the commuting boarder continued:

"Well, there is a typical appearance so pronounced that after a time you are able to classify a certain percentage of commuting humanity. Let us begin with what is perhaps the mildest type of commuter, the Staten Islander. In this type you have a man who has the advantage of a fairly long sea voyage with bracing sea breezes to his home. Thus he gets up an appetite. Also the breezes make necessary or desirable certain changes and differences in his attire. He has found, for instance, that a soft hat can be pulled down over his esrs without further danger that it will blow off unexpectedly as a derby would. And as the sun is more or less in his eyes, he has a wide brim on the soft hat. Then if he wears glasses, he has found by long and more or less costly experience that eyeglasses blow off in the sea breezes that awaken his appetite, so he wears spectacles.

"Now, then, we have the Staten Islander arriving at his home with a good big appetite awakened by the breezes. It is a fact that the Staten Island commuter for the most part has very little lawn to his place—it is too near Manhattan. And almost invariably he has no garden at all, so he gets very little exercise of any kind. The result is that arriving at his exercise-less home with a sea-breeze appetite he eats more than he needs to sustain a comfortable existence. The natural and inevitable result is that on the average he weighs more than the Jersey commuter."

"How about the Westchester County commuter?" asked the other man.

"They are capable of infinite subdivision. For instance, not many stations out from the Grand Central, on the main line of the New Haven, there is an exceedingly gay little community. It is also a fashionable community. You have the stuffy journey on the trains in the Summer, supplemented probably by a short drive to the home of the resident of this section, and then the sleep in the good air. Put on top of that some fashionable society life, a certain amount of choice overeating and drinking, and further the fact that property is very expensive in the little town I speak of. The net result is that you get a fashionably dressed man not quite as portly as the Staten Islander—the stuffy trains in place of the sea breezes take care of that—with the air of a certain amount of dissipation of the social and bibulous kind about him. So if you stood in the Grand Central at train time you would be able to pick him out.

"Then, on the same line, is a fairly large manufacturing community. The result of life there is a certain New York appearance minus the effect of the train ride and plus the effects of the commuter's anxiety to catch his train. Then there is another community where the literary and scholarly—the bookworms—and the book writers live in good air seclusion. You can spot them readily enough, too. And so you can go through a long list of towns on that line. If you want to switch over to the Hudson Valley commuter you have but to remember that the effect of the piercing winds of that section's Winters and the tropical heat of its Summers, coupled with the sure amount of outdoor life, are bound to produce certain appearances in the inhabitants of that valley. Of course, I do not mean to assert that one is always able to classify any given commuter, but I do state most positively that there are large numbers who can be readily placed in their habitat genus."

"Then there's the Jersey commuter?" suggested the other.

The talker smiled.

"You can spot him every time," he asserted. "To begin with, nearly everything that he has about him that his wife doesn't attend to is dilapidated. His glasses are provided with shaky frames since he, having both boats and trains to catch, has no time. His pockets are misshapen and torn at the edges, since he constantly uses them as carrying agents for his numerous purchases made while on his way to the boat. About his face is that uncertain anxiety that marks the man who, while hustling for a train in the morning, has been told by his wife to get this and to get that, and who is trying to remember at what time the 5:13 boat goes, and whether the 5:33 trains run on Saturdays or not, while at the same time he is recalling what it was that Doris told him to buy 'on the way to your boat, dear, it's so near to the ferry.'

"Also, there is a certain leanness about the Jersey commuter, for he gets plenty of exercise. He has a garden, and there are communities in Jersey where the commuter cuts his own lawn even on Sundays. If he were to grow fat from the fresh vegetables from his garden, the daily race to the train, to the boat, back to the boat and then to the train, takes it off.

"Here it is quite possible to differentiate the various types. There is the garden glow and the lawnmower stoop that mark the dweller in remote Jersey, the mosquito dodge, and the mountain-air-free-from-mosquitos-air that distinguish other sections. Then, too, there are the installment communities, where every family is buying its little home on installments, and where the sole topic of conversation among residents at a neighborhood gathering is, "When my home will be paid for.' Sameness of mental pursuit and ambitions leads to a sameness of appearance. Of course, add to the installment appearance any of the other superficial characteristics I have mentioned and you get further definite idea as to the location of the commuter in question."

By the time a fellow feels that he has money enough to get married he generally finds that he has other uses for it.

Age brings wisdom, but the trouble is it doesn't leave us much time to use it.

COMING THROUGH THE NEW YORK CUSTOM HOUSE

GOING IN AND COMING OUT!

THE fond hope of Americans that they will escape the customs ordeal on the steamship wharves when they come home from Europe must be rudely shattered. Last week the tourists of the past and future thought they saw relief in sight when they read in the newspapers that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Cortelyou, proposed to make things easier for them. The hope was ill-founded. For an indefinite time to come people must return from Europe with all their new jewelry hanging around their necks or sewn into their clothes and sit nonchalantly on the wharf while the Customs Inspectors exhibit their lingerie and hair brushes to the public view and look for stray photographs and extra bottles of perfume.

Secretary Cortelyou was wondering last week how the story of his proposed reform started. Mr. Cortelyou came to New York to talk over the general situation with the Government officials at the Sub-Treasury and Collector Stranahan, Surveyor Clarkson, and Appraiser Fowler of the Custom House. As these officials explained afterward, Mr. Cortelyou is as anxious to make reforms as any one who has gone through the form of declaring his dutiable belongings on an ocean liner and then been held a prisoner for an hour or so by official red tape on the wharf. But, they added, what can Secretary Cortelyou or any one else do? Some time ago the situation was made less harassing by a change in the customs regulations allowing Americans to bring home at least $100 worth of miscellaneous gifts. But beyond that efforts for relief are like knocking one's head against a stone wall.

The barrier is formed by the acts of Congress. Travelers must declare under oath the things they are bringing from Europe that are dutiable, and leave the rest to luck, their conscience, and the Customs Inspectors. These declarations are taken on the liners down the bay, said Collector Stranahan, to simplify the situation. The law also requires an examination of the baggage on the wharf. That is all there is about it. Secretary Cortelyou realizes the presence of the stone wall like every one else. As he talked over the general situation while in New York, he did not formulate any reforms and has no changes in prospect. In the meantime the tide of American luxury borrowed from Europe continues to rise to the flood.

If New Yorkers are as extravagant as other Americans—some say they are more so—they are spending at least 50 per cent. more for luxuries than they did four years ago. Twice as many millions go for diamonds and precious stones, wines, and table luxuries; half as much again for wearing apparel, furs, and other articles of personal adornment.

Such is the mute testimony of the figures at the Custom House showing the pleasant, useless things brought into America year by year. In one way it is the best basis for computation, for some of the luxuries, like diamonds and champagnes, come exclusively from abroad. The figures, on the other hand, do not take into account the money spent for meat, drink, and adornments of home manufacture.

The money spent for diamonds is a good index of a nation's surplus wealth, for they are adornments pure and simple. The increase in the importation of these precious stones has amazed even the customs officials. Last year cut and uncut diamonds worth $34,800,000 were brought to America. The imports in 1902 were about $19,000,000. The increase in the diamond trade in the four years was therefore over $15,900,000, or 84 per cent.

Within the last few years other precious stones have become more and more the vogue. This is said to be partially due to the growth of cosmopolitan taste. It also reflects the country's prosperity. The money spent for these adornments is even more, in proportion, than that put into diamonds. The value of the uncut stones brought into America in 1902 reached the comparatively modest total of $56,783. Two years ago came the boom. The total leaped to $278,000 in 1905. Last year it was $126,047.

France sent to America cut stones and pearls worth $2,625,000 last year. The United Kingdom was second with a store of jewels worth $1,370,000. The American jeweler has gradually supplanted the goldsmiths of Europe in setting precious stones. The value of imported manufactured gold and silver articles has gradually decreased, so that now it is about 50 per cent. of what it was four years ago.

First Evidences of Prosperity.

When a family is prospering the women usually show it first in their gowns and millinery. Here other evidences of extravagances may be found, the customs officials say. The American dealers, for instance, brought twice as many untrimmed hats into the country last year as they did four years ago. Fashion decrees that the women shall adorn their headgear with flowers, plumes, and bunches of fruits, vegetables, and grasses. Most of these trimmings come from France and Germany. They cost the importers over $3,000,000 last year, or about $1,000,000 more than they did in 1905. The figures vary from year to year, of course, as My Lady changes her mind and her Spring bonnet. A few seasons ago everything seemed to be covered with beads. The value of these little glass ornaments imported in 1902 was not far from $1,000,000. The total has dropped to about $867,000.

Fine furs are always in the fashion. The sums spent for ermine, Russian sable, mink, astrakhan, Persian lamb, sealskin, or silver fox, therefore vary from year to year only as people have or have not the money to spend. Last year $6,000,000 more went for furs than in 1902. The furs imported in 1906 were worth $21,900,000.

When it comes to the minor details of adornment it becomes evident that anywhere from 30 to 100 per cent. more is being spent for them than four years ago. The cost of the ready-made silk gowns was a million more in 1906 than in the preceding year. The silk laces and embroideries were worth $4,700,000. The imports of ready-made cotton clothing and fabrics have been nearly doubled since 1902. The imported cotton edgings, insertions, and ruffles that go into My Lady's apparel cost $34,000,000 last year, $12,000,000 more than they did four years ago. Even the imports of knit goods show an increase of $2,000,000 in the same time. Americans are spending more than $1,000,000 a year for perfumes—an increase of 48 per cent. since 1902. Their foreign soaps cost $900,000. This sum does not vary much from year to year.

Men Keep Pace.

The men are smoking better tobacco and more of it. The increase in this luxury, however, has about kept pace with the added expenses of the women, an increase of 50 per cent. being the average. Tobacco worth $22,400,000 was brought to America last year from every part of the world. Cuba, the Netherlands, Turkey in Europe, and Turkey in Asia sent most of it. The increase in the value of the imports in four years was $7,200,000. Their imported cigars cost Americans $4,031,264 last year, or 35 per cent. more than they did in 1902. They spent over $800,000 for imported pipes, the demand being nearly doubled in four years.

When it comes to table luxuries, the American knows no land or clime. He needed 960,000 more quarts of champagne last year than he did in 1902, and it cost him $6,100,000. The increase for the four years was nearly 50 per cent. Fresh vegetables came to his table from every continent. The imports from Austria-Hungary were worth $21,181; from France, $32,152; Germany, $82,671; Italy, $114,718; Spain, $54,211, and Hongkong, $66,102. Greece, Russia, Turkey, Australasia, and Egypt were among the other lands that contributed their quota. This trade has grown from $536,581 in 1902 to $815,068 last year.

Table condiments from abroad were worth $225,000, or 47 per cent. more than they were four years ago. More than twice as much foreign macaroni and vermicelli is being eaten. Americans drink $73,000,000 worth of imported coffee in a year. They spend nearly $3,000,000 more for it than they did in 1902. Raw chicory, used for making the imitation coffee, is in great demand, too. The imports leaped from $4,700 in 1902 to $58,500 last year—an increase of more than 1,000 per cent. The other table beverages keep pace with coffee, the value of imported tea increasing $3,000,000 and of cocoa $2,000,000 in the same time. Of the other luxuries of the table nearly twice as much is being spent for foreign cheese, for shrimps and shellfish, figs, and preserved fruits.

In the talk of luxury, automobiles are usually mentioned as the "horrible example" of American extravagance. Last year 1,106 motor cars were brought from Europe. They were worth $3,844,505, or $3,475 apiece, on the average. France sent 820 machines, costing $2,800,000. The parts of machines were valued at $400,000.

This was the first classification of motor cars as such, as they were formerly placed in the general manufactures list. The more recent customs figures show, however, how the trade is growing. The imports for the eight months ended February, 1906, were worth $2,430,165. For the similar period ended February, 1907, the total was $2,938,893. In other words, there was an increase of nearly 200 motor cars and of $500,000 in value.

If the fine arts and useful crafts be slighted in the rush for more material luxuries, it is not shown by the Custom House figures. The increase in these classes of imports has kept pace with the rest. American artists sent $766,000 worth of paintings to their native land last year, with about twice the value of those brought from abroad in 1902. The imports of foreign art objects increased from $3,179,913 in 1902 to $4,141,849 in 1906. The books, music, maps, etchings, and photographs were worth nearly $500,000 more than those brought to America in 1902. Americans required $11,400,000 worth of decorated porcelains from Europe to beautify their homes. Here again the average increase of 50 per cent. was repeated. The most recent customs figures—those for February last—show that there is no sign of a check to the rising tide of American luxury.

AMERICA AT ART CONGRESS.

ART work from the public schools of America will be shown at an International Art Congress to be held in London next year. The first International Congress on Art Education was organized at the Paris Exposition in 1900. Its success and the widespread interest shown by the several countries represented led to a second convocation at Berne, Switzerland, in 1903. At this meeting a permanent organization was effected, and the third International Congress on Art Education was announced to be held in London in August, 1908. European interest in the art education given in American schools is very keen, and it is most important that at this meeting in London our ideals in theory and in practice shall be adequately represented.

At the congress in Paris in 1900 American work in public art education attracted the attention of the representatives of twenty countries. At the second Congress, in Berne in 1903, the American exhibits and the American ideals commanded the respect of every delegate. In fact, many educational authorities in Europe openly expressed their belief that in the United States is to be found at the present time the most vital and promising elementary art education in the world.

Another indication of the attitude of European countries toward American education is to be seen in the ever increasing number of distinguished educators from Germany, France, and England who come to inspect our schools.

The American section of the London Congress has been placed in charge of an Advisory Committee of twelve of the leading art teachers in this country, aided by an Associate Committee of 100, representing the larger cities and towns of the United States. This Advisory Committee, of which James Hall, Director of the Art Department of the Ethical Culture School, is chairman, has determined to exhibit at London a typical collection of art work from schools all over the country. This exhibit will be made up from selected work and arranged so as to present in regular order the successive grades of work from the first year in the kindergarten to the last year in the university courses in technology. No school, town, or city will appear as such, but only as a part of the whole. It will be in no sense a local exhibition, or one showing the work of a few teachers, but will be so organized that more than 100 cities will be represented. An exhibit so arranged will be an impressive object lesson.

The American Committee has also determined to publish a book giving a survey of the whole subject and showing the ideas and ideals of the foremost teachers of art in this country. As editor of this volume, the committee has chosen Dr. James P. Haney of New York.

To carry forward the plans of the American division of this Congress it is necessary that a substantial working fund be raised. Steps have been taken to collect a fund sufficient to gather and install the exhibition and to publish the book referred to. Cheshire L. Boone, Director of Art in the schools of Montclair, N. J., is Treasurer of the organization, and is taking active measures to raise the necessary fund and to advance the interests of the congress throughout the country at large.

It is the intention of the committee to show the exhibit in this country before sending it to London, and to give the book a wide publicity here.

High Rentals Paid in New York

Private Residences in Manhattan Rapidly Giving Way to Hotels and Hotel Apartment Houses.

PRIVATE residences will disappear from Manhattan Island before long. New York City is destined to become a city of hotels and apartment houses."

Any one who is at all an observer could make such a prophecy in a more or less vague and general way. But the statement quoted above comes from a prominent hotel man, who bases his assertion on concrete instances which go to show in a startling way that the era of the home is drawing to a close in New York City.

His remarks about the kind of place that the New York of the future is going to be were called forth by the fact that John W. Gates, who has been living in the so-called "royal suite" at the Waldorf-Astoria, has reserved for himself a suite of rooms in the New Plaza Hotel, at Fifth Avenue and Fifty-ninth Street, which will cost him $42,000 a year. The price of the suite in question is not so hair-raising, however, when one takes into consideration that, when the new hotel goes into commission next Fall, Mr. Gates will have an entire floor, with the exception of six rooms. This gigantic suite will give him the privilege of having a hallway all to himself as well as several parlors, reception rooms, and the like.

The hiring of what is practically an entire hotel floor by Mr. Gates certainly gives to the statements of hotel men as to the future of New York as a residential city the appearance of truth. And Mr. Gates is not the only man who looks with disfavor on the private residences. Mr. and Mrs. E. R. Thomas, who only last year bought a large house in this city and prepared to make it their home for a long time, have expressed their dissatisfaction at home life by reserving for themselves one of the other suites at the New Plaza. Still another suite will be occupied by the George J. Goulds; still another by John A. Drake. In fact, the large number of suites to be occupied by people who have hitherto had their own private residences in this one new hotel alone serves to foreshadow what a tremendous secession of families there will be in the near future to hotels and apartment houses.

People Who Like Hotels.

"More and more people every year," said a hotel man, "who have homes in New York make a practice of spending seven or eight months of the year in Florida, or Hot Springs, or in tours through Europe. For the few remaining months of each year when they are in New York they do not want the troubles of housekeeping. So they take suites at large hotels.

"Besides, the advantages entailed by this in the way of saving the cares and discomforts of running one's own house, guests at hotels have a great freedom as regards the entertaining of friends. 'Come to visit us in New York' is an easy thing to say when one lives at a New York hotel. By far the greater part of the trouble of entertaining guests is shouldered in such cases by the personnel of the hotel. The guests, while ostensibly staying with their hosts, have their own suites of rooms, and get all they want without troubling those with whom they are staying in any way.

"Another class of families who are getting more and more accustomed to hotel life are couples whose sons and daughters have married and gone away to live in their own homes, sometimes far away from their parents in New York. These people, missing the gayeties which the presence of the young people at home entailed, begin to find their houses gloomy and deserted, and the work of housekeeping more and more irksome as the years go by. Hence every year great numbers of such couples sell or rent their homes and move to large hotels. There they live a life which has the semblance at least of gayety and of animation, although the people causing it may be total strangers. At meals the transient restaurant clientele provides a hum of liveliness which such people find much more to their taste than the loneliness of their homes. Look through the quieter residential family hotels of New York and you will find a host of such married couples, reinforced year by year by new renegades from New York 'home life.'"

Is the Apartment Doomed?

In fact, so general is the rush to the great human beehives that are springing up all over Manhattan Island, and so widespread the desire to press a button and have somebody else do the rest, that it looks as if even the housekeeping apartment is doomed. The future belongs to the hotel and to the apartment hotel, which has a restaurant attached, and emulates in other ways the regular hotel for transients and permanent guests. One glance at the buildings going up in residential New York will show the truth of this statement. People who leave the city for a few months are astonished at the changes wrought. Where there was a scaffolding and a "no passing—danger" sign before, they see a towering skyscraper hotel "ready for occupancy next week." Where they remember a vacant lot or a row of modest brownstone fronts, they see a swarm of workmen and the announcement that "a modern fireproof twenty-story hotel" will occupy the lot, and that one may hire suites through So-and-So & Co.

Even as matters stand now in the hotel and apartment world, no city here or abroad can vie with New York in the matter of hotel suites and apartments. Nowhere else are they so in demand. Nowhere else do they command such extravagant prices. Hotel after hotel arises, each one more luxurious than its predecessor, and its princely suites are at once snapped up, regardless of expense, by transients, and, quite frequently, by persons who stay for months or even permanently. In fact, there are so many people who are eager to live at the best New York hotels, regardless of what their charges may be, that some of the great metropolitan hostelries make a point of not letting their best suites for long terms, owing to the fact that other people desiring them for short periods will eventually become discouraged and go elsewhere in search of the "show" suites that alone satisfy them during their stays in New York.

Rents Are Staggering.

The prices paid by such people and by New Yorkers who live permanently in the great apartment houses of the city are positively staggering. Fifth Avenue, of course, is the street on which the highest rentals are charged. At the Holland House, for instance, there are suites consisting of nothing more than two rooms—a parlor and a bath—costing $15,000 a year. These, of course, are corner suites, with a frontage on Fifth Avenue. Fully thirty-five suites in this hotel are leased by persons who are practically permanent guests.

No other city can show anything like such prices for hotel accommodation, even London during the season, when all hotel rates are raised from 30 to 50 per cent.

At the Waldorf-Astoria there are a number of permanent guests paying in the vicinity of $20,000 a year for small suites.

At the St. Regis the management makes a point of not leasing rooms or suites of rooms for long terms. Guests may take a room or several by the day and pay on that basis for months, extending or curtailing the size of their suites at their pleasure.

"Under any other system guests might take a long lease of a room or rooms and then be called away on business or by some change of plans," said the manager of the St. Regis. "In such a case they would find themselves with the lease on their hands. We aim to allow them full freedom. If they like the hotel they may stay indefinitely; if they do not, they may go. If we had guests sign long leases they might become discontented and find themselves, nevertheless, bound to stay."

Prices at the St. Regis range from $5 a room per day upward. Small suites of parlor, bedroom, and bath come as high as $25 a day.

Prices of an impressive nature are likewise the rule among the apartment hotels in the Fifth Avenue district. At the Renaissance, on the corner of Forty-third Street and Fifth Avenue, suites may be made up according to the pleasure of the persons leasing them at the rate of $600 to $800 for each room per month. In the apartments above the Van Norden Trust Company, on the corner of Fifth Avenue and Sixtieth Street, ten-room suites cost as much as $12,000 a year, unfurnished. At the Bolkenhayn, on the corner of Fifty-ninth Street, $9,000 a year for a furnished apartment, and $7,500 for one unfurnished are by no means unusual figures. But when it is considered that James J. Hill and other magnates frequent this region when in town, such prices begin to appear less astonishing. At 615 Fifth Avenue, near St. Patrick's Cathedral, housekeeping apartments, consisting of ten or twelve rooms, may be obtained for $12,000 a year.

Apartments at Sherry's are leased at the rate of $1,000 per room a year. The average cost of small suites in the Sherry Building is $5,000 per year.

Another part of town where apartments command fine prices is on West Fifty-ninth Street, between Fifth Avenue and Columbus Circle, and the long stretch of upper Eighth Avenue known as Central Park West, both of which have frontage on Central Park. Apartments in the great apartment hotels along these two thoroughfares cost anywhere from $2,500 to $6,500 a year, and even more, when their location is particularly inviting. These prices are for unfurnished apartments.

Home Love at Vanishing Point.

And when it is considered that scores of these great caravansaries are going up each year, and that those which already exist are continually adding extensions which are often larger than the original buildings, it will easily be seen that the maintenance of private residences on Manhattan Island will soon become too expensive a pastime even for multi-millionaires. In addition to the question of financial expediency, when home lovers see their friends in the great apartment hotels of to-morrow, surrounded by every conceivable comfort—enabled to set the whole staff of a great hotel busy by reaching over and pressing a button—then their love for home is bound to decrease until finally it will succumb to the combined assaults of expediency and inclination. Their homes will be placed on the market. At once hungry real estate manipulators, who have had their eyes on them for years past, perhaps, will snap them up. And a few months later the former owners, if they chance to pass by, will see towering hotels on the sites of their former homes.

In short, it is quite probable that many now living will see uptown New York completely covered by colossal residential structures corresponding, in size to the vast office buildings which for years past have been slowly driving all other buildings from the business section of Manhattan Island.

Reason for Doubt.

A COMMUTER on the D., L. & W. remarked to a friend the other morning as they came into the city:

"Hawkins of Stamford is going to move into that new house next door to me. I know him very slightly, and I understand that you know him pretty well."

"Yes, I have known him for upward of twenty years."

"Well, what kind of a fellow is he, anyhow?" asked the commuter.

"A first rate fellow, and in every way desirable. Why?"

"I just wanted to know, because I could never quite make up my mind about him, he wears such a small hat."

RIVAL SUBMARINES TO RACE FOR HIGH STAKES

The Peace of the World an Issue in Test to Take Place at Newport This Week---Conditions Arranged by Navy Department Under Authority of Act of Congress.

NO sort of contest known to the civilized world, whether of yachts, horses, balloons, athletes, or even Presidential candidates, can equal the test that will be made this week at Newport of the two types of submarines for which Congress has hung up a prize of $3,000,000.

The result of the test will make for the peace of the whole world, and if what is expected by the foremost naval engineers shall result will save many millions which may otherwise be expended in the various naval programmes of the leading powers during the next decade. It is hardly necessary to say that the contest, which has been twice made the subject of legislation by Congress and which has been under consideration for two years past, will be watched by the most expert military scientists of Europe and this continent, and the victor will be the hero of secret discussions in all the Chancelleries of Europe and the Orient.

The match is laid between the Holland and the Lake submarines, the most successful boats of their types yet constructed, and each representing distinct principles in type. The Holland is a diver and goes down on the porpoise plan. The Lake keeps an even keel and sinks or rises as an elevator goes up or down. The Holland is built wholly for war purposes; the Lake is designed to meet the needs of naval warfare and also for those of the marine engineer in times of peace. The Holland has the prestige of acceptability to the naval experts of the Government, there being now in commission or under construction twelve Hollands.

Authorization to Buy Boats.

The coming test was authorized in the Naval Appropriation act of June 29, 1906, which was amended in the last Naval act extending the time for the tests to May 29 of this year, and increasing the limit of cost for the boats to be bought to $3,000,000, with an appropriation of $1,000,000 for immediate use in purchasing submarines of the successful type. This appropriation is available until expended, and the only limitation placed on the use of it by Congress is that no part of it may be spent for any boat which does not in the judgment of the Secretary of the Navy prove equal to the best boat of the kind now owned by the Government or under contract for the Government.

The interest in submarines, notwithstanding recent accidents and the repeated loss of life in experiments with them, was never more decided than now. Admiral Dewey has said that if the Spanish had been provided with one or two at Manila he could never have won his victory there, and expert naval strategists affirm that one such boat at Santiago would have broken the blockade. In fact, nothing but flight is left the fleet commander who finds himself, even with the strongest Dreadnoughts or the swiftest cruisers, beset by the dangers that can be dealt out by a single plunger. Napoleon saw the advantage of the submarine, and Robert Fulton, before he took up the application of steam to the propulsion of boats, built a submarine model for the Emperor. Numerous other experiments have been made, and it will be remembered that at Charleston during the civil war the Confederate David, manned by nine men working a propeller by a continuous crank shaft, blew up the fine new ship Housatonic, whose officers had but a minute's warning of the approach of the submarine, and had hardly given the order for full headway before the torpedo exploded that sent the big ship to the bottom.

The test at Newport is to be made under the charge of a board consisting of Capt. Adolph Marix, Naval Constructor D. W. Taylor, Commander Burns T. Walling, Lieut. Commander William S. Smith, Lieut. John W. Timmons, and Ensign F. H. Sadler, the latter being Recorder of the board. The scene of the test will be Narragansett Bay, in water where a depth of fourteen fathoms may be had. The boats to contest will be the Lake, named after Simon Lake, the inventor of the even-keel type of submarines, and the Octopus, the largest submarine ever constructed, and one of the four now under contract for the Government. The Lake was launched at Newport News in February last year, and belongs to the Lake Torpedo Company. She is 85 feet long, has a submerged displacement of 220 tons, and is propelled by twin screws driven by both gasoline engines and electric motors. The Octopus is slightly more than 100 feet long, is 12 feet abeam, has a displacement of 255 tons, and uses twin screws moved by gasoline and electricity. Both boats carry two torpedo tubes forward and aft. The Octopus in tests has fired and reloaded and fired again within six minutes. The Whitehead torpedo furnished by the Ordnance Bureau of the Navy Department is used in the tests, and they have a force that would under fair conditions of fire sink any ship afloat in the world. No armor has been made or could be carried in position to protect a hull from a torpedo shot as delivered by a submarine.

The conditions of the test at Newport were arranged by the board last Fall, and have been in the hands of the competing companies for six months past. Both have been grooming their crews and their machinery to the highest notch of efficiency. The tests are to be comparative, one boat at a time. The board will detail one naval officer to go aboard the contesting boat during the trial. Others will be stationed on shore to keep tally on progress over the measured course for speed trials, and others will accompany the submarine in a torpedo boat to note details of handling and performance. It has been intended to have the Porpoise, under Lieut. Charles P. Nelson; the Shark, under Lieut. Lloyd S. Shapley, and the Plunger, under Lieut. Guy W. Castle, present as police boats, but these three submarines, now stationed at Annapolis for the instruction of the naval cadets there, will be sent to take part in the naval review at the Jamestown Exposition, which may delay if not interfere with their use at Newport.

There are to be three tests of speed over a mile course in cruising condition with all ballast tanks empty, in the awash condition, showing not over half the conning tower and ready for quick diving, and submerged, with the conning tower ten feet under water and the observation mast three feet above. Each boat will be required to make three runs over the course for each condition of the test. Manipulation and manoeuvring tests in the three conditions named will also be required. The ability of submerging will be severely tested. It takes about fifteen minutes to pass from the cruising condition to the submerged, and from the awash state to submerged perhaps a minute. It will take fine work to distinguish differences between the two boats in this respect. The test will include a trial of the ability to change from one depth to another, the time to come to the surface from a depth of thirty feet, and the trim of the boat will be noted in all stages of submersion and return to the surface. Both speed and manipulation tests will be made under gasoline and electric power.

Heavy weather will be used to determine the sea-going qualities of the boats. The Lake went to Newport under her own power, taking her two tenders, the Vesta and the Contest, in tow, one alongside and the other astern.

The Octopus has proved her seaworthiness several times. She has a radius of action of 1,000 miles, and has made 11 knots on the surface and 9 knots submerged. Her owners confidently expect to show 3 knots better speed than the Lake on the surface and one to two submerged. The Lake people have claimed 10 knots in light condition and 6 to 7 knots submerged. Tests will be made under both powers together and with each separate.

Speed endurance will be well tested. The gasoline engines of each boat are expected to maintain the usual standard of one horse power per hour per pint of gasoline. The Lake's tank capacity would enable her to make 350 knots in light condition, and if her ballast tanks were utilized for gasoline she could no doubt make 1,200 knots. The submerged cruising radius of the Lake is believed to be 20 knots at full speed and 30 knots at economical speed. The Lake last Summer sailed from Norfolk to New York, 325 miles, alone under her own power, stopping but once on the way, when her crew wanted to watch some whales at play.

Each boat will have to fire four loaded Whitehead torpedoes, first using dummies to test the tubes. Torpedoes will be loaded both by being floated into the tubes from without when the boat is in light condition and by removing the tails and striking them down the engine room hatch. In previous tests the Navy Department has furnished a gunner to take charge of the firing of torpedoes, but in the Newport tests the competitors will be expected to perform every part of the test for themselves, and the department will not furnish gunners for either boat. The Octopus has a crew of fifteen men. The Lake carries a smaller number. All are experts and are well used to life beneath the waves. They cook their meals on an electric stove, and but for the want of deck comforts and plenty of room say they are quite as comfortable on a submarine as on any other boat.

Perhaps the severest part of the tests will be the twenty-four-hour submergence. This will be made to determine the habitability of each boat. The amount of fresh air carried, the amount used, its character during submergence and the manipulation of the boat, and the convenience and wholesomeness of the means of ventilation will all be marked.

The electrical features of each boat will be keenly judged. They present the most important field of improvement in the type. The aim is to eliminate the need of electricity as much as possible consistent with efficiency. The storage batteries and motors on a boat of the Lake pattern weigh 45 tons and give a maximum of 340 horse power hours, while the gasoline engines, tanks, and contents weigh but 14 tons and yield 8,400 horse power hours, or 3½ pounds weight in gasoline power yields a horse power, while 250 pounds are required with electricity for the same result. The board will inspect the boats after a thirty-mile run under gasoline to determine their merits as to ventilation, ten miles while the boat is ready for submergence, and five miles trimmed for immediate submergence. In the twenty-four hour test the boats will be run for four hours under normal speed and conditions.

Every Point to be Tested.

There is no feature of either boat that will not enter into the test. The periscope of the Octopus and the omniscope of the Lake will be tested, their steering apparatus, lighting system, air compressors, facilities for taking and discharging water ballast, recording instruments, means of escape in case of emergency, facilities for sealing the boat, and many other matters will all be taken into account. The Lake has a number of devices that tend to make her safe, in the meaning of being as safe as human ingenuity can go. She carries a five-ton drop keel that can be detached and cause the boat to float to the surface. It is claimed that the diving under headway porpoiselike is in itself dangerous, as the accident to the English submarine A8, that stuck its nose in the mud and could not get out, would go to show. But the Lake has a diving compartment forward that is a unique achievement in submarine construction. An airtight bulkhead, with an air lock fitted with air and water tight doors, is provided, where one after another the crew can pass out of the boat, no matter how deep down she may be, and make a swim for the surface.

With a diver's suit, with air and telephone connection, it is possible from this diving compartment to carry on mining and various operations in wrecking and marine engineering. The Lake also has a cushioning device by means of hydraulic cylinders connected with a set of four wheels, that will enable her to rest on the bottom in case of storm or other need. The swell in such cases often pounds the boat with a rise of ten to fifteen inches, a condition that is dangerous to the hull and machinery and destructive of efficiency in action.

After the tests all machinery of both boats will be dismantled for the inspection of the board. Each competitor has the right to propose tests other than those arranged by the board and put his boat through them for the consideration of the board. The board will compare the power and accuracy of the observation facilities of each boat. The Octopus has a very fine periscope, which enables the commander to sit ten feet under the surface of the water and range the horizon in every direction as perfectly as if the eye were at the surface. The omniscope on the Lake is very much the same, except possibly that it is much larger, being 10 inches in diameter instead of 3, and also being provided with numerous automatic devices to give ease in sighting a target. The target to be used in the Newport tests will be 300 feet long, which would be all very well to the gunner who is up out of the water, but to a man down twenty or thirty feet below the surface is none too big.

The President Interested.

President Roosevelt is deeply interested in the tests. His trip on the Plunger with Lieut. Nelson last Summer showed him how vitally important the submarine has become in naval warfare. To be without them when other possible foes are well provided with them would be the wost kind of folly, and made all the more inexcusable when we are continually being urged to build more and bigger big ships, each one of which would got us a fleet of submarines. The Octopus cost $250,000, but in these times would cost somewhat more, owing to higher prices of materials and labor. A battleship of the Dreadnought type would cost more than all the submarines we have in our navy.

The protection there is in these little nimble, complicated, but terribly effective boats loaded with half a dozen torpedoes charged with guncotton or picric acid, the latter nearly twice as powerful as the former and now beginning to be used in stable forms, should appeal to the cities of the coast. A dozen such boats would make it impossible for the strongest fleet in Europe to threaten New York or Boston. Two or three would render San Francisco and Puget Sound safe. There is but one navy in Europe at this time whose hulls are constructed so as to afford any hope of withstanding torpedo attack from submarines. This power may be said to be the only one that would dare to give us attack on the Atlantic Coast.

Training a Starfish to Think For Itself

THE remarkable work of Dr. Herbert S. Jennings, Associate Professor of Physiological Zoology at the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, in training or developing the formation of habits of the starfish is attracting widespread attention. Dr. Jennings has for seven years been making a close scientific study of the lowest forms of animal life. During the Winter he works in his laboratory in the university, where he always has some interesting experiment under way, and in Summer he conducts his investigations at marine biological stations.

Dr. Jennings is averse to talking of his work for publication. The complete story of the interesting experiments with the starfish is best told in his report recently submitted for the biological department of the university as follows:

"Whether the power of modifying behavior, as the result of experience, in an adaptive way, so as to form useful habits, is generally distributed among animals, including even the lowest ones, is an unsettled question of great interest. In an extended study of the behavior of the starfish, undertaken at the marine biological station of the San Diego Marien Biological Association in Southern California, the matter of habit formation in this animal was investigated.

"The formation of lasting habits has recently been demonstrated among lower animals in the crustacea and flatworms. All these animals have the nervous system so centralized that one or more ganglia can be distinguished, the largest of which is commonly called a brain. In the starfish there is no such centralization of the nervous system. There is a nerve cord, which forms a ring about the mouth, and from the five angles of this ring nerve cords run out into each ray. It has never been shown that animals with so simple a type of nervous system can form habits.

"The behavior of the starfish is in general characterized by what might be called versatility; the animal can do in many different ways anything that it can do at all. Its locomotion is in this respect a type of its entire behavior. The starfish is not hindered by any considerations of anterior or posterior, right and left, but from a given position it may walk in the direction of any of the indefinite number of radii that lead from its centre. Its behavior is not stereotyped; on the contrary, it is extremely variable, even under uniform external conditions. It may indeed be said never to do the same thing twice in the same way.

"The versatility presents an opportunity for the formation of habits, while at the same time it tends to make this unnecessary. Since the animal tries successively many different ways of doing things, it might eventually fix upon and retain one way as a habit. On the other hand, since it may succeed in almost any way tried, there is little ground for fixing upon one method as a permanent one, in preference to others.

"To test the power of roaming habits the starfish was repeatedly given a number of problems, such as to escape from confinement due to broadheaded tacks driven into the board on which the animal lies, in the angles between its rays; to remove a tight rubber tube slipped on one of its rays; to right itself when placed on its back. It solved these problems in many different ways. But it was found, in conformity with the results of other investigators, that when left to itself the starfish did not improve in the successive solutions. It showed no tendency to demonstrate the most effective method when confronted anew with the problem.

"Then attempts were made to train the starfish. In righting itself when turned on its back the starfish may use any pair from the five rays to attach itself; then by pulling with this pair it turns a somersault, thus returning to its natural position. In successive trials different pairs of rays may be used. The training was directed toward getting the animal to employ regularly a certain pair of rays for this purpose, the experimenter at first not permitting it to use other rays.

"By this method it was found that the starfish very readily acquires what may be called temporary habits. Thus, in one typical case, in which the starfish was trained to employ a certain pair of rays that were never used naturally after twelve lessons, one following another immediately, the animal was found to have adopted the habit. It was allowed to right itself eight times in succession without interference from the experimenter, and in every case it used the pair of rays that it had been trained to use. The result of experiments with many other individuals was similar.

"But results reached in the way described above do not last. After twenty-four hours the starfish shows no effects of its training. Therefore an extended series of lessons was taken with a number of individuals—ten lessons per day for eighteen days. The training was directed toward inducing the animals to employ in righting themselves a certain pair of rays that they never used naturally. At first many of them resisted obstinately. But by the training process this resistance was gradually overcome, and at the end of the period of training the animal employed this pair of rays more frequently than any other. In several specimens thus trained it was found that the effect of the training lasted for at least a week after the training ceased.

"It is clear, therefore, that habits may be formed in the starfish after a comparatively brief period of training. There is no doubt that by beginning with young specimens and continuing well-planned training for a long time very marked results could be reached. The starfish is the lowest animal in which habit formation has been demonstrated.

"We have so little in common with the lower organisms that it is difficult to devise experiments that shall really test their capacity for forming habits. It appears probable that this difficulty is responsible for the fact that the power to form habits is commonly supposed to be lacking in the lower animals. When we become acquainted with them sufficiently to devise proper methods of training it appears probable that the capacity to form habits will be found a general property of living things."

Dr. Jennings has studied the paramecium, one of the lowest forms of life, carefully, and is convinced that it acts just like a higher organism with a mind developed to some extent. It used to be stated and thought that these low organisms acted like a drop of chemicals, reacting to some stimuli under the proper conditions, with no choice whatever. The study of the paramecium disproved entirely that their mode of live is mechanical, as formerly said, for the way of behavior is by no means set, but is adapted to circumstances to a greater or less extent. The careful study of the amoeba, too, one of the extremely low forms, if not the lowest of all, had shown that they had some choice in their life, and act as if they were possessed of the germs at least of intelligence.

It was also said by the zoologists that these lowsr organisms acted always in exactly the same way—that the stimulus brought about the very same results, no matter what the conditions were. This stronghold of the zoologists Dr. Jennings asserts that he has disproved. In the case of the stentor, he has shown that it acts by method of "trial and error." This method is merely the repeated attempt to do something, each time trying a new way, until the best is found. In the example of the stentor, Dr. Jennings gave it food that it disliked, and watched it try to avoid the disagreeable food in all the possible ways until at last, unable to do so, it broke away, and sought a new place to attach itself. The stentor also gives a display of instinct in the building of its new nest after it leaves the old abiding place.

The gonionemus, or jellyfish, has not been investigated very fully, but some of its habits and behavior have been learned. A specimen closely studied has been seen to take its food to its mouth from one of its many rays. Again, if it strikes an object not to its liking it will back away and draw all of its rays together. Should it run into water where the rays of the sun have been shining it will quickly notice the change and reverse its course.

In studying the amoeba some strange things have been discovered. The specimen, although very tiny, is but a cell creature. In its travels on the bottom of the sea it has also been seen to reverse its course when it strikes an object not to its liking. There are certain kinds of food that it exists on, and the amoeba will cling to it until it finally becomes attached to it, thus getting its nourishment. Sometimes the amoeba will separate, as it is only a jelly substance, but it will soon become united again, especially after the larger portion has secured the food.

Dr. Jennings has no new theory of life, as has been stated, but has discovered things hitherto unknown to zoologists concerning the actions of the lower forms of life, especially with regard to their psychological process. Zoologists have as yet no definite knowledge of the existence of a mind in these creatures, but Dr. Jennings, from the results of his work in the last few years, has come to the conclusion that they have some sort of incipient mind, and that they act much like the higher forms of life that possess intelligence.

Interesting Experience of Trail and Camp Life in Little Known Selkirk Range, British Columbia

THE average Easterner commonly supposes that the Canadian Northwest is merely a howling and hopeless wilderness. It is, in fact, more or less howling, but far from hopeless, however, as a party of university men and college girls recently proved by three months of camp life in the heart of the Selkirks.

We traveled through the country some 600 miles, by railroad, steamer, pack train, and on foot, and we saw busy mines, prolific fruit orchards, buzzing sawmills, vast areas of valuable timber, fur-bearing animals, salmon and other piscine food; and, in the midst of it all, a small but energetic population—the hardy pioneers of the great Canadian Northwest. We discovered that life in the settlement, on the trail, or in the explorer's camp required no great amount of physical endurance, but rather a certain mental staying quality and adaptability to environment.

The "Kootenay" Region.

The Selkirk mountain range is oblong in form, and extends north and south for a distance of about 250 miles, while its width is from 50 to 100 miles. The Columbia and Kootenay Rivers completely surround the range, and although their origin is in the same region, they flow for half their course in opposite directions until the foothills of the Selkirks are reached in the north and in the south, and then the rivers retrace their course on opposite sides of the range, uniting at Robson, forty miles north of the State of Washington, through which the Columbia subsequently flows on its way to the sea.

These mountains are well fitted for exploration. There is a little of shale in their composition, nearly all of the rocks being igneous. The slaty schists provide good footing for the mountain climber. Near Roger's Pass, a few miles east of Revelstoke, is the famous Illecillewaet Glacier, a few minutes' walk from the railroad and the Glacier House station. Here even the novice has the chance to explore the glacier, for it is nearer to the railroad than any other known glacier in America. The artist finds here every variety of unity and symmetry and composition and color. Here the geologist has a marvelous field for research. The botanist delights equally in the flora of deep woodland or open Alpine meadow. And here, too, the one who does not understand the science of the artist or the art of the scientist, but who loves it all, because it is so fair a scene, finds in the deep woodland shade the song of peace and harmony; in the ascent of the mountains, the joy of activity and accomplishment; while from the spectacle presented from the towering mountain top comes the thrill of awe and the stupendous sense of the power and grandeur of Nature. Every British Columbian feels an intense pride in the beauty of his country. An old miner who came into our camp one day, and who remarked that we had traveled so far to see "his" country, said, while he pointed to Mount Begbee, looming up in the distance: "No man in this country can be bad and look at that mountain every morning."

The British Columbian is nothing if not spontaneous and genuine. Upon my arrival at Revelstoke, a day before my advent was expected, I began to look about for some one to drive me up to the camp. Finally a young Scotch lad employed at the hotel volunteered to take me out, and soon appeared with a nervous horse and a ramshackle wagon. The ride was a thrilling one, as we sped up the rough mountain roads in the twilight. On my return to the hotel where I was spending the night I offered him a decent tip for his trouble. He brushed my hand aside, sprang into the wagon, whipped up the colt, and shouted, "I couldn't be a British Columbian and take that."

Our first camp was pitched on the Great Canyon of the Columbia three and one-half miles north of Revelstoke. Revelstoke is the centre of the lumber industry, and receives the products not only of numerous sawmills in its own vicinity, but also from all the region north of Nakusp situated in the Central Arrow Lake region. On one excursion which we made on foot sixty miles into the interior we tramped for four days through the virgin forest, whose trees averaged 20 feet in circumference, and many of the largest, and by no means rare specimens, we found measured 36 feet in circumference.

Flowers are found in most wonderful abundance. One scarcely turns about without finding some new and brilliantly colored variety. A few weeks after a large tract of timber may have been destroyed by fire great masses of flaming red blossoms appear, covering up the black and desolate waste of the burned area. This is the fire weed, (Epilobium augustifolium.)

At different stages of altitude the same varieties of flower appear during various periods of the Summer. The same variety of plant which has gone to seed at 3,000 feet above sea level may frequently be found in full bloom at 5,000 feet and in bud at 7,000 feet.

The Arrow Lake and Kootenay regions are the great fruit-producing sections of British Columbia. It is only in recent years that the fruit-growing potentiality of this country has been realized; but now the many orchards to be seen on the sunny slopes and shores of these lakes bear evidence that this industry, though yet in its infancy, bids fair to become a substantial one. Apples, pears, cherries, plums, grapes, peaches, and all kinds of small fruit, in size and appearance, are equal to the California varieties, and in flavor rival those of Oregon and the Eastern States.

This remarkable quality of productiveness is evidenced even in the wild fruit. Raspberries, blueberries, bearberries, so called because they are bruin's favorite delicacy, and huckleberries are to be found in profusion, enormous quantities that one can scarcely see the leaves for the berries. While they are in full bearing at 4,000 feet they are quite green at 6,000 and only in blossom at 6,500 feet. Many Chinese pitch their solitary tents in a timber clearing and eke out a decent existence by picking the wild berries and selling them in the market.

The garden flowers also rival those of California. Sweet peas grow to a wonderful height and size, and are in full bloom from June to September. The same is true of the nasturtiums and roses.

British Columbia, as yet, does not possess its "Bard of the Columbia," but "Hathaway's Cottage" is famous all over the Big Bend region. One of the most interesting characters we met was Jim Hathaway, and one of the most picturesque sights we saw was Jim Hathaway's cabin. Born an Englishman, he had carried with him to his wilderness home, thirty miles from civilization, that desire so regnant in every Briton's soul to make beautiful the spot in which he dwells, and had transformed that tiny cabin in the little clearing on the banks of the Columbia into a fairy bower of morning glories, pansies, nasturtiums, and sweet williams. Strawberries grew in his garden, close to the banks of a mountain stream, which served not only as a supply for drinking water and all household purposes, but also as a sort of kitchen sink, for here we found him paring potatoes and rinsing them in the clear, cold water. This cottage was a "half-way house" on the Long Trail—a little mountain inn, where the miners, in going back and forth to the city, got their dinner or spent the night. The proprietor did all his own housekeeping, marketing, cooking, gardening, and hunting.

The forest and mountain fastnesses of the Selkirks abound with various kinds of animals, and the patient scientist, the photographer, or the enthusiastic hunter will find that big game in abundance will reward his efforts, if he only understands their ways of life; and though hunting or the study of their habitat is not the specific object of even the temporary mountaineer, who penetrates the wildest haunts, many animals will cross his path. Bears in great numbers inhabit the woods. They are of many varieties—the silver tip grizzly, the black bear, brown bear, and cinnamon bear. Mountain goats are not uncommon. In the mountains above Ground Hog Basin we saw flocks of from six to twenty skirting a snowfield or mountain ridge in the last rays of a dying sunset. They are great shaggy, white fellows, and weigh about 250 pounds.

Herds of caribou, assuredly the most graceful and beautiful of all the mountain animals, inhabit these same higher altitudes, and although we followed them for hours without getting within gunshot or camera shot, yet they are by no means an extinct species, as many would have us believe. They appeared again and again near camp in herds of eight or twelve.

The cougar is one of the most dreaded specimens of wild life. He is considered such a menace to other animal life that the Canadian Government has offered a royalty of £5 to any hunter taking a cougar, dead or alive. The lynx, coyote, wolverine, gray wolf, timber wolf, fox, porcupine, marmot, and marten are the most common of the smaller game. One particular region of the Selkirks, a great tract of Alpine meadows near the watershed in the Big Bend country, where our second camp was made, is so overrun with marmots, commonly called "groundhogs" or "whistlers," that it has been named by the miners of that country "Ground Hog Basin." The porcupine is frequently met with. As soon as he catches sight of a human being he makes a dash for cover as rapidly as his fat body can be propelled. He is a great nuisance about camp. One invader of our camp consumed, according to the most conservative estimate, $25 worth of food, clothing, and cameras.

Grouse (nicknamed "fool-hens") are abundant, especially in the young growth which supplants the burned timber. They have absolutely no idea of self-preservation, but will flutter about in the brush, a splendid target for the most indifferent marksman. I once saw a "fool-hen" perched on the top of a dead pine, probably 100 feet from the ground, calmly sit and gaze into the muzzle of a 30-30 Winchester while six cartridges were emptied at her.

At the snow line one may find an occasional flock of ptarmigan, but they are well endowed with protective coloring, and so closely resemble the snow fields that they are not easily discernible. Teal, all kinds of duck, geese, bittern, white swans, fish eagles, hawks, and golden eagles are sights of frequent occurrence.

Fish for Man and Beast.

Fish are found in abundance in the glacial streams and lakes. These are not only attractive to the sportsman, but to bruin, the coon, the mink, the otter, and the seal. The humpback salmon go up the small streams at certain seasons of the year in great schools, while on the Frazer the colachan, or candlefish, are found in most prodigious quantities. It is here that the black bears make the most of their opportunities, and frequently they may be seen leaning out over the stream and scooping the fish in with their big paws. He is much fonder of the candlefish than of any other variety, and will even put aside temporarily his antipathy for human companionship in his endeavor to catch this highly prized delicacy. The fish productive of food supply are the salmon, the whitefish, (often improperly called the grayling,) and several species of trout.

British Columbia is essentially the country of experience. Every man, hunter, miner, pack train driver, or what not, has his tale to tell, embellished doubtless to excite and satisfy the interest of his hearers, yet it never fails to impress the stranger, that in this country, probably oftener than in a more highly developed one, man comes into very intimate relation with life and all its fundamentals. The man who has starved at Dawson City, or who has driven his sledge hundreds of miles in from Skaguay; the man who has trapped his fur, now in the Hudson Bay country, now in the Peace River region; all these, if they be temperate, find health and wealth in the mines, the lumber camps, or the settlements.

Who hath smelt wood smoke at twilight?
Who hath heard the birch log burning?
Who is quick to read the noises of the night?
Let him follow with the others,
For the young men's feet are turning
To the land of proved desire and known delight.

Little Stories of Fact and Fancy

Advertising the Advertisement.

PASSENGERS in street cars have often noticed enigmatic cards in the advertising spaces; cards bearing some nonsensical word or sentence, or sometimes merely a picture, apparently expressive of nothing in particular.

Very few laymen know that these are what are known to the advertising man as "Teasers." Series of them are known as "teasing sets," a new one appearing each week for a time, each equally inexpressive and equally as prone to arouse the curiosity of the passenger. In fact, that is just what they are for—to arouse curiosity.

These "teasers" are the very latest thing in up-to-date car advertising, according to an authority on the subject. In explaining the use of these unique advertisements, for advertisements they are, this man says he is an enthusiastic advocate of that method of arousing the public interest in the specialty which some company has to exploit. He says that by running a series of these "teasers" for several weeks the average man or woman who rides on the street cars looks at that very advertising space each time he or she gets on the car, trying to reason out what the absurd illustration or words mean, or hoping that the solution might be there. Sometimes the advertising space is blank; maybe only a few irregular lines, perhaps the outlines of a grotesque little man.

"Anything out of the ordinary," he continued, "will catch the average advertisement reader. Often after starting a series of these 'teasers' the advertising company's office will be besieged by telephone calls, inquiring what it all means. That shows the interest the 'teasers' create. When the 'teasers' have run far enough and the real advertisement appears on the space which the 'teaser' had occupied they attract more attention than any other advertisements in the car.

"A proof of the efficiency of these 'teasers' was shown in St. Louis, where a breakfast food concern, after having run a 'teaser set,' placed an explanatory advertisement in the spaces and sold 15,000 boxes of its food in sixty days."

The average advertisement reader is looking for the unusual, and certainly the "teaser sets" are in that category.

Telephone Decorations.

NEAR the open door of a telephone booth the manager of the hotel was standing in conversation with an acquaintance, when he became aware of the fact that within the booth a number of sheets of loose paper and pencil were lying. With a word of apology to the other he hastened to remove them from the shelf.

"Now, look at that, will you," he said, passing the sheets of paper to the other, who, upon examination, found them to be covered with odd drawings of an automobile, chairs, a bench, a Turkish rug, a watch, a revolver, and a curling iron. Also there were a number of names and telephone numbers.

The booth's sides were found to be covered with pretty much the same thing in pencil. The shelf also had its decorations.

"All of these things," said the manager, "were done by persons while they were waiting for the number they had called to answer. At such moments the mind seems to fly into vacancy and the hand unconsciously draws whatever may float through it at the moment. In many cases, as you may observe, people write their own names, the telephone number they are after, and also draw the article they are ordering. It is all unconscious, or a large share of it is, though some of it is due to imitation, or the hypnotic suggestion set up by the presence of the handiwork of others in the booth.

"So that is the reason that I removed the paper and pencil carelessly left in the booth, for invariably when the paper is full the work overflows to the walls. There is enough of hypnotic suggestion there already."

Gallantry Under Difficulties.

THE stabbing of two young men who told some Italians in an elevated train not to jump into seats ahead of women," said the woman who wants to vote, "is perhaps an extreme case of the caste feeling which seems to unite all men. I have noticed that in certain cars where there happens to be a number of men who are not gentlemen, there is a sort of esprit de corps that seems to prevent men from giving their seats to women. When a man in such a company does rise that one of the gentler sex may be seated, the rest of the men look at him in a scornful or would-be humorous way, as the case may be, if they do not comment aloud for the discomfiture of the polite one. And strange to say, the offending man who has for the moment braved their scorn really looks and acts shcepishly. It is a genuine caste feeling."

Devotion Personified.

THE personal devotion of pupils sometimes takes unexpected turns," said the Principal of one of the big boys' schools. "I used to teach in a boys' grammar school down on Henry Street. Several of the little fellows got into the habit of coming to my desk at the noon recess and after school, anxious to 'do something for teacher,' and the assignment of some little task meant bliss and a distinction above their fellows for the rest of the day. One day at noon I gave a little chap a letter to post which I had written to a friend who lived up in 110th Street. He departed with an expansive grin, and did not return that day. Next morning he appeared with the grin still in evidence, and triumphantly deposited on my desk a much begrimed postage stamp, with the remark: 'There! I licked it off and tuk de letter up meself. I saved yer 2 cents fer you.'"

Tid-bits from the Water.

AMONG the very latest things in seafoods offered by high-class dealers are dainty little soft-shell crabs sent here from Morehead City, N. C. These delicious morsels—for there is not more than a mouthful to each—cost from $4 to $4.50 a dozen. But, expensive as they are, they make such an irresistible appeal to the appetite of the epicure that they find a ready market. Packed so carefully and sent so quickly after being taken from their native waters, these crabs are alive and in perfect condition when sold to the consumer here.

Other luxuries in sea foods are shad caught in the Upper Bay absolutely alive on the market stalls. No more delicious fish swims than a New York Bay shad. They are selling from $1.30 to $2.

There are some fine cherry-stone clams, no larger than a twenty-five-cent piece, which are sent up from Norfolk, Va., that cost $10 a hundred.

There have been two or three catches of young bluefish and mackerel, which are so rare, that ridiculously high prices are being paid for them by persons who like the distinction of having on their tables the first of everything in the market.

From the Northern inland streams and the mouths of the rivers we are getting brook trout from Canada, which are sold for $1 a pound, and deliciously fresh and hard Kennebeck salmon, which brings $2 a pound.

Where the Nickels Go.

THE Man Who Goes About watched the collection agent take heaps of nickels of varying size from the boxes of the nickel-in-the-slot telephones.

"What do you do with them all?" he asked.

"There are various ways of disposing of them," said the agent. "To begin with, we have an arrangement with one of the banks to take a certain percentage of them. Then, too, I dispose of several dollars' worth in each of the drug and cigar stores where these telephones are situated. They are needed to give change to the customers so that they can 'telephone. Then, too, on my route I have a number of places near to the telephone stations where they are always glad to have nickels in limited quantities."

"Give me a nickel, will you? I want to telephone," he said.

The agent offered him a package.

"Here's a dollar's worth," said he. Then as the Man Who Goes About took them gladly, as nickels are convenient in going about, he added:

"And that is another way in which I dispose of them."

Practical Application.

Developing His Investment.

A FLORIST in the outskirts of the city has come across what he considers the meanest man in all New York.

"He recently bought a fine Summer home and estate about a half mile from my nursery," said the florist. "A few weeks ago he was entertaining some old friends, and showing them around the neighborhood. In the course of their peregrinations he brought them to my flower patch, on which I have a number of large glasshouses. Wishing to display his wealth by purchasing something, he stopped at a cucumber frame and asked me the price of various specimens of that vegetable. I pointed a large one out to him at 25 cents, another at 15 cents, and so on; but Mr. Suddenwealth would have none of them. His eye fell on a particularly tiny specimen. 'How much?' he asked, pointing to it. I told him 5 cents. Mr. Croesus brought out a $50 bill. I couldn't change it just then, so I told him he could pay later. That suited him fine. Just as I was about to pull the cucumber he requested me to leave it where it was, as he would send his man for it in the evening. He went away smiling, and sent his coachman to the nursery at the end of a week, by which time, of course, the tiny cucumber had lengthened into a large and brilliant vegetable! What's more he's forgotten to divvy up the nickel!"

Anxious to Accommodate.

FIVE-YEAR-OLD Marian had been having her morning frolic with the squirrels in the park, and her store of peanuts and popcorn was quite exhausted when a little gray beggar in search of breakfast thrust his small nose almost into her hand, and then ran off a little way and sat up, looking at her wistfully. The baby looked at her empty hands and then said pitifully: "Oh, mother, can't we give him 5 cents to buy himself some peanuts?"

Two Subway Yarns.

TWO interesting stories about persons who ride in the Subway came to a "Fact and Fancy" writer yesterday. Here is one:

"This is a strange town," said the man recently arrived from Chicago. "And withal it is the easiest one to beat, if a man is out to beat it intentionally. I did it unintentionally on my first day here. I entered a kiosk at one of the Subway stations. At a gate on the platform sat a man in uniform near a box. I walked past him. He looked at me but said nothing. There was a train in the station and the doors of the cars were open. I entered the car. The train started. After a while I looked into my hand and found the nickel. I had not paid my fare. Being a conscientious man I refused to ride for nothing, so I offered the nickel to the guard. 'Thanks,' he said pocketing it. 'I will give this to the Woman's Suffragists' League.' And the train sped on."

And here is the other story:

"I ride in the Subway so much that when I get into a surface car I forget to pay my fare," said a woman who uses the Subway a great deal. "On the Subway, you see, you buy a ticket and drop it into a box, and nobody in the car asks you for your fare. A few days ago I got on a Sixth Avenue car. The conductor came through, calling 'Fare, please.' He stopped in front of me and kept calling 'Fare.' I paid no attention to him. He persisted in his call and then I grew angry. 'Madame,' he said, have you paid your fare?' 'Yes—no,' I replied, taking a nickel out of my pocketbook. At the next corner I was glad to get off the car to escape the smiles of the passengers."

How He Caught the Clubs.

ONCE," remarked the Man-Who-Leans-Against-Bars, "I figured in a vaudeville act."

"Did you, indeed?" said the Collector-of-Local-Color.

"It was one of those juggling acts. When I was a youth I was pretty clever at all that sort of thing, so I told an imitation Japanese professor that I'd help him out on the stage. All I had to do was to appear, dressed like a Jap, and catch a bunch of those short clubs—you know, the shiny kind—when he threw them at me. There were six clubs in all.

"Well, I felt pretty confident, but I must have got stagestruck, because when the fake Jap started to throw the clubs I failed to catch the first one in my hand."

"Didn't matter?" shrieked the Man-Who-Leans-Against-Bars. "Didn't matter, eh? Why, you blamed fool, I caught the other five clubs in my face."

Qualities of the Oyster.

A SAN FRANCISCAN has discovered a new method of cutting short recitals that promise to become too long-winded. An acquaintance of his, who has a local reputation as a bore, was one day holding forth at some length when the Californian interrupted him with:

"By the way, did I ever tell you the story of the oyster?"

On receiving a negative reply, he continued:

"It seems that when oysters are taken from the sea they often open their shells so that the juice or liquid runs out. As this is undesirable, the experienced oyster gatherer has a tub of water close at hand into which the oyster is plunged as soon as it begins to open its shell."

"Well, and what then?" asked the other as the narrator paused.

The San Franciscan smiled.

"Oh, after a while the oyster learns to keep its mouth shut," he remarked quietly.

"THE MAN IN THE STREET" AND HIS BALANCE OF POWER

A New Character the Phrasemakers Have Invented Who Bids Fair to Take a Most Prominent Part in Our Social and Sporting Life—A Keen Critic and a Balance of Power.

WE Americans are a great people for "calling namcs." We are splendid phrasemakers. We have added immenscly to a lenguage already overburdened with topical catchwords and slang synonyms. In a descriptive way some of our efforts have not been unworthy of Yankee ingenuity. Our "Man with the Hoe," "The Man Behind the Guns," "The Man Higher Up," "The Man with the Big Stick," &c., are sufficiently neat and comprehensive to pass into current literature, and possibly into the classics. To build phrases about the glorious name of "Man" has been a practice of the ages, as witness the Men of Destiny, of Sorrow, of Letters, of the World, of Peace, and War, of Pleasure, of God, of Fashion, and a hundred other attributes with which imagination has clothed man's personality.

Yet, in spite of all these, we now have to consider a brand-new phrase, descriptive of man in an entirely new environment and under conditions which we are rather at a loss to explain. We refer, of course, to the expression "The Man in the Street." It seems that in this instance our English cousin phrasemakers have stolen a march on us, and while we were gloating over the "Higher Up" and "Big Stick" men, they boldly proceeded to produce a character that includes in its vast scope every posaible species of man, because, of course, every man in the world is or has been or will be at some time in the street, or in what passes as the street, in his place of residence. This would seem to make this phrase so general, so ambiguous, as to practically relieve it of all point and cogency. Quite the contrary. When The London Times in its daily fulminations constantly refers to "The Man in the Street"; when the pretty sixpenny pictorials pick up the expression and toss it about in airy persiflage; when this particular "man" crosses the ocean and becomes a prominent personage in our own press, so that no well-informed editor would think his leaders well done without at least one allusion a week to him; then it becomes evident that this "man" is in the street with some definite, aggressive purpose, just as the "Man Higher Up" or the "Big Stick Man" is out for business. Why else should Kings and Emperors, Presidents and Premiers, Parliaments and Congresses, Police Commissioners and Bishops, baseball magnates and theatrical managers, be warned against him and have him held over their heads?

Who is He?

Who is "The Man in the Street"? We presume that he is the same type of individual here as in England. Is he the policeman or iceman? The postman or trolleyman? The tramp or dandy, the hustler or idler? Can he be the insatiable reporter with pencil on pad or the inscrutable editor with finger on the pulse of the world? Is he a baseball fan or a first-nigbter? A politician or a Christian Scientist, a financier or a note shaver, a slumming parson or a second-story man, and does he prowl the streets by day or by night?

And equally important—what street does "The Man in the Street" infest? Is it Wall Street or Broad Street? Easy Street or Queer Street? Broadway or Fifth Avenue? Fourteenth Street (Tammany Hall) or Fortieth Street? (Republican Club.) Does he back Conried or Hammerstein, the National League or the American? Alas! that these burning questions must for the present, perhaps forever, remain unanswered. It seems so strange that this mysterious individual's influence is only created and felt while he is in the street. The moment he goes home to the bosom of his family, or to his club, or church, or any haunts of men under cover he loses his identity and becomes as one of us who sits indoors and attempts to describe him. No, it is clear that he is possessed of some apparatus like an Aladdin's lamp that renders him invisible, intangible whenever he wishes to become so, like some corporations we have heard of that absolutely melt into space when approached with too curious a gaze.

At first blush one would say that "The Man in the Street" is simply a catch phrase for that vast, casual, undercurrent of public opinion which is ever sweeping about the world, but only comes to the surface in explicit force when some convulsion or revolution stirs its depths. Yet "The Man in the Street" would be the first to repudiate any such notion. He is far too much of a gentleman to be at the bottom of any revolution. He has a horror of Anarchy and would no sooner think of throwing a bomb than of carrying a revolver in his overcoat pocket. He would gladly put his hand in his pocket to aid the starving Chinese, but has nothing but a laugh for the silly Suffragettes who are making themselves a burden to British law and order. Moreover, all such émeutes or movements lead to disorder, to tempestuous meetings and riots, and it has been indicated that "The Man in the Street" is a peaceful, law-abiding citizen, at least so long as he remains in the street. Of course what he does indoors has nothing to do with our argument.

Pricking the Insurance Bubble.

Again, it has been suggested that "The Man in the Street" is for the time being the embodiment of a form of yellow journalism that has its finger in every pie and some bad advice to give about everything that is good. This is quite unfair. Yellow journalism has never been accused of accomplishing any good result for the sake of the good in it, while "The Man in the Street" is constantly bringing to pass all manner of good things that affect the public weal. To be explicit. No one imagines for an instance that a very superficial little tiff between Mr. Alexander and Mr. Hyde was the cause of the tremendous upheaval in life insurance methods and practices. Of course, it was to the greatest interests of both those gentlemen that affairs should remain precisely as they were. Why should they pull down their magnificent palaces upon their own poor heads, some living to flee, others perishing in the ruins? It was not their tart correspondence that precipitated the wreck. It was "The Man in the Street." He, not only as an onlooker, but as a policy holder, was vastly interested, and he talked with other "Men in the Street," and they to others, until the bubble was pricked at a thousand different points and the collapse came. Neither you nor I know who the men were who did the talking. They held no mass meetings, appointed no committees, and employed no counsel. They left that to the men at their desks, the regular figureheads of every reform movement; but while they were out on the street they spoke their mind without making speeches, and they accomplished results.

The Fight for Governor.

How did Mr. Hughes come to defeat Mr. Hearst on the race for Governor? Did he have more money to spend? No. Was his organization better? Not so good. Was his cause a better one? Not necessarily. Was his personality so strong? Little known. What secured his election? "The Man in the Street"! and in the streets of New York. Neither side reckoned upon this new element, this intangible influence, this nonchalant chap that goes about upsetting all calculations and ignoring all schedules. The Democrats had figured out a clean sweep. The Republicans were only hopeful. "The Man in the Street" held no meetings, made no speeches, subscribed no funds. For one moment only on Election Day did he lose his identity, and that was when he went off the street into his voting booth. But he had done his work on the street and could well allow himself that one brief loss of caste. You can call this the silent vote of the best class of citizens, if you please, but you will be wrong. "The Man in the Street" is as often as not of an inferior class of citizenship, and it was simply his shrewd guess that Mr. Hearst was not the man wanted that lifted Mr. Hughes from the back row to the lime-light.

To follow this argument up until we can go no higher and must now involve another "man." "The Man with the Big Stick." There has been a remarkable change of sentiment throughout the country on the question of a third term for President Roosevelt. It will be remembered that THE TIMES elicited an expression of opinion from editors the country over upon the sentiment in their respective communities regarding a third term. It was not the editors' personal views that were sought so much, nor the politicians' views, nor the old reliable party standbys', but the ideas of the great mass of people—in a word, the ideas of "The Man in the Street." Almost without exception the verdict was for more Roosevelt and plenty of him, and if not Roosevelt, by his own declination, then somebody as like him, or more so, as possible. Yes, to all intents and purposes "The Man in the Street" is a Jingo and likes to sing with his brother Jingoes of Great Britain:

> We don't want to fight,
> But, by Jingo, if we do,
> We've got the men,
> We've got the ships,
> We've got the money too.

Let us leave this chap away above the street, say on top of the Washington Monument, waving the flag and shouting Roosevelt! and see if his influence does not also obtain in some of the more peaceful planes of life.

He Admires a Doer.

We have admitted that "The Man in the Street" is neither a tramp nor a dandy, but surely there is a wide interval between in which a very decent social position may be secured. He may not wear the best cut frock coat or the best oiled dicer on Fifth Avenue, but he knows a real swell when he sees one, and admires him all the more if he can do anything. He hates a snob as the devil hates holy water. He has the greatest admiration for the pluck and patriotism of a man like Mr. Oliver Iselin, who gladly gave up the best Summer of his life in the defense of the America's Cup, while he would have nothing but sneers for a fine fleur who spends his life leading cotillions. He thinks one Vanderbilt a plucky fellow for taking the lead he has in automobile racing, and has nothing but praise for the enterprise of another who takes a string of harness horses to England to compete with the best horsemen in the world. To his mind young Jay Gould, not yet matriculated at college, is the embodiment of American nerve and grit in facing the matured brawn and skill of the world at court tennis. The men who shoot, hunt, play polo, golf, and lawn tennis are heroes compared with those who find nothing more inspiring to do than loaf about Florida hotels and Virginia Hot Springs. To tell the truth, what he reads in the papers about some doings of the Smart Set at Newport and other resorts rather nauseates "The Man in the Street," and sometimes causes him to relapse from that state of sobriety which it is his general purpose to retain.

As for the general morals of society, "The Man in the Street" does not care a rap. He does not believe in the principle that all women are virtuous until they are found out, because so many are suspected of wrong-doing who are as innocent as lambs. He is very severe on cases like a recent one involving divorce, marriage, and sudden death, together with a resurrection of a lot of unknown relatives who have lived to fight for spoils which the widow thought would be exclusively her own. According to him it was the worst sort of judgment to buy a house that had been prepared for a bride who met a tragic death, and was not long after the death scene of the bereaved husband.

A Satisfactory Juryman.

"The Man in the Street" is much diverted by the rush of American women to England in search of fresh worlds to conquer, but he would rather know what is to win the Derby than who the next American duchess will be. He also delights in the influx of Western gold into New York, and is not above hanging over the fence watching the huge excavations being made for the latest billionaire's palace. He draws the line, however, upon degenerate importations. The Thaw trial was of great interest to him. Indeed, had Mr. Jerome succeeded in getting a few more "Men in the Street" on that jury a much more satisfactory verdict might have been reached. Here was an opportunity for our newly-found friend to vent all his wrath—that New York should have been forced to bear the shame and expense of a disgusting trial, forced upon her by the disgraceful escapades of two vicious young people, neither of whom had a tithe of interest in our city or a particle of standing in the community, but were known only through their degradation and tolerated in certain quarters through their money.

Of course, the affairs of the police department appeal with directness to "The Man in the Street," who has been acquainted with bluecoats all his life, but has never seen them so cast down and afraid, now that the police bill has become law. Where now is the jolly laugh of "Billy" McLaughlin, the merry twinkle in the eye of George McClusky, or the grand stand attitude of Adam Cross? Gone to play with the goats in Bronxville, or to gather dead sea-fruit at Far Rockaway. "The Man in the Street" can well chuckle at the change. He has seen the day when his mild protests were of no avail against the overbearing autocracy of this gentry, and now that they are humbled and subdued he can thank himself for much of that silent influence that has accomplished the reform. As for the passing of the Detective Bureau, "The Man in the Street" declares it never will be missed since the old adage of setting a thief to catch a thief has been worked so much overtime as to have lost all its force.

Conservative on Sport.

In outdoor sports like racing, baseball, and yachting "The Man in the Street" is conservatively enthusiastic. He believes in betting as the only logical way of backing one's opinion, but has no use whatever for poolrooms. He likes to see the colors of the Belmonts, Keenes, Whitneys, and Hitchcocks run to the fore because they always run true, and without them racing would degenerate into mere horseplay. He thinks Belmont Park the greatest race track in the world, and as probably as not is a quiet if one of the most observant members of the Turf and Field Club. "The Man in the Street" is a wee bit tired of Sir Thomas Lipton and his perennial Ceylon smile, but gives him credit for stimulating boat building and yachting interests in this country if he did gain his own ulterior ends in his attempts to lift the Cup. On baseball he has fixed a somewhat suspicious gaze, fearful that the tendency to rowdy play and riotous bleachers may yet ruin a sport that is National only when played on the square as well as on the diamond.

Such in brief seem some of the more notable traits and characteristics of "The Man in the Street" as one jots them down in considering his character and trying to fathom his mysteries. It is more than likely that he will not recognize himself in such a picture. A famous man is sometimes the last one to discover it. If we have been halfway right in our delincations it will be seen that it is not easy for any one to recognize the new hero of the phrasemakers. Since his chief charm and power lies in his utter unconsciousness it will be safe to infer that any one who poses as "The Man in the Street" is a fraud and an impostor. I may be the man, thou mayst be the man, be may be the man, but, like the system of spies in Russia, you never can tell who or what the other fellow may be. A great many men wouldn't care to be taken for "The Man in the Street." They would rather be the man in the clubs, the banks, the merts, and the boudoirs. They don't want to be bothered with the responsibilities of the street. They see enough and hear enough indoors away from the noise and shouts of traffic. The streets are dirty, too, and he is a craven who permits our noses and lungs to be filled with the remnants of last Autumn's carousals. When the phrasemakers get around to this type of drone, it is impossible to tell what verbal punishment they'll find to fit the crime.

In the meantime we offer this slight testimonial to "The Man in the Street," conscious that while it falls quite short of doing him full justice, it at least shows a proper disposition to recognize his presence among us and to express a hope that he has come to stay.

Norman Duncan Discusses the Penalties of Authorship

Newfoundland Romancer Propounds Some Original Views on the Mission of the Novelist and the True End and Aim of Art.

NORMAN DUNCAN, who has made the colony of Newfoundland in the British Empire so peculiarly his own province in the realm of literature, believes in seclusion for the toil of his muse. He has therefore fixed his habitation in the pretty little Pennsylvania village of North East, on the shore of Lake Erie; but still he finds the lure of the metropolis like "the call of the wild" to an exiled denizen, and from time to time revisits this city to mingle temporarily with its "madding crowd" and remind himself of the days when, as reporter and lover of the picturesque in life, he haunted the Bowery and the river fronts, and, above all, the Syrian quarter. One such revisitation Mr. Duncan is now making for change and refreshment after composing his latest, longest, and most important romance of the far northern isle and its pitiless seas—"The Cruise of the Shining Light."

"Stuart," said Mr. Duncan, looking earnestly at me, an unusual cloud upon his face, as I disturbed his solitary meditation solaced by a cigarette, "if you are harboring the feeblest ambition to become a novelist, for God's sake kick it out, bag and baggage."

"What's the matter?" I asked in amazement.

Romance Writing Not Life.

"The man," pursued the author, "who can make himself useful in any other way whatsoever, and deliberately abandons himself to novel writing is a fool. If I were Nicholas Top, I'd say—a damned fool."

"You don't mean that," I protested, laughing.

"I mean precisely that," asserted Mr. Duncan firmly.

"And why?"

"Because the joy of life is in living, and writing romances is not living. Life is communion with one's fellowbeings. Romance writing is excommunication from them—banishment from the real world, exile to a world peopled only by the phantasms of the brain. The more vivid they are, the more perfectly invested with flesh and blood they seem, the more completely they take the romancer out of life and away from the joy of living. It is a fact that when I began 'The Cruise of the Shining Light' at the Muskoka Lakes last August, my two brothers and their families, forewarned by experience, came to me and virtually said goodby—as if I had been on the point of departure to another sphere."

"Isn't this a trifle fanciful?" I suggested.

"Fanciful!" exclaimed Mr. Duncan. "I assure you that this sense of detachment from life becomes the dominant reality of the novelist's existence. He sees around him men and women loving and hating, contending and helping, laughing and weeping; and he knows that in all this play of passion, all this struggle of wills, he has no personal share. He can only observe, observe, with every faculty tense; and from observation he passes straight into the world of imagination. And how tyrannous that world may be, only the novelist knows. He exists, as it were, in a trance, and yet that trance is agony. And he must invite the agony, for he knows that out of his keenest suffering comes what is finest and most beautiful in his work. As this detachment continues, he loses all capacity for personal emotion; he can neither love nor hate, neither laugh nor weep, out of his own heart and for himself—he lives in the emotions of his creatures. No wonder the artist becomes, as a man, insincere."

"Insincere? How, then, can he be a genuine artist? Is not sincerity the corner-stone of true art?"

"Sincerity in art—yes."

"But is sincerity in art divisible from personal sincerity?"

"Most certainly. Take an extreme illustration. Suppose an artist has need to know as exactly and minutely as a man can, the emotion of love in a woman. Thus to know it he must himself be the object of it. He pretends to love a woman and wins her affection—and exhaustively studies all its manifestations. Would not that be a case of the most devoted artistic sincerity and the most reprehensible personal insincerity?"

"Well, certainly," said I, "you have described most unalluringly the penalties of authorship. But has it no rewards?"

"Yes," replied Mr. Duncan, the cloud passing from his face—"a reward, and a great one: the satisfaction of not succumbing to the penalties of authorship, of faithfully living out the destiny fate has allotted, of striving with one's might to fulfill the high mission of the delineator of life, of accomplishing in successive books so much of that mission as one's supreme endeavor may."

"Then the novelist has a mission—a high mission?"

Mission of the Novelist.

"The highest which to-day is given to man. I mean, of course, the true novelist: the writer who knows that his mission is the highest, who accepts it with reverence and self-consecration, and who, against every temptation to apostasy, remains true to his vows. I do not mean the adventurer in the field of fiction, the writer who has no conception of a higher purpose than to entertain and please for popularity and pay. And the number of these, unhappily, is legion; but as surely as they have not looked beyond their personal needs, so surely are they doomed to swift oblivion. The novelist, however, who conceives his art and his function aright, and is endowed with the requisite gifts, must have an enduring claim to the gratitude and remembrance of mankind. And this is true of him now and for the future as never before. In the modern world has suddenly occurred a vacancy in the office of teacher. The centuries-old reign of the preacher as teacher has come to an end. Creeds are crumbling; men have become intellectually and spiritually free; the voice of the pulpit homilist is no longer to them the voice of God-given authority—the light he proffers no longer a divine illumination. The press cannot fill this vacancy; it is too purely mundane, is concerned too absolutely with the superficial things of the moment, is too much perturbed by the passions of the hour. Look where we will, we shall find no individual mind which holds the ear of the multitude as does the novelist, none which has the same wide and rich opportunity to interpret life and thereby to teach, to inspire, and to uplift. The novelist of to-day, therefore, may be, and ought to be, and will be—if he is true to himself—Seer, Philosopher, Priest, and Prophet to the world."

NORMAN DUNCAN

"Thus to magnify his vocation, a novelist must take himself very seriously," I remarked.

"If he does not, he has no rightful title to the office of novelist," declared Mr. Duncan, emphatically. "I do not hesitate to say that I take myself seriously, that I take my work seriously, that I believe I have a call to do this particular work, and that if I did not do it, it would not be done. If I could not say this with entire conscientiousness, I should feel that no line of mine had the slightest justification for existence."

Art a Means to the End.

"You have left small room for the dictum, 'Art for art's sake,'" I suggested.

"'Art for art's sake!'" repeated Mr. Duncan, contemptuously. "That is a most pernicious doctrine. Art is a means to an end beyond itself, and that end, in its ultimate import, is righteousness. Any other conception of art is almost base."

"You make it clear that your literary creed, on all vital points, is now formulated and fixed," I observed. "The literary psychologist will be interested to know the 'origine' of your activity as interpreter of life. Were you, like so many who have achieved distinction in literature, practically an infant when you began handling the pen?"

"No," answered Mr. Duncan, with a laugh. "Thank Heaven, I wasn't precocious. I didn't 'lisp in numbers'; yet it could have been with no mature articulation that I first spoke out—and in 'numbers' at that! I think I was 11 when my devoted elder brother Robert—always versatile, and at 14 an amateur compositor and publisher of no mean ability—set up, printed, and bound my first book, an exceedingly thin volume of—of—well, verse. I regret to say that it bore the excruciatingly unidyllic title of 'Pickled Poems'"—and Mr. Duncan smiled broadly at the recollection. "Only the other day, to my surprise, I disinterred from among some old papers a cover of that precious volume."

"A cover? And the contents?" I inquired anxiously.

"Had kindly vanished," chuckled Mr. Duncan. "The pickle, you see, didn't last. What the rhymes were, or what they were about, has quite escaped my memory—except that they were mainly flights of the humorous muse."

"And your next attempts?"

"Oh, I did essays, of course, when I was a student at the University of Toronto, and wrote more or less sophomoric things for the university paper, of which I became one of the editors."

"And then?"

Once a Reporter.

"I dropped forthwith into the humble ranks of reporters, beginning on The Auburn Bulletin, and doing—I don't mean committing—murders, suicides, embezzlements, elopements, and all the rest of the lurid, melodramatic, picturesque, and pathetic episodes which diatend the reporter's repertoire. But like all newspaper youths, I hungered for the great city where all these colorful incidents abounded in a profusion unknown to the provincial decorum of charming Auburn; and so, after a year there, I came in 1897 to New York and went on the city staff of The Evening Post. That The Post provided less sensationalism than I was prepared to embrace—if necessary—was doubtless a blessing. To its dignified standards and severe discipline I feel myself incalculably indebted."

"You have, I dare say, a definite opinion of the value of reporting as a preparation for writing fiction," I said.

"Reporting furnishes an experience so rich, so varied, so encyclopedic, so fruitful, that I am tempted to call it indispensable to him who would be a novelist. In no other calling whatever can one learn in so brief a time, so intimately and so deeply, so much about life, about human nature, about all the complex activities of modern society. Let every earnest aspirant to the Hierarchy of the Interpreters of Life throw himself at once into the arduous and often repulsive 'grind' of the reporter. But let him make the leap to literature before he becomes jaded."

"When did you make the leap?"

"In 1899, after three years of reporting. I had discovered the Syrian quarter, lived there every spare moment, and began writing short stories about it for The Atlantic Monthly and other magazines. In 1900 these were gathered into the volume entitled 'The Soul of the Street.'"

"What took you to Newfoundland?"

"From my boyhood, Newfoundland had always possessed for me a curious and intense fascination. Its northern remoteness, its wild and icy seas, the life and manners of its primitive people stirred my imagination often and often before I ever beheld it. Then, when I had become saturated to satiation with the Oriental atmosphere and characteristics of the Syrian quarter, I craved the completest possible change—and Newfoundland beckoned me with a double insistency. My first journey thither was made in the Summer of 1900, and I have returned there almost every Summer since—besides making a couple of visits to Labrador. In 1901, after writing one or two Newfoundland stories, I bade a farewell to journalism.

"Had you any peculiar experience, from the literary point of view, in writing any of your works?"

"A most unusual one in writing 'The Cruise of the Shining Light.' As a rule, whether it be a short story or a novel, the entire scheme of it is already so matured in my mind when I begin to write, that, from that point on, the task is little more than composition; and I even have each chapter set up by the printer as soon as finished. I sat down to the book which became 'The Cruise of the Shining Light' with a similar complete plan in mind. Immediately a character I had not before thought of, old Nicholas Top, presented himself to my imagination in as full embodiment as if he were a living person who had confronted me. Without a moment's hesitation I began my first chapter with Nick Top, accepting him, however, only as an auxiliary, and having not the slightest intention of modifying, in any essential respect, my original scheme. But he took such absolute possession of me that, try as I would, I could not escape from him or reduce him to the ranks. Day after day I struggled against his despotism—but in vain. At last I surrendered to Nicholas Top, and wrote a book totally different from the one I had planned."

NIGEL STUART.

Proof Needed.

IN the sitting room of an east side settlement one of the young women club leaders was striving to implant the tune and sentiments of "America" in the minds and hearts of a group of recently arrived Russian girls. A slender little miss with very big black eyes peered through the door for a moment, and then, recognizing in the club leader an old friend whom she had not seen for several years, precipitated herself upon that young woman, and in the twinkling of an eye had told her that "my pa he gone and got me a pieno, and I learn so much my teacher have given me a gold medal." As teaching the strange tune in a strange tongue had not been easy, the small girl was pressed into service as accompanist. She battled valiantly with the chords through one verse, and then, realizing that time and tune were lost, she collapsed on the young woman's shoulder and sobbed dismally:

"Oh, I wish I had my gold medal here!"

TWO VERSIONS OF THE STORY OF POCAHONTAS

Latest Researches Vindicate the Probability of the Romantic Exploits of Capt. John Smith—The Pocahontas Story One of Many Incidents in an Unparalleled Career.

THE generation which read with breathless eagerness, out of histories garnished with more or less artistic wood-cut illustrations, the story of John Smith and Pocahontas has given way to the generation which, under the influence of a historical skepticism deemed to indicate superior wisdom, banished the incident from its books or relegated it to a footnote as one of the incredible romances invented by its lying hero. It now nevertheless appears that the earlier acceptance of the incident as authentic was amply justified; that the later skepticism was hasty, uncritical, and presumptuous; that John Smith, the wisest and bravest member of the Virginia Company of Adventurers and repeatedly the savior of Jamestown, was indeed the central figure of the little drama in which the beautiful daughter of the Indian "King" Powhatan threw her arms about his neck and saved him from death.

And not only so, but the latest and best critical opinion accepts as equally veritable the stories of remarkable adventures of Capt. Smith in France, the Netherlands, in the Mediterranean, in Styria and Transylvania, in Constantinople, the Scythia desert, in Poland, and Morocco—adventures as romantic as anything in fiction, if, indeed, they are paralleled anywhere outside of the narratives of the wandering Englishmen, to whom in the age of Elizabeth the whole world suddenly opened as a field of glory and of romance. One who knows the undoubted history contained in the pages of Haykluyt, and understands the conditions of life and the romantic spirit which made possible the exploits of Thomas Sanders, John Fox, Capt. Robert Knox, and Richard Hasleton, not to speak of Sir Francis Drake, Capt. John Hawkins, and Sir Walter Raleigh, can well understand how the sturdy Lincolnshire soldier, sworn to adventure, fared him into strange lands and met battle and shipwreck, captivity, escape, the favoritism of a Turkish Queen as well as of an Indian Princess, and fame as the slayer of three Turkish champions, whose severed heads he charged upon his shield, by grace of the Prince of Transylvania and of the British Herald's College.

For his sojourn in Virginia, where it was unquestionably he whose rssourcefulness and courage saved the day, makes but one chapter of one of the most adventurous lives ever lived.

His Marvelous Autobiography.

Who, then, was John Smith, the man who made possible the permanence of the settlement the three hundredth anniversary of which is now being celebrated at Jamestown, and what did he do besides allowing Pocahontas to savs him from the Indian axe?

When a gentleman in the course of autobiographical remarks mentions, among other interesting things which he happens to remember, that he was robbed; shipwrecked at sea, or rather thrown overboard by devout Pilgrims for a Jonah to appease the storm; swam to shore; made captive by the Turks and escaped by killing his master with a flail; encountered pirates and escaped with a casket of jewels; cut off the heads of three infidel champions; was romantically beloved by a fair Constantinopolitan, Tragabigzanda; befriended by a Russian fair one, Calamata, and later was snatched from the jaws of death by the lovely Pocahontas, daughter of the King of Virginia, attention is attracted to the fact that he has had a lively career. As a matter of fact, that of John Smith was distinctly lively. He had exhausted the romantic possibilities of the Old World before he sailed for America at the age of 28.

None of his adventures is without parallel in the experience of other men. It is the accumulation of so many adventures in one life which suggest the doubt whether any of them occurred. Let it be said at once that of the most remarkable there is ample proof, while the ability, courage, adventurous spirit, and resourcefulness of the man are established beyond all cavil. It is true that Smith is his own biographer, but those who accuse him of falsifying as to his own adventures hasten to confess in the same breath that he is phenomenal in his accuracy as a historian. His map of Virginia was long the authoritative, and was referred to in court as late as 1751. The fact that so many adventures are claimed for one man loses much of its force as an objection when the conditions of the age are remembered, togethsr with the circumstance that this man was deliberately seeking adventure.

Jonah Without a Whale.

Smith was born in Willoughby, Lincolnshire, and christened in the church there, as the parish record still shows, Jan. 9, 1580. His parents soon died. He crossed to France and enlisted as a soldier. Going to Flanders he fought three years against the Spaniard. In 1600 he came back to Willoughby and spent his time dreaming of more wars. He decided to try for fortune against the Turk. Passing through France he was robbed and left for dead; a peasant wandering in the forest found and brought him to. He embarked from Marseilles with a company of pilgrims bound for the Levant. A storm arose, and he, being a Protestant, was adjudged the cause of Divine wrath and cast overboard. He was a good swimmer, and Providence brought him to a little goat-inhabited island. Next morning he was picked up by a Breton vessel, on which he cruised through the Mediterranean. The ship was possibly a pirate, for after a fight with a Venetian vessel they relieved her of silks, velvets, gold and silver coin. Smith got for his share £225 in coin and a box of jewels. He was put ashore in Piedmont and travsled through Italy, sight-seeing, visiting Florence, Bologna, Naples, and Rome. Here he saw Pope Clement VIII. and several Cardinals creeping on their knees up the Sacred Stairway.

Exhausting the interests of Rome, he made his way to Venice, and tben on to Gratz, in Styria, where he entered the service of Rudolph II., and was given a company of 250 men, with the rank of Captain. Occasions are mentioned on which he devised signals and fire missiles. The following year his troop entered the service of Sigismund Bathori, Prince of Transylvania. While besieging Regal, a Captain belonging to the Turkish garrison sent a challenge defying any Captain of the enemy to fight him for his head. The challenge was accepted by the Christians, and by lot Capt. Smith was chosen for the duel. A truce was proclaimed, the Turks with their ladies assembled on the walls, the Christians on the plains. At the appointed hour the champions exchanged salutes, then set the spurs to their horses, and rushed on each other with leveled lances. Smith killed his opponent at the onset, and, dismounting, unfastened his helmet, cut off his head, and carried it to his General, Moses Tzekely.

The chagrined Turks were not content, and the most redoubtable of their Captains sent the Englishman a personal challenge. The following day, therefore, the scene was repeated, though this time neither succeeded in killing his enemy till recourse was had to pistols, when the Turk fell and was beheaded. Capt. Smith, to sustain his honor, now challenged for a third test, the defiance being accepted. This time the weapons, by the choice of the challenged, were battle axes. Smith's axe was stricken from his hand, but the Englishman fell back on his sword, and, giving his enemy a fearful thrust, stretched him on the arena, and instantly had his head.

There is nothing intrinsically improbable about this incident, unless it be its late date as a tournament. In point of fact, the customs of the Middle Ages survived long past their time in the East. It has been alleged against the story that nobody tells it except its own hero. Thomas Fuller, in his book "The Worthies of England," remarks: "It soundeth much to the diminution of his deeds that he alone is the herald to publish and proclaim them."

Let us examine this objection so far as it relates to the three Turks incident, confessedly the most suspicious of Smith's alleged exploits.

The Truth About the Three Turks.

A full account of the exploit is given, it is true, in Smith's own "True Travels," published in 1629. But in the official register of the Herald's College is a Latin entry recording that a coat of arms had been granted by Sigismund Bathori, Prince of Transylvania, "to John Smith, Captain of 250 soldiers * * * in memory of three Turks' heads which with his sword before the town of Regal he did cut off." The document of record which contains this grant is a letter of safe conduct dated Dec. 9, 1603, signed by Sigismund at Leipsic. The entry is duly approved and the genuineness of Sigismund's signature and shield certified by the Garter King at Arms, Sir William Segar.

Furthermore, the second volume of "Purchas, His Pilgrimes," Page 1,363, gives the incident of the three Turks' heads. Purchas found the story, as he says, in "a booke intituled 'The Warres of Transylvania, Wallachi, and Moldavia,'" written in Italian by Francesco Farnese, secretary to Prince Sigismund. The manuscript of this book, never published, is now lost, but there can be no doubt that Purchas saw and translated part of it in 1623. To the contemptuous charge that Smith was a lying braggart, the fact that his own book was not published until 1629 "is a staggering blow between ths eyes." So declares John Fiske, who has summarized in his "Old Virginia" the facts set forth above. Fiske accepts as true the narratives of Capt. Smith's adventures, remarking that, so far from the Captain's narrative being boastful, as is freely charged, in his judgment it is so free from egotistic self-consciousness that it reminds a critic strongly of Gen. Grant's Memoirs.

The portrait of Smith is that of an attractive man. The fact served him well in Constantinople, whither he was sent in captivity after the battle of Rothenthurm, in 1602. The Lady Charatza Tragabigzanda, in whose family he was held, was able to converse with him in Italian, and conceived a friendship for the unhappy captive. The point of land off Gloucester, Mass., now known as Cape Ann, was given by Capt. Smith, when he explored the New England coast, the name of Cape Tragabigzanda. The three small islands near by he named the Turks' Heads.

His Escape from Slavery.

For some reason Smith was now sent to a brother of his lady, Timour, Pasha of Nalbrits, a district to the east of the Sea of Azov. The Pasha treated his servants savagely. Smith had a skin for a garment and an iron collar about his neck, and was cruelly beaten. One day as he was thrashing wheat in a lonely barn the Pasha came in and reviled him, whereupon Smith leaped upon him with his flail and slew him. He hid the body in the straw, dressed himself in the dead man's clothes, tied a sack of grain to the saddlebow of his horse, mounted, and rode away. Riding hard for sixteen days he arrived at a Russian post on the River Don, where he was well received and the iron collar stricken from his neck. Then he made his way through Poland, Hungary, and Bohemia to Leipsic, where Sigismund gave him safe conduct home and a coat of arms.

We now come to the expedition to Virginia. On his return from the East Smith tried the Barbary coast, but there was little to be found in the way of adventure. The Virginia expedition was the most dangerous enterprise in sight, and he came back to England and joined it.

It is not the purpose of this article to relate his services to the colonization of Virginia. A far longer history would be required to do that subject justice. He was a member of the Council from the beginning, and soon proved himself the one capable man in it. On him revolved negotiations with the Indians and the exploration of the new country. He sailed up and down the bays and rivers, made friends with the natives in the interior, and returned laden with maize and meat, with which to save the Colonists from starvation. The rest were dreaming of gold and pearls; Smith was bent on getting food. In an open boat, with no instrument but a compass, he mapped Chesapeake Bay so accurately that his map was not superseded for a century and a half. For months, the other Councilors having died or gone home, he was sole ruler of Jamestown. Bringing the Colonists through a terrible Winter, he was injured the following year by an explosion of gunpowder in his boat, and was obliged to go home for surgical treatment to preserve his life. He left 500 souls. The next ship that reached Virginia found 150 starved wretches, some of whom had eaten the flesh of the dead and all of whom were on the verge of madness.

The Pocahontas Story.

But to take up the Pocahontas story: On Dec. 10, 1607, Smith started on an exploring expedition up the Chickahominy River. Proceeding as far as the depth of water would permit in a shallop, he left it in charge of seven men, and went on in a canoe with two white men and two Indians. In the neighborhood of what is now known as White Oak Swamp they were attacked by redskins, the two Englishmen were killed, and Smith was taken captive, after having pistoled two of the enemy. He was carried about the country and exhibited, though treated with much kindness. On Jan. 5, 1608, he was brought into the presence of Big Chief Powhatan, who received him in a long wigwam seated before the fire, clothed in a robe of coons' skins. His squaws and warriors wers around him.

As to the events of the next two or three days, there is this difficulty: There are two accounts of them, both written by Smith, but apparently not agreeing. In a letter written by him to a friend in Juns of that year, as published, apparently without his knowledge, in August, under the title "A True Relation," &c., Smith simply says that Powhatan received him kindly and sent him back to Jamestown. No mention is made of Pocahontas or of threatened death. But in the "General History of Virginia," a long, circumstantial narrative written partly by Smith and partly by others, and published in 1624, we get a different version of the incident. We are here told that after a pow-wow in Powhatan's wigwam, two big stones were brought and placed before the chief; that Smith was dragged up and his head laid upon them; but that, even as the warriors were standing ready to lift their clubs, the chief's young daughter Pocahontas rushed up, threw her arms upon him, and laid her head upon his, and that thereupon her father spared her life.

Now, when the absence from the earlier account of the Pocahontas story was noticed, it was easy to conclude that Smith's imagination had been at work before he composed the later "history" and that it was simply a romantic lie.

This easy assumption has had the countenance of many writers of high repute, yet a very brief scrutiny of the whole case clearly proves its unscholarly character; "its utter flimsiness can be exhibited," says John Fiske, than whom there has been no more critical student of American history, "in very few words."

In the first place, the incident, if it had happened, would have been a most ordinary one. It would have been precisely in accord with Indian usage. Time and again captives held by Indians have been freed by the whim of some member of the tribe, who proposed to take him as a son or a lover or to swear him into the dusky fellowship. The historic pages of Parkman tell of the practice again and again. Pocahontas, if she had laid her head beside Capt. Smith's, would have run no risk; she would only have been carrying out, perhaps out of admiration, perhaps out of pity, perhaps laughingly, a well-understood rite. The captive would rise to be received into membership in the tribe, the blood-debt would be looked upon as canceled, and he would be free.

There is evidence to show that Smith was henceforth regarded as a member of the tribe. On one occasion the old chief, addressing him, said, "We are all friends, nay, Powhatans."

The fact that Smith did not mention the Pocahontas incident in his first account does not prove that it did not occur. It is not at all certain that he did not mention it. The first account (the "True Relation") was written, as was stated above, as a letter to a friend. The editor who published it expressly states that he had omitted a part of the manuscript. "Somewhat more was by him written, which being (as I thought) fit to be private, I would not adventure to make it public." Here the case of the detractors of Smith falls to the ground. They say that because the Pocahontas story is not given in the pripted text of the "True Relation" it is a fabrication. But we have the editor's own word for it that he had not printed all of Smith's story.

Dangers Discouraged Colonists.

It might very well have been the Pocahontas story that he cut out. Why should he do this? Why are the narratives of colonists always made to read, when published at home by authority, rosy accounts of prosperity, free from danger and unhappiness? The instructions given the Virginia Company, on sailing, expressly enjoin them to "suffer no man * * * to write in any letter of anything that may discourage others." This injunction may have restrained Smith from putting even into a private letter the story of his narrow escape from a terrible death, but at all events it would certainly operate to suggest to a discreet editor the advisability of cutting it out from the published vsrsion.

The case argued against the Pocahontas incident from its omission from the "True Relation" hasn't a leg to stand upon.

It is argued, however, that the "True Relation" not only omits the incident, but asserts that Smith was kindly treated by his captors. It is declared that Indians who were about to beat a captive's brains out would not treat him kindly. That is, nevertheless, precisely what Indians would do. Apaches and Comanches commonly offer their choicest morsels of food with bows and smiles and their prettiest maidens to the doomed captive who is to die in the morning. The irony of such a situation is delicious to the Indian heart. In the later longer account Smith repeats that he was kindly treated on the way to his expected death. There is no discrepancy or contradiction; in the first short account, either Smith or his editor, from motives of discretion, simply omitted what is supplied in the full history.

Nor did the Pocahontas story wait, as has been objected, till 1624 to be told. Pocahontas came to England in 1616 as the wife of John Rolfe. Capt. Smith, on her arrival, wrote a letter to King James's Queen, Anne of Denmark, bespeaking the royal favor for the gentle visitor from Virginia; he declares "she hazarded the beating out of her own brains to save mine." Now, what becomes of the contemptuous sneer that Smith was a lying romancer? Pocahontas herself would have exposed him; a hundred Virginians then in London would have done so. On the publication of his "General History" in 1624, George Percy, his enemy, a leader of the Virginia adventure, wrote a pamphlet criticising it. He made no objection to the Pocahontas story; if he could have denounced it as a fabrication he would have crushed his rival. Why did he not do so?

Because the Pocahontas story was true.

Capt. John Smith's Own Account of His Rescue by Pocahontas

DID Pocahontas rescue Capt. John Smith from death? She did. All doubt on that point has vanished. No less important a document than the diary of the Captain himself has been discovered. For three centuries it has been handed down from father to son among the descendants of Powhatan, the great Virginia chieftain, until at last it came into the possession of Pooh-for-Tradition, an Indian connected with the Buffalo Bill Wild West Show.

Other Indians connected with the same show made dim hints recently that Pooh might be prevailed upon to allow the publication of extracts from the momentous diary, if he were approached in the proper way. He was at once approached by a man with a keg. Pooh promptly gave up the diary, grasped the keg, and disappeared into the cellar of the Madison Square Garden, where he has been doing the ancestral Ghost Dance ever since. And here is Capt. John Smith's diary:

Daye ye Fyrstte.

"Verily a most painfulle thynge has come to pass consistynge of ye brainge of my two companions in a thorough manner and ye leadynge of yours truly into captivity by a band of gruntynge Indians, uninvitynge as to personal appearance, and hideousle painted withal. Confound ye luck, methinks. Eftsoons I shall swear most lamentably. Ye savages are leadynge me, so I understand, to ye camp of Powhatan, ye great chief of this goldyngged region. He will probably kill me, marry come uppe, ye whyche will fatally disarrange certain lyttle plans I have for achievynge immortalitie. Rats, forsooth!"

Daye ye Seconde.

"This mornynge I and yo disagreeable bunche escortynge me arrived at ye camp of Powhatan. While stille in ye forest primeval I made shyfte to escape, but a gygantic aborigine, may ye pox tryppe him up eftsoons, seized me skillfullie by ye foot and thus did holde me, yellynge in ye most earspiyttinge manner, until ye bunch awoke and sat on my head. 'Twas passing undignified, forsooth, and sufficient to discourage further endeavors to scuttle back to Jamestown.

"On ye outskirtes of ye camp, we were met by a lovelie younge maiden. My guards tell me (I understande ye Okajibjab tongue) that she is Pocahontas, ye favorite daughter of ye olde goat, Powhatan. Pocahontas is indeed a beautyfull little maid, and her beauty is enhanced rather thanne dymynyshed by her mode of dresse, consistynge of a tastefulle arrangement of nothynge in particular, of ye whyche she seemeth passing unashamed, so why should I kycke? From ye fyrstte she seemed attracted by yours truly. Takynge a large stick, she dydde make shyfte to poke me most outrageously in ye ribbes, laughing like unto a bell when I dydde gadzook most emphatycallie. 'Prythee, quit, thou mosquito!' said I, in Okajibjab. 'Nary,' ye playfulle little Princess did reply. Finally shs annoyed me to such an extremitie that I dydde abandon courtlie Okajibjab entreaties for a vigorous outburste in ye Mary Johnston manner, singularly unadapted to mixed corpanie. Pocahontas fled.

"Eftsoons, or thereabouts, I was dragged before ye great chief Powhatan. He is a talle, majesticalle olde mutte, and methinks his simple garb, consystynge of one coat of yellowe paint and a fresco on ye lefte foot, doth become him passing well. Ye firstte words he dydde address to me were 'Whatte is your name?' and whenne I dydde answer Smith he expressed great wonder at ytte, saying again and again, 'Marry, and 'tis a rare name. Be there any more at home like you?' 'A few,' I answered, suppressing a grynne, for ye thought came to me thatte, in England 'ye Smiths be verily like ye grains of sand.' Powhatan also wondered at ye strange sound of my name John, whereat I also dydde make shyfte to suppress a jubilant cachinnation. But soon graver matters came up. 'Smith,' said Powhatan, 'have you any engagements, forsooth, for to-morrow?' 'None,' said I. 'Well, make an appointment with Handle-with-Care, an it please your Smithness,' said Powhatan. 'Who may he be?' I asked. 'Ye executioner,' answered Powhatan, turnynge away.

MISS POCAHONTAS.

Not "from a photograph"; not even "from an old print"; just "drawn from description" and said to be a most excellent likeness.

Daye ye Thirde.

"Handle-with-Care is another mutte, with a dash of cynicism that maketh me to dislike him hugely. He did have ye boundless nerve to apologize to me for that ye irksome jobbe of beheading sixteen Chickaboobaw captives hath made him to postpone my own execution a fulle day. A pox upon him! Who could make shyfte to beat such nerve?

"Pocahontas, ye lovelie Princess, dropped in to see me in my celle today. Verily, I do believe that ye little maid must have most especialle prepared for ye visit, for she dydde wear easille a whole pot of purple paint and sundrie gaudie feathers, mightille pleasynge withal. She expressed great sorrowe at my forthcominge demise and presented me with many hoe-cakes, ye aboriginal delicacy, weepynge ye while at ye thought of my gettynge it in ye necke to-morrow at ye handes of Handle-with-Care, ye cynicalle mutte. Presentlie she lefte me, stylle weepynge, and I made shyfte to devour eighteen hoecakes in an endeavor to cheere uppe, ye whyche was a dismalle failure."

Daye ye Fourthe.

"Handle-with-Care, dressede in a coat of dull graye paint savorynge strangely of ye Impressionysticke School, woke me at dawn to bydde me be of goode cheere. Verily, I could have slapped ye cruel galoot. Pocahontas dydde happen around later. She looked passing craftie, putting her finger significantlie to one side of her small nose and vanishynge with a mysterious smile, which I dydde in vain try to decipher.

"About noon, feelynge amazinglie blue, I endeavored to correct ye feelynge by eatynge twenty-three hoecakes, with even more dismalle results than formerlie. Verily, ye hoe-cake, eaten by ye Englishman in imprudent abundance, becomes as ye four-alarm fire in ye vitals.

"At 2 P. M. Handle-with-Care, rushynge in unceremoniously, dydde seize me by ye wygge, and dragge me, amid shrieks of delight, to ye main square of ye camp. There Powhatan and many other painted muttes were gathered. Pocahontas sat among them, with her finger still placed craftille in juxtaposition to one side of her attractive nose.

"Handle-with-Care, with ye same phantom Impressionistycke waistcoat painted upon him, then came forward, bowed to Powhatan, and beganne ye description of a new, copyrighted tomahawke stroke, by ye whyche, he graciouslie added, he intended to kylie yours truly. And there was yours truly, lying helpless on ye grounde, vainly endeavorynge to bite Handle-with-Care.

"'Go ahead, ye description promiseth much,' remarked Powhatan. And thereupon Handle-with-Care raiseth his tomahawke, describynge a swishynge parabola ye whyche dydde make my blood to runne cold, whenne suddenlie little Pocahontas jumpeth into ye rynge, and, puttynge her necke close to mine, remarketh, 'One on you, Handle-with-Care,' in a tone of gentle raillery amazinglie pleasynge withal. 'Go away,' shrieketh ye cynicalle executioner, makynge ye tomahawke to swish most horribly.

"But Powhatan and all ye painted muttes at once rose up, yellynge many and vociferous thynges, from ye whyche I gathered that all was well with yours truly henceforth. Yea, verily, and so it was, forsooth. I was made an associate chieftain on ye spotte and a member of ye Board of Directors with Powhatan himself.

"And ye semblance of a startlynge waistcoat, like unto a dissipated rainbow, was forthwythe painted upon me by Powhatan's own tailor, while yo little Pocahontas dydde dance with delighte at ye gaudyness of my attyre.

Daye ye Fifthe.

"I am at a meetynge of ye Committee on Tribal Affairs. All is stylle welle, and I feel ytte in my bones that I shall yette make shyfte to become immortal."

Folly of Wifely Jealousy

"I CAN'T understand a man's wife being jealous," said the little widow of our set, who talks epigrams and knows mors about men than any editor would print.

"In the first place, the fact that a man asks a woman to be his wife, and have his name on her calling cards, and share his home, and be the mother of his progeny, is proof positive that of all the women in the world, so far as he is concerned, she is the one and only. He reveres and admires and loves her above and beyond all the others. He has put her alone away up on a pedestal, and if she be wise she will never let him catch her looking in any direction but toward the stars, except of course when he clambers up beside her for an hour or so. Ordinarily he will want to be down on terra firma himself and even make mud pies occasionally, but the clever wife will never glance after him, never seem to know aught of his mud pies or of anything else that he does while below her own supreme height of position. He enthroned her his queen when he put her on the high pedestal of wifehood, and it's strictly up to her to remain queen, too proud to stoop to or notice the fleshpots her husband may beguile himself with when his mood doesn't tend toward the celestial.

"His terrestrial pies may be confined to an occasional lunch or dinner with the 'jolly-good-fellow' woman who is always gay and smiling, but who may be the loneliest, saddest-hearted woman between the Battery and the Bronx; who may be so alone and so lonely that occasional invitations to lunch or dine are the only bits of sunshine in her gray, desolate life; or she may be a woman whom Fate has slapped so persistently and who has to struggle so hard for a living that a meal at some one else's expense is an item to be considered; who has no home, no husband, no children, no one who cares for her or for whom she may care; whose only glimpse of the Eden that every honest woman's heart hungers for is the charming picture of another woman's protected home life suggested by the dinner conversation of some husband who offers entertainment to a woman and then makes her a receptacle for the overflow of his domestic happiness and self-satisfaction. It is a fact that nine men out of ten will spend nine-tenths of the time they pass with other womsn in telling them of the virtues and accomplishments and general cleverness of their wives, what they do, where they go, whom they know, how much they spend for their gowns, how they manage their servants, and what estimable mothers they are. They discourse about their children likewise—how intelligent Mabel is and how smart Tom is, what exclusive schools they are enrolled at, how they hobnob with the children of the 'Four Hundred,' how much money they cost him, and so on, ad lib., to 'the other woman' who sits opposite and smiles and suffers in silence as she compares her own lonely, uncared-for, dssolate existence with the life of the woman who is a wife and mother.

"If every woman who jealously suspects her husband of finding pleasurs in lunching or dining with another woman could know how unfiringly throughout the meal he spouts his eulogy about 'My wife' and 'My boy Tom' and 'My littls girl,' she would smile serenely and feel never a pang from the demon with eyes of emerald hue. And if she realized how bored the other woman wss, and how unutterably stupid she considered the supposedly gay and frisky husband, she might indeed be furious—but not from jealousy.

"An instance of this occurred recently when a man of the 'bloated bondholder' type invited to a fashionable dining place a woman who, though brainy and brilliant and considered industrious, was desperately poor, and had been up against a stream of hard luck that seemed as interminable as Niagara. In consequence she was all to the bad in the way of gladraiment, but a well-ordered meal was a temptation not to be resisted.

"He ordered an elaborate dinner, with carefully explicit directions to the waiter as to just how he wanted a certain dish, and then he described glowingly how his wife prepared this particular viand and how much more palatable she made it than he had ever been able to get it in a restaurant. And he fairly puffed with pride as he told how, although they kept several servants, his wife would go herself into their kitchen to make his favorite dishes.

"'But she knows she won't lose anything by it,' he added complacently. 'I'm going to give her that to-morrow for her birthday,' and he exhibited a check for $300 to the woman opposite, who hadn't a five-dollar bill in the world.

"'Christmas,' he continued, 'I gave her the finest sables I could find in New York—ain't nothing too good for my wife, I tell you. And my little girl, Mabsl, is going to be just like her mother. Say, shs's the cutest kid you ever saw. She's just a year younger than her brother, but the way she makes him stand around is a caution. And Tom's as smart as chain lightning. Of course, I wouldn't encourage any son of mine in gambling or anything of that sort, but boys will be boys, and they've got to have their little fling. Well, by Jove, the other night, just as we were all sitting down to dinner, he came in with a hundred dollars he won on a hundred-to-one shot down at Bennings.'

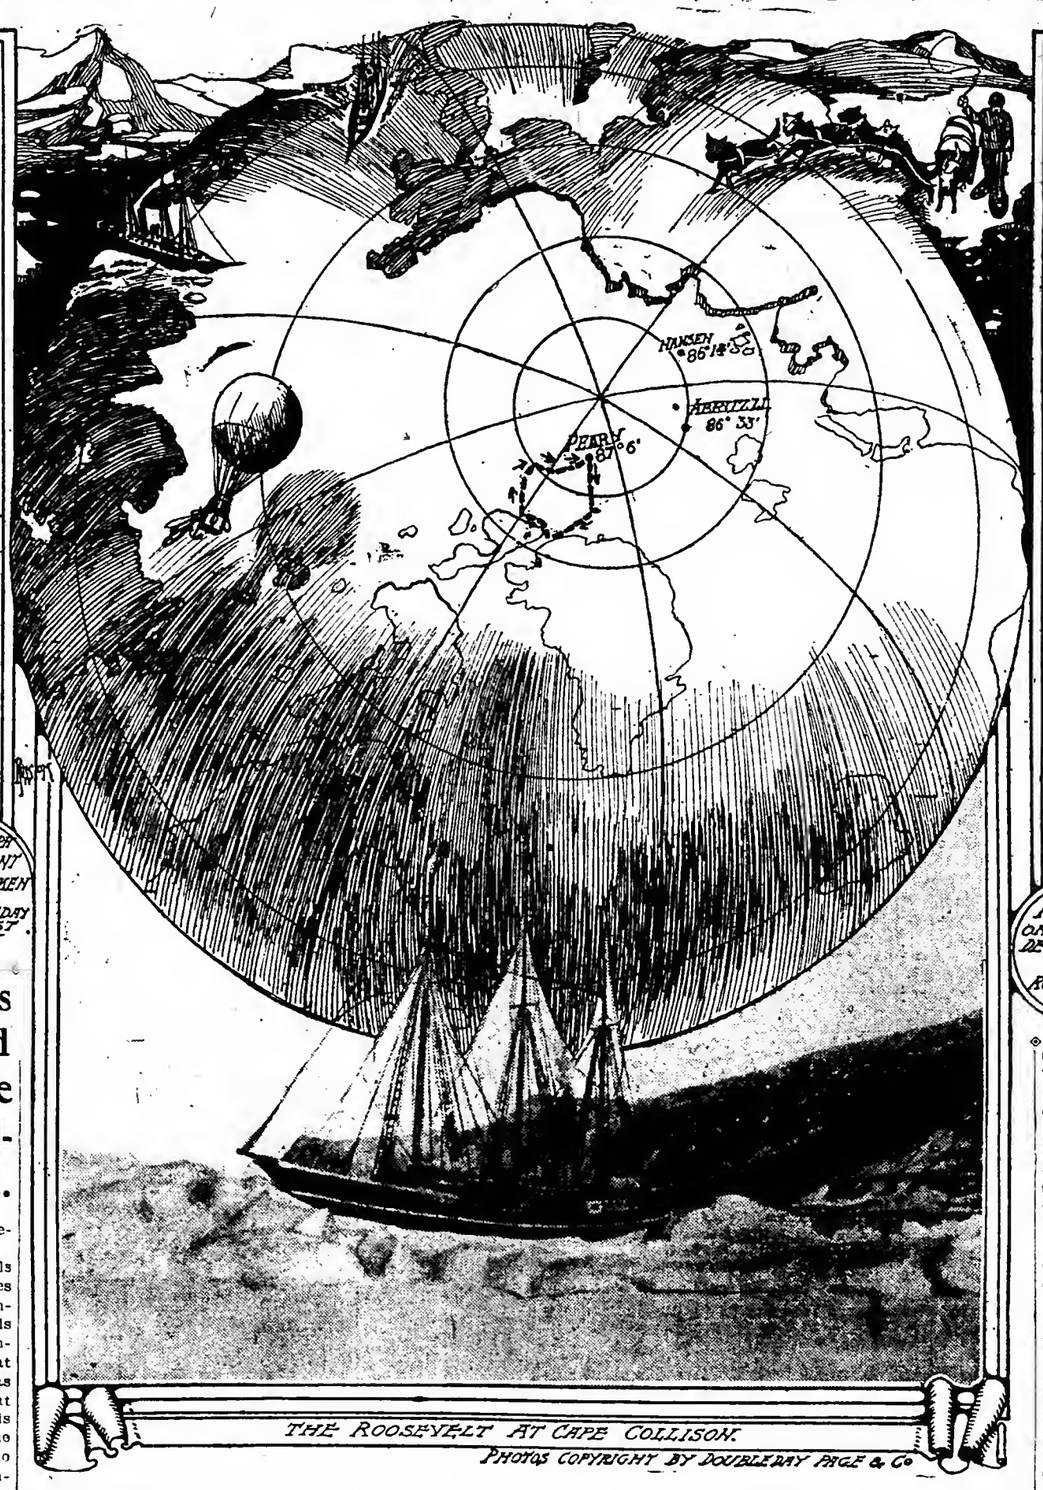
"And so the host of the occasion went on and on from the oyster cocktail to the cheese and demi-tasse, as pleased as Punch with himself and his companion and all the world because he had had an uninterrupted monologue about his wife and his children, his home, his plans for their future, and his ideas on training boys. When the dinner was all over and he was assisting the woman with her thin little jacket which was obviously all inadequate as a protection against the bitter cold of that particularly wintry night, he remarked:

"'Oh, my, you ought to have put on a warmer coat. You ought to see the fur-lined coat my wife wears, and her furs besides.'

"No, it isn't the wife who has cause to be jealous and envious; it's the woman on the outside."

WHY SEARCH LONGER FOR THE POLE?

A PHOTOGRAPH OF LIEUTENANT PEARY TAKEN ON WEDNESDAY OF LAST WEEK



THE ROOSEVELT AT CAPE COLLISON.

PEARY ON THE DECK OF THE ROOSEVELT

Largely a Matter of Sentiment, Says Commander Peary, but a Deed Worth Accomplishing for the Sake of National Prestige—Little Additional Knowledge Obtainable.

MR. JESUP'S announcement of my next expedition to the north pole leaves but little to be said. The Roosevelt this time is to have her entire boiler battery of the Scotch type. Other work upon her will be only the effecting of repairs and some slight changes in detail to add to her convenience.

"The plan of campaign, the route, the methods, will be practically the same as the last time. The expedition will start north the latter part of June if I succeed in raising the necessary funds for equipment and supplies."

Commander Peary made this, his first official statement, to me regarding his forthcoming expedition to the north pole, and he has supplemented it with the following interview, in which he touches upon some valuable and interesting points in connection with his last trip—the trip upon which he succeeded in planting the Stars and Stripes nearer the pole than has any other flag ever waved before.

Although almost constantly lecturing upon his exploratory experience to enthusiastic audiences all over the country, and having written a detailed account of his experiences in his new book, "Nearest the Pole," the Commander has by no means exhausted his stock of interesting information in his books or upon the lecture platform.

As the writer, the lecturer, the man who stands highest in the history of exploratory achievements, Commander Peary is a well-known figure in the public eye. As the informal, kindly gentleman with whom one may visit as with one's friends he is not so well known. It was in this latter light that the writer had the pleasure of seeing and hearing this remarkable man who has done more for America in polar exploratory achievement than has ever been done by any man for any other country.

Commander Peary is a man at once gentle and forceful. In his manner he is genial, responsive, and speaks and carries himself with a simple dignity which impresses one at once. Here, one feels, is a man who has seen and felt and lived among big things, a man who has wrestled with the elemental forces, whose perspective has been, as it were, limitless. He is reposeful, with the repose which comes to a man who has lived in the open—who has faced an infinity of land and sea and sky without so much as a leaf or a distant masthead to break the vast horizon. He speaks in a few words—but every word tells. He uses no extravagance, no superlative.

Northern Boundary of United States.

The first statement which Commander Peary made to me was so characteristic of, not only the man, but the American, that it most aptly prefaces this interview.

"The natural boundary of the United States on the north is the north pole—nothing else. In this last expedition I have brought the Stars and Stripes within two hundred miles of the pole, and I am fully persuaded that the conquest of those remaining two hundred miles will be the glory of the United States. The Roosevelt, in which my last voyage was made, is the first American ship built for arctic exploration. Constructed of American timber in an American shipyard, upon plans which were the result of American experience, fitted with American machinery, the Roosevelt went north by what is known as the American route, as a typical American entry in the great international race for the north pole. So far she holds the championship flag. She must not let go that flag, for its proper and permanent place is upon the same masthead from which flutter the Stars and Stripes."

To the question, What is the real motive, the biggest significance of reaching the pole? Commander Peary replied without hesitation:

"The attainment of the pole spells National prestige. For three centuries some of the best men in the best countries have devoted their lives to this quest and without success. The conquest of the north pole is the last great geographical prize which the world has to offer to adventurous man. For that reason I feel by every right that this great country of ours should be the winner. Once won there will be no future challenge. To the first conqueror belongs the spoils and the glory. Entirely regardless of any intrinsic value, the discovery of the pole will be as distinct a milestone in the history of the globe as was the discovery of America by Columbus."

Of Little Scientific Value.

But the scientific value of these explorations, I suggested, must be of inestimable importance. What has been gained, so far, in the cause of science?

"The efforts which have been carried on for the past three hundred years to find the pole," said Mr. Peary, "have resulted in securing a very large amount of scientific material and information and of greatly widening our geographical horizon. Still more important information is yet to be obtained from the remaining great unexplored area, and particularly in this case in connection with the polar sea, the hydrography of which is entirely unknown. And yet, without in any way desiring to detract from the value of such work and results, I feel that the great meaning of this conquest lies not in these. It is, rather, a matter of National sentiment; and the fact that the north pole is a trophy which the proudest nation in the world will be glad to win and wear looms very large to me."

And now for the question which the world is asking—which you have doubtless pondered—and perhaps found the answer to, I said:

"What lies beyond the point which you have reached?"

"And the answer to that question," replied Mr. Peary, "is not the one for which the world is looking. Nothing abnormal or surprising—no revelation of marvelous geological formations will be found. The conditions existing between the pole and the furthest point reached by me are not likely to be different from those found in the last stage of my journey. There will be no open Polar Sea, no Semmes hole giving access to the centre of the earth, no circular ice caps; in fact, no physical conditions perceptible to the senses outside of the well known fact that to an observer at the pole heavenly bodies travel horizontal paths.

"If there is land it will be similar to other arctic lands we know. If the pole is located in the Polar Sea the characteristics will be similar to the characteristics of other portions of the Polar Sea with which we are familiar. My personal impression is that land is not likely to be found at or in close proximity to the pole. But I should be very much pleased to find that my impressions were incorrect."

To what do you attribute the success of this expedition?—a question which naturally presents itself in connection with this last achievement of Peary's—brought this answer:

"The experience gained from fifteen years living in the far North was my most valuable asset. With the knowledge gained from my six previous expeditions I was able to avoid the thousand and one mistakes which are the inevitable lot of the novice. This, added to the knowledge gained in this trip, should bring me, next time, to the desired goal. The fundamental features in all my work which have contributed also in this instance have been the utilization of the Eskimo for the rank and file of my party, and the use of the Eskimo dogs for tractive power. In this last expedition I had, for the first time in my arctic work, a suitable ship for the purpose."

Eskimo Aid.

And this brings us to the Eskimo. Just how valuable an aid did you find him?

"One of the strongest points in my favor," answered Mr. Peary, "a point not previously possessed by any other white man, has been my ability to utilize the utmost efforts and the entire resources of this tribe of Eskimos in carrying out my campaign. My Eskimos were more than a mere source of information; they were friends." An added warmth and enthusiasm crept into Mr. Peary's voice. Here it was evident he was touching upon an intimate matter—a matter not of things and places, but of hearts and living beings—whom to mention stirred warm memories. "Friends—in the best, the test, sense. While to their ignorant and childlike minds the significance of my mission was a sealed book, they knew at least that I was bent upon a quest which was a matter of deep personal interest to me. For that reason they went with me into the unknowable, willing to face danger, even death, if I might, through their aid, realize my hopes. I have never witnessed greater loyalty, have never seen the sense of self more completely subjugated. Hundreds of miles through unknown waters and upon treacherous ice my faithful Eskimos have gone with me into regions as strange to them as to myself. Alone nothing could induce them to go beyond the border of their familiar regions; but with me as their guide, their 'father,' they went willingly and unquestionably as children.

"That the Eskimo is not without human emotions of family affection and the sense of mutual helpfulness is forcibly brought out in several ways—especially through certain customs of the country. While he leads an essentially animal life—the fundamental motives for existence being having enough to eat and be clothed with—he has the human mind and is capable of genuine emotions of joy and sorrow, which we might attribute to him. For instance, when an Eskimo mother dies her child is not allowed to live, but must be strangled, the theory being that so long as it needs the mother's special care it is kindness to the child to kill it rather than to allow it to struggle through its babyhood motherless. A cruel law, you say? When I tell you that the father does the strangling you will think it crueller still. And yet he suffers as keenly as an American father would. But like the stoic, he knows that it is to be, he is convinced that it is for the child's good, and that suffices. I have had the Eskimo fathers tell me of these experiences with the hot tears streaming down their cheeks.

"Another case which came to my notice showed the devotion of parents for an unfortunate child—a devotion which touched me deeply because it involved the patient care of a lifetime and actual deprivation. This son married and had his home, but rheumatism developed until he became helpless. His wife deserted him and married another man—one who could support her. His condition became worse, until he is now practically in a condition of living death. His entire body, excepting his neck and hands, is ossifying. When he became helpless his old parents took him back home and cared for him. Each day when it was pleasant they would carry him outside the hut in order that he might see the world go by—the Eskimo world on parade is, so you may imagine, a not over-gay or hilarious sight. But it was the one bright spot in poor Tahtarhrah's day. When I wanted his father to sell me his dogs for sledging purposes he refused because it would deprive him of the means to carry his helpless son about. Each time that I have gone North I have visited this faithful old couple. Each time the boy's condition is worse. They have no hope for his recovery, or his ever being other than a helpless invalid, demanding their constant care. But they are faithful—and will be to the end.

Interesting Burial Ceremonies.

"The Eskimos have very interesting ceremonies connected with their death and burial," said Mr. Peary, "and one sees strange sights in an Eskimoland graveyard. When an Eskimo dies his grave is not heaped with flowers, not even with iceland moss, nor is he laid away with the belief that there will be a resurrection of the body. There are no graves—that is, no openings in the ground, for, of course, the earth is too hard to be broken. Stone are heaped upon the body, and beside these stones is placed his sledge, to which his dogs are harnessed, then strangled. Upon the sledge are laid his canoe, his weapons, all his personal effects, and especially everything which may be needed for a journey. For he is some time going to come forth from the grave, and he will need all these things for his journey to the happy hunting ground. It is not a spiritual sphere to which he hopes to go, but a material one, where he will enjoy life in the same old way, with perhaps a little less trouble than the evil one and a little more of the joys of existence. When he emerges from the grave his dogs will come to life and stand ready to convey their master upon his heavenly journey.

When an Eskimo woman dies the same proceeding takes place. Her sewing outfit, all her personal effects, her household utensils, and the little iron lamp with its supply of blubber oil, are placed upon a clod beside the grave, and, with the dogs, they, too, await the resurrection of their mistress.

"Have the Eskimos no religion?" I asked. "Have they no recognition of a spiritual consciousness which will outlive the material sense of life?"

"Beyond a firm, though hazy, belief in a future happy hunting ground," answered Mr. Peary, "the Eskimos have no religion. They have no belief in a spiritual cause or God, but they seem to possess a keen and very alert consciousness of the devil—whom to propitiate is one of their unfailing duties. Being, like the poor, ever with them, the Eskimo thinks that the devil should be treated with diplomacy. Good angel, however, requires no such finessing, but is received and treated as an amiable and easy going guest, who, when he does come, is quite content to take his place without any special homage being paid him.

"They have no written language, hence there is no Bible. Their religion is, practically, a bundle of superstitions handed down by word of mouth."

I asked: "Would it be possible for an Eskimo to take any place in this country?"

"Were it not for climatic difficulties," answered Mr. Peary, "we would find in the Eskimo practical and efficient workers in this country. The women would make expert seamstresses. They are unusually capable, especially with their fingers. Their life necessarily makes them so, for in the far north one family must be self-supporting and independent of any other for food, clothing, house, or means of support. The man and his wife share in the duties of making and supporting the home in all its details.

"Were the men to come to this country and be put to work they would prove themselves experts in mechanical arts, for they are, like the Japanese, natural draughtsmen, skillful carvers, and possess infinite patience. All this goes to show that, given proper environment and opportunity, the Eskimos would make good and self-supporting citizens of the civilized world."

Results of Last Expedition.

I put my last question to Commander Peary, which was: "What were the results gained from this last expedition which previous expeditions failed to bring about?"

"I have discovered a hitherto unknown land northwest. I have also found unexpected ice conditions in the American half of the Central Polar Basin, conditions distinctly different from preconceived theories regarding it. The theory, for example, which the English expedition of 1876 advanced, that it was the 'eternally frozen sea,' to use their picturesque phrasing, I found incorrect; in fact, contrary to this, that the ice was very mobile and that it was constantly changing the position under the influences of the tides.

"So far as the discovery of the unexpected, the marvelous, goes, I am not looking for it, because I feel that it has already revealed itself to me. It is now simply a question of covering the remaining two hundred miles within the season when the Polar Sea is accessible. While I did not attain this hoped-for result on my last trip, it has been the most valuable one I have undertaken because I have gained through it the certainty of facts regarding this ever-alluring region of the frozen world which will, I hope, enable me to win the great prize itself."

Arab and Plug to Race Across the Continent

A RACE across the American continent between a pure Arab and a plain plug will be started in a few days from Silverton, Oregon. The goal is New York City. Homer Davenport, who is famous as a cartoonist, and now bidding for celebrity as a farmer and breeder, with a pure Arab stable, furnishes one steed, the chestnut stallion Nadjeran, between 11 and 12 years old and 14 hands 2 inches high. The United States Army furnishes two jockeys and the plug. Neither name nor statistics are forthcoming about the humble animal. The distance to be covered is 3,180 miles.

It was a long time before the public would believe that Homer Davenport had rather raise game chickens and run a farm than draw pictures of public men in suits checked with dollar signs. Likewise, when Davenport began to import Arab horses, people were slow to take him seriously. Nadjeran was his first importation, purchased by Davenport from Capt. Gainsford of the British Army, who brought him from the desert tents of the Bedouins to ride in polo matches. But when Davenport told that story about the desert tents of the Bedouins his friends cocked one eye. They told Davenport he had been basely betrayed by a British cousin, and that Nadjeran's only Arab characteristics were a misspelled name and a kink in his flag. Now this Davenport is a great, broad-shouldered fellow, slow in movement and slow to wrath, but when he does get his back up it is a serious matter.

He went to Turkey, got an audience with the Sultan, and jollied that sick ruler out of an irade, or a firman, or a dado, or something that sounds like that, which gave the bearer unusual prerogatives as a horse trader among the faithful. Thus equipped, and with a few bottles of the booze forbidden by the Prophet, the cartoonist sought the wily Arab chieftains in their suburban homes, out in the desert sub-divisions of Islam. He brought back from this expedition some animals which he, at least, believes are Arab horses. But this did not silence the gibes of the scornful. They told Davenport that the Koran strictly commands the good Mohammedan to spoil the unbeliever, and that the horses he had were discards from the stables of the Constantinople and Bosphorus Street Railway.

Then Davenport took his troubles to President Roosevelt, as is now the prerogative of any American citizen or father of triplets. Davenport said he wanted a test to demonstrate that his Arab steeds would meet all that was claimed for them by the press agent, and that he desired this test to be as official as possible. He thought it would be a valuable cavalry experiment to have a soldier ride Nadjeran across the continent. "Bully!" was the characteristic White House comment, and the proposition was passed along to Secretary Taft. He failed to see how Nadjeran could qualify as a mount in a Presidential race, and put it up to Gen. Bell, Chief of Staff, and himself a cavalryman of sorts. The General Staff pondered over it a bit and rendered the verdict that Davenport was doubtless working the Government for an advertising dodge, but that this need not deter the army from benefiting by this opportunity for a valuable cavalry experiment.

They have picked Lieut. E. R. Warner McCabe of the famous Sixth Cavalry to ride Nadjeran. McCabe caught the eye of Gen. Bell when the latter was the head and McCabe a student in the cavalry school. McCabe is 30 years old, a Virginian, born on horseback and devoted to the saddle. He is a lean, wiry, medium-sized chap, and both a quiet and a modest fellow. He will ride in full cavalry equipment, armed and carrying the regular amount of marching rations.

Quartermaster Sergeant Sam Peterson of K Troop, Sixth Cavalry, will be his companion. Peterson's mount will be the plug, which he will pick from the regular stock of the cavalry. The route will lie past frequent garrison posts, and if either the trooper or his plebeian mount is worsted by the Arab's pace there will be relays to relieve them. Grizzled old cavalrymen are willing to bet, however, that Peterson will pick a brute from the corral with "the mouth of a bell, a heart of hell, and a head like a gallows tree" that will canter past the wire neck and neck with the desert Arab. Officer and trooper will have the regular mileage allowance of the army. All other expenses of the test will be borne by Davenport.

McCabe will be a fairly busy man, quite aside from his riding. Gen. Bell has an idea that not enough statistics have been kept on such endurance rides as cavalry history records, and he is determined that the army shall miss nothing this time. He wants the weight and condition of horse and rider at the starting post, at the end of each day's lap, and at the finish; the amount of food consumed by both daily, and the kind; the time of starting and stopping each day's ride; the total periods of rest and travel for the trip; daily condition of the roads and weather, and topographical notes on the country covered. A Government clerk who heard this schedule of bookkeeping outlined privately suggested that secretaries a stenographers in an automobile accompany the party. The route will lie from Silverton, Oregon, to Portland, to Umadilla, Oregon; Boisé Barracks, Fort D. A. Russell, in Wyoming, Omaha, Des Moines, Indianapolis, Columbus, Harrisburg, and New York.

Davenport allows 75 days for the trip, while Gen. Bell believes it will take longer. Nasty weather is expected in the Rockies, but the plan is to have the finish beat oppressive hot weather, which would probably spoil the record.

The longest trip of this kind which is down in the books was a ride by Lieut. Bassov of the Russian Army from Hershoo, Manchuria, to St. Petersburg, which lasted from Sept. 14, 1905, to May 15, 1906, or eight months and three days. The officer rode the English stallion Mogol, a horse of the bluest blood. His orderly, Private Voladin, was astride of Rak, a horse from the cavalry remount stables owned by the Government. At times the riders encountered bitter weather, and ice cut the feet of the horses, while at other times the animals waded knee deep in mud. They were shod eight times on the trip, and finished in fine condition. The pace at first was slow, but it steadily quickened toward the finish. While some of the Russian officers probably broke this record getting back to Russia during the Japanese war, they kept no books on their rides. Bassov, of course, did not have the Japanese bayonets behind to prod him on.

It is understood that the army has stipulated on behalf of its riders in this test that Davenport shall draw no pictures of them. The sad experience of poor Rowan, now Major, who carried a message to Garcia, is remembered as an awful warning. Elbert Hubbard started out with the most kindly intentions to make Rowan famous. He did. The man who now mentions Garcia to Rowan has to fight. The General Staff does not intend to condemn the men it has now selected to such a fate as that.

If—

If all the "hellos" spoken over Greater New York telephone wires in one year were made into a single remark, it would not only be heard in London, but would provoke 2,639,957 unfavorable comments on the quality of the average American voice.

THE MEN WHO WILL BUILD THE PANAMA CANAL

Army officers may not be better engineers than the civilians who have been at work in the Zone, but they will not "quit" whether the job suits them or not.

What Col. Goethals, Major Gailard and Major Sibert, who have been selected for the work have already done to inspire public confidence in their efforts.

WHEN in the long ago the little wrens told their mother that the farmer in whose grain field they had their nest, at last despairing of getting his neighbors to cut the grain, and having been unable to hire men to do it, had declared to his sons that he and they would on the morrow come and cut it themselves, the old bird cocked her astute head to one side and told her little brood that they must prepare to move, for at last the farmer meant business.

And so there is now for the first time a real confidence that the wren, if there be any wrens there, and, if not, then the snakes and lizards and earthworms — perchance mosquitos — which have their homes in the pathway of the Panama Canal must prepare to take their abode somewhere else. For after waiting for something like half a century for his neighbors to dig a ditch across this Isthmus, and after then trying for some three years to hire servants to do it, the old farmer, sometimes affectionately called "Uncle Sam," has finally announced his intention to dig that ditch himself, with his own strong, right arm.

Uncle Sam has a strong right arm, strong, supple, well-disciplined, and energetic. Moreover, it is obedient, standing not only ready, but eager to do his work. This right arm is the army, and if he had put it to work digging this canal in the beginning there would not have been this long wandering in the wilderness and this widespread lack of confidence in the early completion of the work.

Work Now on Secure Basis.

It is not that the army engineers are abler men or abler engineers than civilian engineers that the American people, those of them who really appreciate the character of the work and the method of the army engineers, have more confidence that the canal now will be dug. George W. Goethals, David D. Gaillard, and William L. Sibert may not be better engineers than John F. Stevens or John F. Wallace. But Stevens and Wallace have quit. Wallace threw up the job in disgust and went back to railroading. The President did not like it, and he promptly elected Wallace a member of his famous Ananias Club. Still, Wallace quit. Stevens found the golf links in the Canal Zone bad, and he decided to hole out and drive off from another tee. The President did like that, apparently, for he made no protest, nor conferred any especial honor upon Stevens.

Again, Chairman Goethals may not be a better administrative and executive officer than Theodore P. Shonts. But Shonts has quit. He says he has a better job, and he is reported to have said that the Canal Zone is no place for a white man to live. Now, if Goethals, or Gaillard, or Sibert should find the golf links bad, or come to the conclusion that Panama is no place for a white man to live, or for any other reason or on any other account become displeased, discouraged, or disgusted, he will quietly communicate his dissatisfaction in the bosom of his family to his wife and a few of his intimate friends, and go on digging the canal with increased energy and determination so as to get through with it quicker that he may come home, or go somewhere else. If either of these three should quit, for any very good reason, like that of death or insanity, or some act "unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," he will be able to get back to this country without any great sensation, without an extra session of Congress, with but few double-column newspaper interviews, and without any brainstorms at the White House. The Chief Engineer of the Army will quietly detail another officer of his corps, who will take ths next steamer, go down, take up the work where it was left off, and continue digging the canal without any brass band.

No Appropriations Lobby.

And so, also, when Congress makes an appropriation for the canal work, these army engineers will have a conference, decide exactly how this money is to be spent during that year for the furtherance of the work, and then proceed to spend it. When called upon to make estimates of the amount needed for the next year they will make the estimates, stating exactly how much will be needed to do a certain portion of the work. Congress will appropriate about two-thirds of the amount necessary, and then Col. Goethals and his two assistants will go ahead, cut out one-third of the work proposed, and do the other two-thirds, then make their report. They will not send back to Washington any lobby to urge that more money be given. They will not wire or write to their friends in Congress urging more money or urging anything else. They will just quietly do what is told them to do—no more, no less. This is what they have been trained to do, and what they have been accustomed to do.

Engineers working for railroads or other corporations have been accustomed to do quite differently. A railroad engineer is accustomed to have the President of the road, and possibly a small Board of Directors, tell him to make an estimate of the cost of a certain piece of work, the whole cost. If the President and the Board of Directors decide to do it, they tell the engineer to go ahead and do it. He is assured that the money will be forthcoming; when he gets out of the money given him at one particular time he calls for more, and he doesn't have to wait until Congress meets to get it. When army engineers are directed to make estimates they make the estimates; and if they are told to do the work they begin it with what money they have, generally spreading out the work to cover the year till Congress may meet again and make another appropriation. When the money gives out they stop and wait.

Civilian engineers, like Wallace and Stevens, for instance, are not accustomed to this kind of thing, nor are they accustomed to other kinds of things which army officers have to put up with and are schooled to put up with. Civilian engineers who have been working for corporations or private parties are not accustomed to having Congressional committees or Congressional junketing parties come down, inspect their work, and go back home, making campaign speeches or writing campaign literature about it. The ins nd outs of politics, the ups and downs, the many-sided and much-varying kaleidoscopic viewpoints of politicians who are bosses, or think they are bosses, of all Government officials, cause men like Stevens and Wallace to chaff and fume, and, perchance, to "cuss." Army engineers are quite used to it. They cuss, too, but not for publication, and they know full well that it will not avail, so they turn it into a smile, or a grin, and go on. They are quite accustomed to criticisms, and quite accustomed to bear blame or shift it upon somebody else, quite accustomed to taking orders from the powers that be, without regard to personalities or parties.

These are, in brief, the reasons why the Administration has at last done what it ought to have done at first, put the digging of the canal into the hands of he army engineers. Of the army engineers, bear in mind, for while the personalities of the three men selected from the corps of engineers is naturally and necessarily an important factor, the principal thing is that the work is directed by the Engineer Corps, yet it is with the personalities of these men, though in relation to the whole corps of engineers, that this story must deal. The assignment of this man to the work on the Panama Canal was made in precisely the same manner other assignments are made in the army. Of course, ordinarily men are not selected for any specific work unless they seem to the authorities which appoint them to have qualifications for the work.

Col. George W. Goethals, then Major, was selected to be engineer-in-chief and Chairman of the Canal Commission, not only because of his engineering experience and his ability as a practical engineer, but because of his well-known administrative and executive ability. For three years past he has been a member of the General Staff, and though he has not been a member of the Canal Commission nor assigned to duty in any way connected with the canal work, he has been frequently consulted about it, and twice he has been offered the position of Assistant Engineer. He went to Panama on the trip with Secretary Taft, inspected the work, advised concerning it, and did much toward collecting information in regard to the Canal, for the Secretary of War and the President, and he has aided materially in the preparation of many of the executive communications upon this subject.

Col. Goethals is a tall, straight, commanding looking man. His hair is white, though he is but fifty years old. The President said that he wanted to put men in charge of this work who would be old enough to have had ample experience and young enough to complete the Canal before they die or have reached the age of retirement. Col. Goethals is the senior in years, as he is the senior in service and in rank, and he is young enough to complete the work. But he is younger in strength than he is in years. Thirty-one years of army discipline has made him a man vigorous physically and mentally. And he keeps his nerve with him all of the time. Whether or not the life of army officers in general is a life of ease, as it is often reputed to be, this is certainly not true of the engineer corps, for if there is an active set of men in this country it is the engineer corps of the army. They do not sit around and wait for war. Their work is in time of peace, and not only preparing for war, but preparing for the pursuits of peace.

As is well known, the great river and harbor works of the country are in their charge. Col. Goethals has then had plenty to do, and, doing it systematically, as must be done in the army, he has profited by it himself, and even though fifty years old he is in strength and vigor and in the life before him, younger than Dr. Osler's forty-year dead line. Whether or not Col. Goethals is one of those born to command, he has been trained to command, and one cannot look into his clear blue eyes, his strong, muscular face, and study his spacious overhanging brow without feeling that he is in the presence of one whose will must be obeyed by those under his command, and that, so far as possible, the forces of Nature themselves will be numbered among these.

George W. Goethals started out in life to be a physician. Thus his early instincts were those of a fighter. It was while he was at Columbia University, or, rather, King's College, as it was then, preparing himself to fight the weaknesses and ailments of human flesh, that the distinguished and picturesque "Sunset" Cox, representative in Congress from New York, determined to make a different kind of fighter out of him, and secured for him an appointment to West Point. He graduated there in 1880, high enough in rank to receive his commission in the engineers, in which he has since been fighting the forces of Nature. Eminently successful has he been. Yet there has been nothing particularly conspicuous or dramatic, certainly nothing specially romantic or striking about his career. He has always been known as a man of the soundest judgment, a man who begets confidence by the strength of his character rather than by the flash of it. Immediately upon graduation from West Point, he was assigned on special duty at the Academy, and after several interim assignments went again to the Academy as an assistant Professor of civil and military engineering, from 1885 to 1888. His chief construction work has been in the Tennessee River, below Chattanooga, where he was stationed between 1891 and 1894, and at Newport, R. I., where he had charge of the river and harbor work and the fortifications from 1900 to 1903.

The work on the Tennessee River Col. Goethals had charge of when he was a Captain. This was in 1891. He first encountered some large obstructions in the river at a place called "The Suck," a few miles below Chattanooga. The river formed a series of rapids separated by pools, formed by bars of gravel, boulders, and detached and solid rock. Capt. Goethals removed these obstructions by blasting and dredging, then built the canal 14½ miles long, 70 to 120 feet wide, and 6 feet deep around Big Muscle Shoals. In this canal were nine locks.

Capt. Goethals had much experience along this river in the construction of canals, and he undertook and carried out several projects which previous engineers had considered impracticable. The most important of these were the Colbert and Bee Tree Shoals, which formed the principal obstructions to navigation during the low water stages. A lateral canal on the south bank of the river had to be constructed. Other engineers who had been in charge of this work proposed to construct this with two locks, but Goethals, after an examination and a series of tests, came to the conclusion that it would be feasible with only one, and, contrary to the advice of all other engineers, he put the canal through with one lock. So successful was he in this work on the Tennessee River that he was taken to Washington to become the assistant to the Chief Engineer. Here he was in 1898.

When the war broke out, he, like all the other officers in the army, or most of them, had the "go-to-the-front" fever. He secured an appointment as Lieutenant Colonel of Volunteers and was made Chief Engineer of the First Army Corps. But he did not get to go to the front, much to his disappointment. In October they sent him to West Point with a battalion of engineers. Here he remained for two years, when he was put in charge of the river and harbor works and the fortifications around Newport, R. I. During this period he had charge of the works of the defense of the southeast coast of Massachusetts and Rhode Island, of the harbors of Hyannis and Nantucket, New Bedford, Vineyard Haven, Fall River, Mass.; Newport, Block Island, Great Salt Pond Harbor, and the entrance to Point Judith Pond, R. I.; Wood's Hole Channel, Mass., and the construction of the Harbor of Refuge at Point Judith. He also had charge of the improvements of all the rivers in that territory, including the construction of bridges. He has served as a member of a number of important boards, including, as already mentioned, the Taft Board to inspect the Panama Canal Zone.

Secretary Taft was very anxious from the beginning of the canal work that Col. Goethals should be associated with it. The reason that he did not accept the position of Assistant Engineer, which would have been a great honor to him, carrying with it additional pay and the further inducement that he should become Chief of the Engineer Corps, was that, after closely studying the Panama Canal territory and the subject of the canal, he did not approve of Mr. Stevens's plan, and he said so. He said it very frankly. Here is where he used his nerve, of which he has enough to get along with.

If Col. Goethals's experience in practical engineering had been deficient, the other two engineers who have been assigned to duty with him would make up for this in the wide range of their experience in practical work.

Major David Du Bose Gaillard, the second engineer in charge, is a native of South Carolina. He is the youngest looking of the three. But Major Gaillard's career has been exceedingly varied. In fact, scarcely any officer in the army has had as varied an experience or has been intrusted with so many important Government commissions as Major Gaillard. And all these commissions have been of a peculiar character. He graduated at West Point in 1884, when he received his commission, but not once since that time has he been with a regiment or a battalion except during the Spanish War, when he was Colonel of an engineer regiment.

Major Gaillard is a rather slim man, and though he is forty-eight years old, or will be in September, he doesn't look to be over thirty-five. Like the other army officers, he is well preserved, though he has seen stern service. He has been very nearly everywhere that an army officer is ever sent, either in peace or in war, except to the Philippine Islands.

His career has been a more picturesque one, perhaps, than either of the other two engineers. He has been engaged on many very interesting missions. He had been out of West Point but a few years, having been a teacher in the Engineer School of Application and an assistant on the St. John's River jetties and other river and harbor work in Florida, when he was appointed in 1891 by the President one of the three Commissioners to make the boundary line between Mexico and the United States from El Paso, Texas, to the Pacific Ocean. Major Gaillard, then Lieut. Gaillard, had many interesting and romantic experiences while engaged in this work—riding horseback five or six hundred miles on the stretch, camping in the desert with one or two companions, and getting on familiar terms with jackrabbits, coyotes, and Mexicans. When he completed this work he was personally complimented in a State paper by the Secretary of State. Then he was ordered on duty in the construction of fortifications and a sea wall at Fort Monroe.

One of the most valuable works on which Major Gaillard has been engaged is the Washington Aqueduct, though his connection with it and the valuable work which he did are appreciated by only a few, because, as said above, army engineers are accustomed to doing things without press agents or brass bands. He was but a First Lieutenant when he was put in solo charge of this work, and it was he who had charge of constructing the Great Falls dam and of cleaning out, for the first time since its construction, the conduit.

He went from Washington to Alaska upon an important secret work of the Government, the exact nature of which does not appear in the army orders, and is not generally known, even among Major Gaillard's most intimate friends, because it had some relation with the international complications between this country and England. Nominally, and as the order reads, he was sent there upon work on the Portland Channel. After the completion of this work, for which he was highly complimented by the Secretary of War, he was put on the staff of Gen. Wade, and served at Tampa and at Chickamauga. During the war with Spain Major Gaillard recruited and organized the Third United States Volunteer Engineers and became Brevet Colonel of that regiment, remaining so until the regiment was mustered out in 1899. His regiment was sent to Cuba just at the close of the war, and he was placed in charge of the Department of Santa Clara, Cuba.

Among the most important, though perhaps less spectacular, sanitary works done in Cuba were those done under the direction of Major Gaillard. He took charge of the sanitary work in Cienfuegos, Matanzas, and other cities of Cuba. The work which he did there stands as a monument to the efficiency and the strength of the man, as well as to the credit of the country. Many columns have been written about how Gen. Leonard Wood cleaned up Havana. Very little has been said about how Major Gaillard cleaned up Cienfuegos and Matanzas. Gen. Wood was Colonel of the Rough Riders, which, as the world knows, had a very efficient corps of press agents. The Third Engineers had no press agent, but it had a man at the head of it, and this man was educated and trained in the regular army, and was not accustomed to press agents or the blowing of the horn to announce to the world what he had done. No reflection is meant upon Gen. Wood. Perhaps Major Gaillard should have had a press agent.

Some very important as well as dramatic work was done by the Third Regiment under Col. Gaillard. It was chosen by Gen. James H. Wilson to disarm at midnight and place under arrest the members of the Sixth Virginia Colored Volunteer Infantry at Macon, Ga., in 1898. The negro troops were mutinous and on the rampage generally, and proposed to shoot up the town of Macon, somewhat similar in manner to the way the troops of the Twenty-fifth Infantry shot up Brownsville. Col. Gaillard took his regiment out at midnight, surrounded the negro regiment, and took their guns away from them, put the whole regiment under arrest, and kept it there for thirty days without arms of any description. The negro regiment was then mustered out of service. Senator Foraker being engaged on something else at that particular time did not ring the fire alarm, and very little was heard about it, but it was done, and Major Gaillard was the man who did it.

Lake Superior Improvement Work.

After his volunteer regiment was mustered out Major Gaillard was again assigned to the Washington Aqueduct, but was soon appointed Assistant Engineer Commissioner of the District of Columbia. He was placed in entire charge of the Water, Sewer, and Building Departments. In 1901 he was ordered to Duluth and placed in charge of all river and harbor improvements on Lake Superior. Here it is worthy of mention, he completed the largest dredging contract ever let by the United States Government, taking out over twenty-one million cubic yards.

Major Gaillard is also one of the closest students in the army, and one of the most scholarly. For years he devoted his attention to the subject of wave action. The results of his studies were a few years ago published by the Government as one of the "professional papers of the Corps of Engineers" under the title of wave action. This work attracted wide attention. Engineers throughout many countries of the world have written letters to him about it. He also prepared a number of papers for various engineering societies, and is one of the foremost authorities on certain phases of engineering. Before becoming a member of the General Staff years ago he was one of the professors in the War College at Washington. Thus this engineer has had all sorts of experiences. In every one of his many commissions he has acquitted himself with such signal ability, given such eminent satisfaction to the authorities which appointed him, that he is known as a man fitted for great undertakings.

Major Sibert a "Soo" Canal Man.

William L. Sibert hails from Alabama. It is a singular coincidence that he and Major Gaillard entered West Point in the same class and were graduated together. While at West Point they were roommates. Both being graduated among the first five, they were assigned to the Engineers. Major Sibert's most conspicuous service as engineer is that which he has just rendered, and which he left to take up the new work. He was in charge of the Pittsburg district of the river and harbor work. But he has had more to do with canal construction on a large scale than either of the other two, having been one of the engineers in charge of the construction of the great Sault Ste. Marie Canal across the Michigan peninsula. This is the greatest canal work which heretofore the United States Government has undertaken, and it is for his connection with this work, in large part at least, that Major Sibert is now a member of the Canal Commission.

Major Sibert is distinctively a practical aquatic engineer. He has a great faculty for governing men, and for the tactful management of affairs where a large number of men is concerned. He is a large, strong man, a giant almost, with a big body and a big head. He is very genial, easily approached, affable in his manner, and frank in his expressions. But he is a commander of men, and especially insistent that every man under him shall do his duty. He is kind but firm.

Major Sibert, just after being graduated from West Point, was made the recorder of the Board of Engineer Officers on a bridge at Cincinnati, across the Ohio River. Afterward he held a similar position on another bridge across the Ohio at Louisville. He was then a member of the board on the construction of a bridge across the Green River. Next he was in charge of improvements on the Green and Barren Rivers, in Kentucky.

Topographical Survey of the Philippines.

He was in charge of the construction of one-half of the great ship canal, the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, connecting the waters of the great lakes, and his work on this was so conspicuously successful that he was immediately stamped one of the great executive engineers of the army. He was then sent to the Philippine Islands on the staff of Gen. Schwann. He was in command of a company of engineers working in connection with the army of Gen. Otis at the same time. Among the most important works done by the army in the Philippine Islands perhaps the most lasting was that of the topographical survey. Major Sibert made very complete maps of all the territory round about Luzon. Up to that time there were very beautiful maps, drawn by very fancy draughtsmen in the Spanish Army. For hanging on the walls and for exhibition in the museums, schools, and elsewhere, and for framing in the souvenir galleries of army officers, these maps were very excellent; but for giving anything like an accurate idea of the country which they purported to describe they were absolutely worthless. Major Sibert replaced these by the only serviceable maps which had up to that time been made of the territory about Luzon.

The army officers, those in command in the Philippines, say that Major Sibert's ability as an engineer, his captivating and impressive personality, and his general resourcefulness as an army officer, made him a most valuable factor in the prosecution of the Philippine campaign. "He was my right-hand man," says Gen. Schwann.

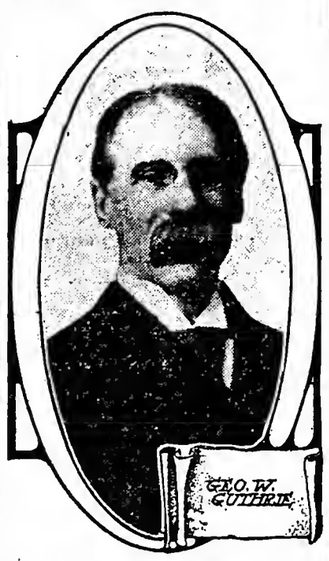
Major Sibert is one of those men who seem made for responsibilities. He is not afraid of responsibility, and he does not try to shift it upon the shoulders of others. Last Spring, while he was in charge of the work on the Allegheny River, it will be recalled that a dangerous flood threatened the factories along the river near Pittsburg. There was a Government dam just above one of these factories. There was great fear on the part of the owners of the property and those who lived in the vicinity. Major Sibert saw that the property could be saved only by removing the dam. Ordinarily an army officer or any other official on the scene would have taken the matter up with headquarters. A quite extensive telegraphing and telephoning, or a going to and fro, with much confabulation, would have resulted, the flood would have risen and the factory would have been destroyed, with probably a large number of lives. Major Sibert did not telegraph to anybody. He simply ordered his men to stick a few chunks of dynamite underneath the dam and blow it up. It was an $80,000 dam, but he saved several million dollars' worth of property. Congress immediately made an appropriation for rebuilding the dam; it might have been called upon for an appropriation to repay the factory corporation if the dam had not been destroyed. The work on the rivers about Pittsburg is one of the most difficult as well as one of the most important of all the river and harbor work of the Government. The fact that Major Sibert was put in charge of it is a tribute to his ability, and he has carried it out with such success that the only regret that the engineer chiefs had when he was assigned to the Panama Canal was the great loss which the Pittsburg district must suffer.

Pittsburg a Much Abused Town, Says Mayor Guthrie.

Most of the Recent Notoriety, He Thinks, is Due to the Behavior of People Who Are Not Really Pittsburgers.

MAYOR GEORGE W. GUTHRIE of Pittsburg regrets that the outside world at present appears to look only at the rougher or seamy side of Pittsburg. In an interview with a TIMES reporter a few days since the Mayor expressed himself freely regarding the criticism which has recently been directed against his city.

"Pittsburg needs no defender, nor will I pose as one defending the city of my birth, for she has nothing of which she should be ashamed," said Mr. Guthrie. "I am satisfied that New York and other cities are inclined to take a wrong view of Pittsburg, but that is because they do not look at both sides.



If they but knew Pittsburg and real Pittsburgers as I know them, as all true Pittsburgers know Pittsburg, such would not be the case."

It was suggested to Mayor Guthrie that within the past few years there have been certain people from Pittsburg who have done things which do not reflect credit to the city, persons who have become notorious, in fact.

"Yes; that is true," replied the Mayor. "But a great proportion of those who have done these things are not real Pittsburgers—never were real Pittsburgers. Persons have come to Pittsburg from other points, have remained here some time, have made a lot of money, and then they went elsewhere to spend it. They have spent it in their own way. Perhaps their way has not been to their credit or to the credit of the city in which they made their money, but I ask, in all fairness, should their deeds or misdeeds be charged against the fair name of Pittsburg? They are not real Pittsburgers. They are not of the people who made Pittsburg and who love the city and who are jealous of her good name. And yet the proportion of those who have done these things is so small that it is a matter of wonder.

"There have been cases where men of obscure position in Pittsburg by a turn of Fortune's wheel became very wealthy. It is small wonder that a small percentage of such lose their heads for a time. I will cite one case. A man well known to me began as a poor boy and spent the best part of his life poor—at least, not wealthy. He became rich in a very short time when a certain opportunity presented. There had never been a time in his life when he had dreamed of having so much money. His wealth was now beyond his wildest dreams. He went abroad for a time to see something of the world, and when he returned some time later he found that in his absence his fortune had increased $6,000,000, and he was now worth $7,000,000. A lucky turn in consolidation of interests had turned the golden stream into a torrent. This man did nothing wrong, but is a credit to Pittsburg. I ask those who are and have been criticising Pittsburg if it would be any wonder that the head of this man might have been lost for a time.

"I admit there are instances where real Pittsburg people have done what is not right, both at home and in other cities, but what city can show a cleane record than Pittsburg in this respect?" continued his Honor. "I maintain that Pittsburg is as clean as any city in the country, and it can be proved to any one who doubts it. There is no city in the world that has not its percentage of persons who do wrong, and while Pittsburg is no exception the city is as clean morally as any other city of which I have knowledge. That a few persons should do wrong should not be held up against the city."

"Do you not believe that persons from places other than Pittsburg give their residence as Pittsburg when they go to New York?" was asked.

"Yes; and in this way Pittsburg gets credit, rather discredit, for deeds of many who do not belong to Pittsburg," replied the Mayor. "Not that those who say they are from Pittsburg mean wrong in so declaring, but they come or go from all parts of the great industrial district which is known as Pittsburg and they call Pittsburg their home, and if they should happen to do wrong we see startling headlines in the newspapers, 'Another Pittsburg Millionaire Goes Wrong,' or something equally ridiculous. The chances are that the man is not from Pittsburg in the first place, and in his home town he may not be well known even. In addition to this, I am convinced that even trivial doings of Pittsburgers away from home are magnified and distorted."

The Mayor's attention was called to the publication some time ago of a table showing that Pittsburgers spent in New York yearly about $10,000,000. This table was compiled from figures furnished by the Pittsburg Chamber of Commerce and the Merchants and Manufacturers' Association, and were supposed to be as nearly accurate as such figures could be furnished.

"I don't know about that," replied he. "I suppose, however, that, taking in all towns in the industrial district which is known as Pittsburg by the outside world, this amount of money may be spent in New York each year. I am told that Pittsburgers pay more for their goods in New York than any one else, too."

"Have you any positive information on this line, Mr. Guthrie?"

"No; nothing more than that I have been told by New York people that they would not enter New York stores in company with Pittsburg people, with persons known to the store people as coming from Pittsburg, because the prices would be run up on them. Understand me that I do not wish to appear as making any charge against New York shopkeepers of running up prices against Pittsburg people, but I have been so told by New York people. It would seem that New York interests have the idea that there are but two classes of Pittsburg people—millionaires and day laborers.

"But, oh, what an injustice has been done Pittsburg!" said Mayor Guthrie in conclusion. "There is here the class of people who make cities and sustain them—the honest, God-fearing people who attend to their own business and gather around the fireside in the evening with their families. They are quiet, and I sometimes feel that it would be better if they were more assertive. That a few should do wrong either at home or abroad should not be allowed to condemn a city which is full of honest, loyal, decent, hard-working people."

Signs that Cause a Smile.

AS a rule, nothing is more monotonous than the signs on business houses. But among them are some distinctly out of the ordinary. Downtown, not far from Broadwsy, the name on a sign will make passers by pause and smile. And is another sign that attracts attention, with its suggestion of fraternal harmony in business.

Other men have unconventional businesses or unconventional methods of divulging them to the public. One of these says on his sign that he is a which variegated vocation is certainly beyond the abilities of the ordinary business man. A clothier far away on the West Side, where one might suppose he would be slightly out of touch with the march of fashion, proudly announces himself, nevertheless, to be an "Originator of Styles" and "Leader of Fashion." And an enterprising storekeeper in the same part of town lays claim to the distinction of being

> The Lowest Man in Town.

Another, who runs a railrosd barber's shop, has a sign in the waiting room reading thus:

> Hair Cut While You Wait.

> Clothier to His Majesty, the American Citizen.

He certainly deserves the patronage of the Jingo element. And a downtown restaurant man, who probably dallies with Elizabethan literature, astonishes passers by with this sign:

> A Place to Eate and Drynke.

But some are not only unacquainted with Elizabethan English, but have difficulty in the mazes of the English of today. One of these, who has a small lunchroom, tells you that he dispenses

> Unsurpassing Coffee,

while, in the East Broadway region, a tailor recently hung out a sign reading,

"The name of this place will soon be changed from The Boys' Outfitting Store to The Puerile Clothing Company."

But among all the original signs of the city, none surpasses in interest this fearless and inviting Brooklyn product:

> Kick The Printer.

ODDS AND ENDS.

A country parson, says London Health, went to preach in an old remote rural parish. The sexton in taking him to the place of worship remarked:

"I hope your riv-rince won't mind preachin' from the chancel. Ye see, this is a quiet place, and I've got a duck sitting on fourteen eggs in the pulpit."

If you find it difficult to remove the glass stopper of a bottle, briskly rub the neck of the bottle with a woolen rag. This friction will cause the neck of the bottle to expand so that it will be easy to remove the stopper.

THE SEASON'S DRAMA

Increase in the Production of Serious Plays as Contrasted with the Lighter Forms---The Popularity of Melodrama---Defects in the Theatrical Situation.

PRACTICALLY speaking, the present month will put an end to the season of play producing. The big guns have all been tired, and there will only remain the desultory fire of dramatic small arms. A few more productions will be made before the shutters go up on the theatrical shops, but the more important of them will belong more to the history of the season to come than to the one that is now closing, that is to say, if they are to have a history at all. For they will be more in the nature of experiments with plays designed for longer runs next year.

Managers know that at this season of the year even an extraordinary success holds out little hope for continued business. For in competition with balmy Spring days and warm Summer nights, with roof garden breezes, and ocean spray, indoor amusements are sure to suffer. Occasionally a house may manage to keep its doors open throughout the Summer, for a phenomenal successful play, such, for example, as Mr. Klein's "The Lion and the Mouse," has been known to upset all calculations based on previous experience, and run in spite of elemental competition. But that is the exception, not the rule.

It has been a season of drama rather than of the lighter forms of amusement to which last year's record was almost wholly given. We have had a quota of musical comedy, there has been some farce and something of burlesque, but the mainstay of the season has consisted of plays that were serious by intention, if not always so serious in actual contemplation. In this fact those who look for encouraging signs may see their best reasons to hope. The productions of drama, taking the word in its larger sense to include comedy and farce, have outnumbered those of musical comedy some three to one. A year or two ago the proposition was reversed. Surely here is something to be thankful for. But let us not be over-exuberant.

The radical defect in our system still remains. We have not a single theatre in New York devoted to a definite policy of production, not a single house which maintains a company of resident artists, capable of appearing in a varied repertoire and devoting their energies to what, for want of a better term, may be called the intelligent drama. I pointed out this defect last week, and suggested one possible remedy. It is a vital defect in our dramatic system, and the need it involves must be remedied sooner or later. But who is to be the pioneer in the movement? One must call it that, though the word at once suggests fads and propaganda, and in such a theatre fads and propaganda have no place. It must be a catholic institution, but there must be limitations to its catholicism.

There is another question which must be considered before the matter of striking a balance on actual results is reached. As we have no theatre with a specific policy of play production, so our dramatists thus far have failed to exhibit any definite, cohesive, centralizing influence. Apparently with most of them it is hit or miss along the line of least resistance, the resistance in this case taking the form of managerial prejudice. We have rising young American dramatists who are a credit to themselves and the community, and we have a small but interesting list of dramatists who have already risen; but we have, so to speak, no distinct or clearly defined line of effort in our drama. Even "The Great Divide," considered by many the best play of the season, fails to develop any specifically National characteristics, though its characters, superficially, and its scenes are American. Mr. Broadhurst's "The Man of the Hour," without having either the weight or the informed technical excellence of Mr. Moody's play, is superior to it in this one respect, that it does reflect something of general National thought and action.

I recognize the informed psychology of Mr. Moody's play, but I cannot regard its problem or the method of its working out as normal to our people. It is a drama of the school of Ibsen transferred to new soil, or, rather, it is such in those portions which justify the higher praise. The premise upon which all its argument rests is melodrama, and melodrama of an extreme type. No Bowery thriller ever made a stronger tug upon the probabilities, if not the actual possibilities, than the motive situation of its first act.

And yet in the success of "The Great Divide," and that of some other plays that I shall presently mention, one must find the hope upon which the future is to build. Whatever it may or may not be, "The Great Divide" is certainly a thoughtful play, by which I do not mean a play that has required thought on the part of its author—even the worst of them frequently do that—but a play that, to be enjoyed at all, requires some sort of mental effort on the part of the beholder.

The season that is just closing has been fairly rich in such plays. It has been infinitely richer than was the season of 1904-1905, and it has an added interest in the fact that it carries forward very admirably the promises of better results built on the improved conditions observable in 1905-1906. Taken, by and large, the showing for the period just at an end, rests on a generally higher plane. We have had no such pure creation of the imagination as "Peter Pan," for instance, but we have had Peter with us for a spell, so that if he does not actually belong to the record of the season he has managed to make himself part of it. We have had interesting experiments with the poetic drama, notably Mrs. Le Moyne's productions of "Pippa Passes," "Colombe's Birthday," and "A Blot in the Scutcheon," and we have had actual results in the production by Miss Marlowe and Mr. Sothern of Mr. Percy Mackaye's beautiful tragic poem of "Jeanne D'Arc."

At this point one recalls, too, the visit of H. B. Irving, one of the very few foreign artists to visit us during the season, and whose coming was signalized by the production of Stephen Phillips's "Paolo and Francesca." To Mr. Irving, too, we were indebted for our first view of M. Picard's delightful little play "Mouricette," a conspicuous comedy success of the season among the imported novelties. And since I am dealing with plays and actors from across seas the paragraph may be rounded out with a mention of other importations of importance. The presence of Johnstone Forbes-Robertson lent distinction to several weeks of the dramatic season. It is a matter of regret that Mr. Robertson did not return for other appearances here, and New York has been denied the opportunity of again seeing him in "Hamlet" and of judging his Shylock, a privilege accorded to Boston. But Signor Novelli gave us something more than a taste of his quality, enough of a taste, indeed, to enable us to place him more definitely when he returns again. He is not, as has been claimed, the greatest actor in the world, but he is a remarkably versatile and interesting player, whose comedy and character acting may be freely commended. His repertoire, including much that was familiar, was notable for its variety. To him we are especially indebted for the first sight of Goldoni's merry little piece, "Il Burbero Benefico." Our theatre gets little Italian drama, but to Goldoni we may now add Bracco, in whose play "Infidele," none too happily named "Countess Coquette," Mme. Nazimova is now playing. Of other foreign plays, in adaptations that one recalls with hesitation, there were "La Piste" of Sardou, played by Miss Harned under the title of "The Love Letter," and "Les Bonheur Madames," otherwise "Barbara's Millions," which provided the opportunity for a brief experiment in comedy sans music on the part of Miss Lillian Russell. Arthur Schnitzler's "The Reckoning," in which Miss Katherine Grey came forward successfully, introduced a German dramatist practically new to our stage.

Of English plays, other than those of Mr. Shaw, who was represented by "Widower's Houses," in addition to "Caesar and Cleopatra" already mentioned, and "Captain Brassbound's Conversion," the conspicuous ones have been Mr. Pinero's "His House in Order," certainly a notable work, despite some shortcomings, which I discussed at length at the time of its production, and Henry Arthur Jones's "The Hypocrites," which we had the peculiar distinction of viewing prior to its representation in the dramatist's own country.

One's optimism is somewhat shaken, to be sure, at memory of the fact that there is not an audience in our theatres for such plays as John Galsworthy's "The Silver Box," presented by Miss Barrymore, and "The Good Hope," through which medium Miss Terry introduced us to the work of the Dutch realist Heijermans, and one can scarcely doubt that Mr. Mansfield's popularity rather than any sincere interest in Ibsen's "Peer Gynt," was responsible for the large audiences that saw the elaborately mounted spectacle.

Of Shakespeare, in addition to Mr. Mantell's very commendable revivals, and those of Miss Marlowe and Mr. Sothern, and Signor Novelli, we have had Miss Annie Russell's beautifully mounted production of "A Midsummer Night's Dream" and Miss Allen's equally lavish exposition of "Cymbeline." And Mr. Greet has been with us once again.

Mr. Sutro was represented by "The Price of Money," which the producers have possibly since dubbed "The Price of Failure," for it has certainly added nothing to the managerial exchequer, nor can it be regarded as having added anything to the reputation of its author. Mr. Tolstoy's mawkish "Kreutzer Sonata" we have had in two versions—as if one were not enough—that of Langdon Mitchell's being an admirable adaptation and serving to display Mme. Kalisch at her best. Jerome K. Jerome's "Susan in Search of a Husband" and Mr. Zangwill's "Nurse Marjorie" belong to the list of things one would rather forget, a wish by the way no doubt shared by Miss Eleanor Robson, who has since had cause to rejoice in her American-made play, "Salomy Jane," in which Paul Armstrong again develops his virile touch for melodrama.

Melodrama again, and very picturesque melodrama, we have had in David Belasco and Richard Walton Tully's "The Rose of the Rancho," which, in addition to providing a very popular entertainment, still nowhere near the end of its run, brought a new "star" in the person of Miss Frances Starr, whom Mr. Belasco has caused to shine brilliantly.

In "The Truth," in which Miss Marie Tempest has just scored a great personal success in London, Clyde Fitch came near to his own highest level. The play was not a popular success. Speaking to Mr. Channing Pollock a few days ago, I remarked that the first two acts of this play were capital, to which he replied, irreverently: "Yes, and the last two acts were labor." A collaboration along the line of farce-comedy humor which I cannot refrain from recording. "The Girl Who Has Everything," "The Straight Road," and the ill-fated "House of Mirth" also bore the Fitchian label. Similarly, only more so, to quote a current phrase, there was disappointment in store for those of us who looked for something of importance from Mr. Gillette, his "Clarice" being a charming idyl for one brief act, then developing into impossibly bad melodrama. From Langdon Mitchell, in addition to the adaptation already mentioned, there has been a brilliant comedy, "The New York Idea," which served Mrs. Fiske admirably, though it did not quite live up to its prospectus of a great moral preachment. Charles Klein, in "The Daughters of Men," provided a thesis play in which the thesis, involving something like the present peace agitation, but devoted to the battles of labor and capital, was presented with admirable sincerity, but unfortunately without the peculiar dramatic appeal essential to success.

Of the lighter plays of the season James Forbes's "The Chorus Lady" has been chiefly interesting as an excellent vehicle for Miss Stahl's amusing characterization, and Mr. Collier and his collaborator, Grant Stewart, have provided a very agreeable little farce in "Caught in the Rain." Among the other plays that have been popularly successful one recalls "The Road to Yesterday," by Evelyn Greenleaf Sutherland and Beulah M. Dix, and Channing Pollock's and Avery Hopwood's "Clothes."

The so-called "book play" has been less in evidence than for several seasons, Messrs. Edward Knoblock and Claude Askew's "The Shulamite," presented by Lena Ashwell, being about the most conspicuous example of that class. Byron Onley and Winchell Smith's "Brewster's Millions" belongs to the popular successes.

Of failures there have been plenty, but in general the plays that failed deserved no better fate. Indeed, in the cases of many of them, no one but a producing manager could explain why they ever saw the footlights. If, as some aver, it was because of a shortage of material, the fact merely serves to emphasize two points—one, that there are too many theatres for the quantity of the possible product; another, that conditions that have existed for a number of years have not been such as to encourage dramatic composition.

The table does not include productions of Shakespeare's plays, which included revivals of "Hamlet," "King Lear," "Othello," "Cymbeline," "Twelfth Night," "Richard III.," "The Merchant of Venice," "The Taming of the Shrew," and "Julius Caesar."

Of George Bernard Shaw's plays, "Caesar and Cleopatra," "Widowers' Houses," and "Captain Brassbound's Conversion" comprise the works seen on our stage for the first time this season. Ibsen was represented by productions of "Peer Gynt" and "The Pretenders" (by amateurs) and revivals of "A Doll's House" and "Hedda Gabler."

Three plays by Robert Browning were seen at special matinees, "A Blot on the Scutcheon," "Colombe's Birthday," and "Pippa Passes," the last two being new on our stage.

Plays New and Old That Hold the Boards

The warm weather is approaching and may really be upon us at any moment. The theatres are preparing to close their doors for the Summer, though some few houses have productions that are intended for Summer shows or regular successes which may continue into June or July. In another month Broadway will be comparatively deserted by theatregoers, and the effects of the coming dull season are already notable.

The only new productions this week will be three one-act plays to be offered by Arnold Daly at a special matinee in the Lyceum Theatre on Tuesday. The only important opening will be the return of Robert Mantell to the city, appearing under the management of William A. Brady for the first time at the New Amsterdam Theatre. His repertoire of classic pieces will include many of the dramas which he offered earlier in the season at the Academy of Music.

Robert Mantell will begin a brief engagement at the New Amsterday Theatre to-morrow night. He will make his first appearance as Brutus in "Julius Caesar," one of the threo new rôles which he has undertaken this season. His revival of this tragedy was seen here last November, during the final week of his engagement at the Academy of Music. "Julius Caesar" will be repeated on Tuesday and Wednesday nights and Saturday afternoon.

Mr. Mantell's répertoire for the remainder of the week will be: Shylock in "The Merchant of Venice," on Wednesday afternoon; "Richard III." on Thursday and Friday nights, and "Macbeth" on Saturday night. The répertoire for the second week will be: "Richelieu" on Monday night, "King Lear" on Tuesday and Wednesday nights, "Macbeth" on Wednesday afternoon, "The Merchant of Venice" on Thursday and Friday nights and Saturday afternoon, and Iago in the tragedy of "Othello" on Saturday night. Among the members of Robert Mantell's supporting company are Norman Hackett, Francis McGinn, Guy Lindsley, Franklin Bendtsen, Gordon Burby, George Stillwell, Marie Booth Russell, Lillian Kingsbury, and Aileen Bertelle. The Wednesday matinées will begin at 2:45 o'clock.

Arnold Daly announces a series of four special matinees at the Lyceum Theatre beginning on Tuesday, April 30. Each matinee will consist of three plays: "The Lemonade Boy," by Gladys Unger; "The Flag Station," by Charles Kenyon, and "The Monkey's Paw," a dramatization by Louis N. Parker of the story by W. W. Jacobs. In each play the actor will portray a different character.

"The Lemonade Boy" tells a story of life among the lowly. Marica, a vendor of sweets, is loved by two men—a bathing master, who seeks her hand, and a lemonade boy, who only presumes to be her faithful friend. She is dazzled by a strolling player and is about to commit herself to his tender mercy when the lemonade boy, sacrificing his own aspirations, interferes to prevent the disaster. He does not repent the step even when his heroine turns back to the bathing master in her resentment.

"The Flag Station" narrates the history of a telegrapher who, after working [illegible] at the key for three days, during which a blizzard prevents his assistant from coming to relieve him, makes a mistake which apparently causes the collision of two passenger trains. The operator decides to shoot himself, but a fortunate turn of events changes his course of action.

"The Monkey's Paw" deals with the mystic power of a charm in the shape of a forearm of a monkey. This charm has the power of bringing all one's fondest wishes to pass. The talisman is brought home from the wars in India by an old soldier, who gives it to an aged friend. The wishes are made forthwith, and they come true with startling results.

Only two more weeks remain for the season at Conried's Irving Place Theatre. Max Haenseler, who has been connected with the company as leading comedian for a longer period than any other member of the organization, will receive a testimonial on Tuesday evening. On this occasion the play will be a romantic comedy in four acts by Ludwig Fulda, entitled "The Secret King." The play, though now seen in New York for the first time, is in the répertoire of many of the leading German and Austrian theatres. This same play will be repeated on Wednesday, Thursday, Friday, and Saturday nights and at the Saturday matinée. Sudermann's "Das Blumenboot" will be presented for the last time on Monday.

Among other features will be Joe Maxwell in "A Night in the Police Station," Nita Allen in a sketch, Waterbury Brothers and Tenny, and Mason & Shannon.

Among the vaudeville performers at Keith & Proctor's Jersey City Theatre this week will be Mr. and Mrs. Howard Truesdell, the Four Melvins, Dillon Brothers, and Chinko.

Ethel Levy will make her first appearance at Hammerstein's Victoria Theatre of Varieties this week, and a prominent place will also be given Valeska Suratt, recently the Gibson Girl in "The Belle of Mayfair." Others on the programme will be Murphy & Nichols in "From Zaza to Uncle Tom;" Grace Emmett in "Mrs. Murphy's Second Husband," Binns, Binns, and Binns, and Will H. Fox.

HIPPODROME.

"Pioneer Days" and "Neptune's Daughter" still continue to draw large crowds to the Hippodrome. As the weather grows warmer the general public may become more and more envious of the mermaids.

"The President's Own," as the U. S. Marine Band is called in Washington, will give another concert in the Hippodrome to-night under the direction of Lieut. William H. Santelmann, conductor of the band. The soloist will be Charlotte Elliott, soprano; Ole J. May, euphonium, and Arthur S. Whitcomb, cornet.

SUNDAY CONCERTS.

Sunday concerts with good programmes are offered to-day in the various Keith & Proctor houses, Hammerstein's Victoria, the Alhambra, and the Colonial. All the burlesque theatres offer Sunday bills, as do also the West

WHERE ACTORS ARE MADE TO ORDER

Everything from Ragtime to Tragedy In This Temple of Thespian Instruction.

A GLANCE at the Business Directory of New York City under the heading of Schools and Colleges, will surprise the reader by the number and variation of the halls of learning listed—Art, Music, Riding, Piano Tuning, Barbering, Plumbing, Swimming, Ethical Culture, Cooking, and Automobiles, all can be found in the list.

But a school described as a Training School and Institute of Dramatic Arts and College of Vaudeville, suggests varied possibilities. Here, one assumes, is a temple of learning indeed! The very fact that its name suggests that ever-interesting place, the theatre, is enough to start one on a tour of inspection.

Situated in the heart of the theatrical district, opposite the famous Lambs Club and adjoining one of the new playhouses that spring up every season in New York, the dramatic college does not lack local color and the youthful aspirant for histrionic fame can almost fancy himself a star, even at its portals. In response to the electric gong that ornaments the front door, the caller is ushered into the reception room by a liveried negro boy who learns the nature of the call and delivers the card or the message to the proper person.

The reception room is fitted with green carpets and tapestries, heavy leather chairs, and couches. A graceful desk is at one end of the room, and a mission clock ticks musically on the Italian mantel. Near it the offices of the Secretary and Treasurer open into the private studio of the President and owner of the school. In the basement of the building is the booking agency, where the graduates are catalogued for engagements.

On the second floor is one of the most interesting features of the college, a miniature theatre, complete in all its appointments, with three sets of scenery, lights, and properties on the tiny stage. The toy auditorium seats 250 persons and is handsomely decorated. It is modeled after B. F. Keith's million-dollar playhouse in Philadelphia.

The floor above this is given over to classrooms, and here one may see the aspiring youngsters, and, for that matter, people well advanced in years, learning the art of make-up, stage dancing, and singing. In other classrooms students of Thespis are to be found in the throes of elocution, Delsarte, physical culture, instrumental music, and pantomime.

A Strenuous Moment.

Rehearsing a ballet

A lesson in make-up

As one sits in the reception room of the dramatic college, the steady tramp, tramp, tramp of the dancing class resounds on the floor above, shaking the entire building, and a visit to the room from which the sound emanates discloses ten or fifteen ambitious young women striving with the intricacies of a complicated dance step.

"One! two! three!" counts the director, and the class responds with rhythmic precision. No music is used, and they depend entirely on the count of their teacher in timing their various movements.

"No, no, Miss Wilson! that's not the way I taught you to do that second step!" The entire class of young women comes to an abrupt halt, while Miss Wilson, red and confused, stammers out an explanatory something. After she is shown how to do the step, the lesson is resumed, and time after time it is repeated until all the girls are ready to go on with the next lesson.

In an adjoining room will be found the make-up class. This department is fitted up in much the same manner as the dressing rooms in regular theatres. Two long tables, or rather shelves, are ranged along either side, and twenty little mirrors located conveniently beneath powerful incandescents of thirty-two candle power are placed in front of twenty ordinary deal chairs.

If the visitor is fortunate enough to enter the place when a class of make-up students are in session he will be amply repaid for the visit, for this phase of stage life, although little known to the layman, is interesting and important.

"There is as much science required in painting the face as there is in painting a canvas, and it takes just as much study," explains the teacher. "In fact, it is the same thing, only in this case the artist has a living background to work upon instead of the cold material used by his fellow-worker in oils.

"Many a clever beginner has spoiled his first stage appearance by coming before the audience with an absurd make-up on. There are so many things to master in this branch of the profession, such as high lights, groundwork, filling out the face properly, or reducing it, the proper care of the face to prevent the evil effects of the paint and powder that are bound to occur if the trick is not properly done, that it really ought to be the very first thing the aspirant of the stage should learn."

"But doesn't the constant painting of the face ruin the skin in time?" is a question often asked by the uninitiated, which can be truthfully answered in the negative.

A class of young women are in the course of making up. One of them finishes as the instructor gets through delivering this impromptu lecture, and presents herself to him for criticism.

"Why, how on earth did you get through so quickly?" he asks. In the next breath he continues: "Did you put cold cream on your face before you began?"

The girl admits that she didn't.

"What do you want to do, ruin your face before you have been on the stage two years?" he thunders; then, despite her protests, he makes her remove the make-up and begin all over again with a foundation of cold cream.

The dramatic class has just been called in the tiny theatre and the visitor is invited to watch the work. The class reciting is one of the higher ones, and their lesson resembles a rehearsal in a regular theatre. The instructor plays the rôle of stage manager.

They say they go in for high art in this temple of learning, and nothing less than Shakespeare is the play they are reading.

"To reach their present stage," the director of the class explains, "these students are thoroughly trained in elocution, facial expression, make-up, Delsarte, and physical culture."

If a student is so inclined, he can become a "strong man" by a course in the physical culture department of the school, for, indeed, this branch is one of the important features, with a gymnasium, shower baths, and all that goes with a place of this kind.

The music classes are located in a series of sound-proof rooms, and there one can not only listen to the students learning to sing, but to play nearly every musical instrument that is known to the modern stage. The school at present boasts of an orchestra of ten pieces, which officiates at every performance on the miniature stage.

Song and playwrighting are also taught, but with indifferent success, as these two accomplishments are things that must be born in the man and cannot be attained by mere book learning. What the school aims to do, however, is to teach the aspiring lyricist, composer, or playwright the technique of the profession, also to criticise and suggest improvements.

Another branch of study to be found in this school is the art of stage managing, a branch that has hitherto been sadly neglected, the would-be stage managers having to depend on a lucky chance to land them as assistant to some of the older and more experienced members of the craft, who impart a scant knowledge of the profession to them, forcing the would-be director to depend upon himself for the finishing essentials.

In the annex of the college the young man who desires to enter the mechanical end of the theatre is instructed in every branch—electrical, property, and carpentry, to say nothing of scene painting. In a model shop, now being constructed, the students are taught scene building, property making, papier maché work, how to run the lights of a theatre, and dozens of other things equally useful and instructive.

Difficulties of Managing a Foreign Star

IMAGINE the task of managing even the most genial and complaisant of foreign stars—when not a man in the home offices can speak with him in his own language. If this star has spent most of his time in the South of Europe and the Spanish countries of South America, imagine the trouble of explaining through an interpreter the thousand and one ins and outs of American theatrical management. When the house at the Lyric Theatre was to be counted up during the engagement of Ermete Novelli it took no less than five people to perform the task and satisfy all claims. Ordinarily two people—the Treasurer of the company and the manager of the house—are thought sufficient. If one could have stolen a glimpse into the back door of the box office at the Lyric any evening at about 9:30 all five gentlemen would have been seen busy reckoning the proceeds.

Who are these five dignitaries? First and foremost, Vittorio Consigli of the firm of Paradossi & Consigli, Novelli's managers. Second, Franco Liberati, who travels with Novelli and is a sort of personal adviser and confidant in general. Third, a Mr. Pemberton, interpreter and assistant manager. Fourth, the treasurer of the house, and, fifth, the manager of the house, who is also general manager for the Shuberts.

Even in the United States there are many different customs of "counting up" in different localities. First comes the difficulty of explaining to the Italians the system on which the business of a theatre is worked in America, and then comes the unspeakable maze of monetary calculations. The business is all done in dollars and cents, but the Italians must think in lire and other strange coins. Almost every night one side or the other gets "balled up" in trying to "translate" the money values. Then comes the difficulty of making allowance for the seats occupied by critics and the "dead heads." The Italians mean to be perfectly courteous, but they are not used to an elaborate newspaper system, and it has been aa hard for them as for the American managers to control the demands of the Italian press in New York. So everything haa to be explained and explained again and again—and the patient interpreter waxes exceeding weary.

However, the most onerous burden of managing a foreign star falls on the press department of the American manager's offices. Novelli has really had three press agents—the central press agent of all the Shubert attractions, the Shubert advance man traveling with the production, and Mr. Pemberton, the interpreter. Pemberton was the only interpreter who came with the large company, most of the members of which can speak more or less of almost any language except English.

The press agents were confronted with the necessity of providing unlimited material for the Italian newspapers in all leading American cities, but especially in New York. They heard so much Italian that in their dreams they began to imagine they could talk it, but the dreams always vanished in the presence of reality. Then they had to translate programmes galore—for seventeen different productions.

These programmes have been one of the mysteries of the Novelli company. The plays have been taken from the German, Italian, English, French, and even Russian and Greek. The Italians have, in their own way, translated the original programmes into Italian, and the press department has translated them again into English with the aid of the ubiquitous Pemberton. This process has been described as the "Satanic limit" of the whole business. The Italians have done strange things with translating Shakespeare into Italian, names and all; and the industry of a Chinaman might have been foiled in translating them back into respectable English, still retaining the essence of the Italian versions.

One of the little regular trials has been that of deciding every week on the répertoire for the week to come. The American manager's representatives sat in one room and the Italians in another. Then they would hold councils of war, with Pemberton as envoy. The Italians would consult and come to a decision; then they would send word through Pemberton to the Americans. Then, by that time, the Americans would have formed opinions of their own. And so the ambassador would go back and forth.

Advance Advertising Unknown.

In one of the large South American cities such as those in which Ermete Novelli has been a particular favorite for some seasons past, it is the custom for a famous star to come—simply to come, and nothing more. Signor Consigli was astounded that it should be thought necessary to advertise his star in advance. He had no conception of such "advance work" as is done for every company of any size in this country.

The star comes to one of these South American cities, and they just put out a few cards telling who he is and when and where he is to be seen. Even in France, where advance work is more highly developed, they make no special feature of "paper"—posters, &c.—such aa is to be seen placarded in every available space of an American town, even for a minstrel show. Sometimes they sell the tickets for the first performance before they have decided what the first performance is to be. They expect to have a few photographs in print—but they have no conception of the demands made by American journals and magazines. The idea of furnishing cuts to the newspapers amazes them. Ermete Novelli's tours have been so strictly confined to Spanish America that his ideas of management are founded on the customs there. When Novelli went to the City of Mexico the Government gave him the use of the theatre free and added to that a subsidy of what would be $18,000 in our money, on condition that he should not charge more than $2.50 in American money for any seats.

Living in an American hotel, above the restaurant or barber's shop, was a dire experience for Novelli. He couldn't understand anything that was said to him, and he couldn't make any one understand anything he said in reply. One day the chambermaid heard a dog bark. When Novelli was out they searched his room and found the tiny creature in a little box. Then it was a case either of Novelli or Novelli's dog leaving the hotel. He went across the street and played "Hamlet"—with nothing but doglet on his mind. He was worried, but finally confided the little beast to the tender care of some intimate friends.

One of the greatest difficulties to be surmounted by the managers in New York has been that of providing scenery for seventeen different productions in three weeks. Novelli's own wooden and paper scenery, magnificent though it is said to be, does not comply with the New York fire laws, and so is useless. The managers have taken scenery wherever they could find it, and they say that Robert Mantell has been particularly generous in assisting them. They also used a good deal of scenery employed for the Sothern and Marlowe productions.

Two of the most important persons in an Italian organization are the "Porta Cesta" and the prompter. What is a Porta Cesta? According to the Italian custom each actor keeps his own properties and wardrobe wherever he happens to be living. The Porta Cesta makes the rounds in the morning and brings to the theatre all properties and costumes that will be required at night! All manner of guile was required to persuade the Novelli company to forego the old custom of this carrying gentleman. Imagine having one of these messenger men going round a city in which he didn't know one street from another, endeavoring to gather another set of equipments for each performance and a new performance every night!

The Ubiquitous Prompter.

According to the regular custom of the company, the prompter, like the same official of a Yiddish company, is stationed behind a shield in the middle of the stage just behind the footlights, from which point of vantage he reads the entire play aloud in a husky undertone. "Great heavens!" says the manager, "we thought we would never subdue the prompter. He thought he was the whole show. We would get him off into the wings and tell him to keep quiet, but he was sure to get excited and break in with his eternal prompting at just the wrong moment. He actually believed that the scene would go to pieces without him, just because he was accustomed to think so. That company has a répertoire of forty-seven pieces, and they know them so well that they don't really need to be prompted in any of them. Now we have pretty well succeeded in squelching the prompter, but every now and then he breaks away from us in spite of all our wiles. Then we grab him and pull him back out of hearing."

The door to Novelli's dressing room is always open, and he apologizes for having to go on the stage. The room is often so crowded that people who have come on business have to ask others to step out so that they may have room to enter.

And Novelli is something of a joker, too. One night at the Majestic Theatre, Boston, when the play lasted until after midnight and Gov. Guild was in a hurry to get the actor away with him to a supper which he had ordered, the Chief Executive of the Bay State applauded appreciatively as the curtain went down—more because he was glad to see the curtain go down than for any other reason. The play was "Hamlet." Novelli still held the fatal sword. He stopped, smiled, reached with the rapier across the footlights and gently pinked the Governor where he sat in his box!

Strange examples of Italian fervor have been seen in Novelli's dressing room. One night during the second week of his engagement one fellow-countryman rushed in and cried at the top of his lungs—"Magnifico! Magnifico!" Then he grasped the actor's hands and kissed them effusively. Novelli smiled benignly, obviously much pleased. He folded his hands and exclaimed with almost equal fervor—"Gratia!"—or whatever is the Italian for thank you.

During his stay in New York Ermete Novelli—who speaks Italian, French, and Spanish—is said to have learned just two phrases of English—"Thirty-four" and "Forty-two." He lived at the Waldorf on Thirty-fourth Street and he knew that the theatre was on Forty-second. Thus he was always able to find his way home when he got lost on his solitary rambles.

WILD WEST AT THE GARDEN.

The Old Wild West has again attracted throngs to the Garden. As a lesson in the possibilities of the rider in connection with his mount, its return from abroad was truly educative. The entire arena horses of the past seasons were sold in Europe, and an entirely new stud was gathered together during the Winter. Weather and other conditions prevented the usual week or two of practice. Sunday and Monday furnished the only days in which to accomplish that which was left undone. All horsemen recognized it as a problem. It was solved triumphantly. With the exception of one or two falls, a splendid exhibition of expert equestrianism by natural riders was given, and proved that when properly mastered the most fractious horse can become thoroughly conservative.

The Battle of Summit Springs; The Train Hold-up; Ray Thompson's trained Texas horse, Joe Bailey, and his equine commander and Western girl riders are appropriate and welcome features. In short the Wild West promises its leader, Col. Cody, to retain its youthful freshness and popularity. As the road tour commences soon there will be only two weeks more at the Garden.

BUSY AT LUNA PARK.

The work of reconstruction, elaborating and beautifying Luna Park is progressing rapidly. Two complete forces of artists and artisans—a day and night force—are employed in augmenting, amplifying, and rehabilitating the Court of Luna. Frederick Thompson, under whose immediate guidance and supervision the work is being rushed, and the heads of his various departments are giving their individual efforts to the work. A feature which the public will greatly appreciate will be a news bulletin board on which the baseball and racing results and other important news features will be promptly posted.

ACTORS' FUND FAIR.

It is announced that the Actors' Fund Fair will be run on business principles. No "hold-ups" will be permitted. There will be no excessive charges or over-solicitation. Goods will be sold at an honest price and plainly marked. The admission fee will be $1, and the fair will be open daily, including Monday, from 12:30 to 6 P. M., and from 7:30 P. M. to midnight.

The list of bands and orchestras comprises the Twelfth, Seventy-first, Twenty-second, Twenty-third, and Seventh Regiment bands, the Banda Roma, Van Baar's Old Guard Band of 100 pieces, Saenger's Symphony Orchestra, and the orchestras of Victor Herbert, Manuel Klein, and Maurice Levi—a total of about 1,000 musicians, who will play without compensation. Printing has come from every show print house in America and will be posted free.

An Up-to-Date Revenge

SLAWSON, the genial, had suddenly turned glum. All had noticed it. Though he still occupied his usual chair in the club car given over to a few select and congenial commuters, yet he shook his head when the fellows pressed him to join sundry games of cards or chess, and retired behind his paper in inconsolable gloom.

Smith, his bosom friend, who had been away from the commuting suburb, returned in the course of time, and meeting Slawson one day in the club car clapped him on the shoulder, bluntly inquiring the cause of the change in him.

"Now you know, Smith," said he, "that I make it a point never to interfere in household affairs. My wife—you know my wife. Can you beat her anywhere as a housekeeper, as a cook, as a—yes, yes. As I was saying, well my wife—Excuse me," said he with dignity, "but my wife happens to be the subject of my—er—story—as I was saying, my wife has always been, is, and always will be the queen of housekeepers.

"To say that I have lived on the fat of the land always does not half express the truths My table, in fact, in reality, Sir, has always groaned—literally groaned with the—er—salt of the earth, Sir. Naturally my wife's reputation as a housewife was remarkable in our neighborhood—in our town, in fact. My wife is—at least I thought her so—a little, but pardonably Sir, proud of her achievements and reputation. It seemed to me, Sir—ignorant wretch that I am—that her seeming vanity had lately grown to somewhat alarming proportions. After debating the matter with myself, I set about to curb—to—er—take down—the vanity of the dear lady in question quite playfully, quite innocently, but systematically, Sir. I criticised my wife from day to day—slightly, but carefully.

"Two weeks ago, coming home to dinner one night, I found my table set with an odd assortment of new dishes. Our girl brought in and placed upon a side table which she drew up beside my wife a number of curious looking boxes. Each was wrapped about with some sort of felt covering, and when my wife removed the lid of one, I perceived that the interior was of some sort of sheet iron. I was so astonished at what followed that I could neither open my mouth to speak nor eat. My wife picked out from these boxes, Sir, my dinner. It was steaming—but not in the way it steams when brought directly from the kitchen. Also the food placed before me was strange—and—er—odious, Sir, to my taste. Having set the meal before me, my wife served herself, and then smilingly and beamingly looked across the table at me.

"I ejaculated 'Madame—' but got no further.

"'Jimmy dear,' said she in dulcet tones. 'Now, I know you will be satisfied. You know, dearest, how you have been complaining lately about the food. Well! I have solved the problem.

"'Yes,' she continued, clasping her slender, capable hands, 'I've done it all myself, darling. I found, upon investigation that all men—all husbands are alike. Without exception they all make complaint about and criticise their wife's or her cook's cooking. I've questioned, oh, twenty of my very best and dearest friends, and with the most delightful solution of the problem. I've formed a Co-operative Eating Society. Each day one of the members either cooks or superintends the cooking of the daily meals.

"I leaped to my feet with the roar of a torn and wounded animal. 'Madame!' I shouted, 'do you expect me to eat a meal prepared by Mrs. Fairfield?'—Of course you know the lady's specialty is—fudge!' My wife seemed not at all abashed. She smiled, Sir—laughed in my face, indeed. And then—

"'Why certainly, dear,' said she, 'and she makes the most beautiful chocolate fudge I ever put my teeth through.'

"I sank into my seat, and surveyed my smiling spouse in a stunned silence, which lasted several minutes. And then, gently, and sarcastically, Sir, I asked:

"'And when, may I inquire, am I to expect a meal cooked by you—you, madame?'

"'By me?' she said, innocently, raising her eyebrows, 'Why my dearest, dearest boy, you know my cooking has been giving you painful indigestion, and so—and so—as I feared the evil effect of it on other men, I am going in for politics. I've had myself elected President of the Co-operative Eating Society. I shan't cook at all!' she said."

MME. ODA'S PLANS.

Danish Actress to Produce "Little Eyolf" Early Next Month.

MME. ODA, royal prima donna of the Royal Theatre, Copenhagen, who has been playing before her own countrymen in Chicago and San Francisco, has decided to produce at a local theatre Henrik Ibsen's "Little Eyolf."

She will play the leading character of Rita in the original Ibsen text of the Danish-Norwegian language, while her support will be a cast of American actors speaking in English.

The initial performance will be given during the first week of May. During a series of subsequent performances Mme. Oda promises to act the part of Rita in English to show what she has learned of the language during her two months' tour of this country.

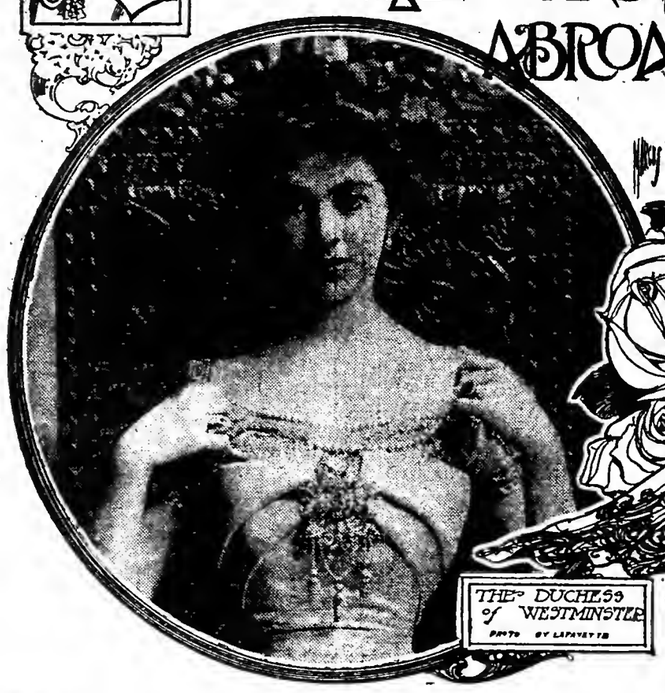
SOCIETY HOME AND ABROAD



THE DUCHESS of WESTMINSTER

MRS. HOWLAND PELL.

MRS. HAROLD McCORMICK.
COPYRIGHT BY H.W. SIEBRECHT.

A FEW more weddings, a charitable entertainment or two, and the Easter season will be over. There has been more entertaining this year on a small scale, possibly because the number of sailings for Europe has been fewer and the weather conditions have been against bucolic pleasures. In fact, the country has been bleak and cold and the high winds have been most disagreeable. In town there has been much illness among the fashionable set, and a species of sore throat has been one of the ailments, brought about, it is said, by the absorption of dust. Notwithstanding these untoward conditions, the young women of the Four-in-Hand Club have been diligently tooling the coach, morning after morning, and the prospects for an interesting parade increase each day. This will be one of the features of the coming week.

Entertaining has taken the form of luncheons and dinners intimes. This is the time of year to cement old friendships and to pay off old social debts. Summer plans are being discussed, but it is rather an odd fact that there is a large Western tide of travel, many people returning to America instead of being outward bound. Among those booked for home are Mr. and Mrs. Reginald Vanderbilt and Mr. and Mrs. Harry S. Lehr, who, after all, will not be in London this Spring. Alfred Vanderbilt is returning for a second time within two months, but he will still ferry across the ocean, as he has to be again in London before June for the International Horse Show at Olympia. Mrs. Vanderbilt and Miss Gladys Vanderbilt are booked for May 7, shortly after their return from California. Mrs. Oliver H. P. Belmont stays abroad for the present, unless there is another change in her plans. She will do no entertaining at Newport this season, as she will be in deep mourning for her sister, Miss Armide Smith, to whom she was devotedly attached. The Frederick Vanderbilt villa at Rough Point will not be ready for Mr. and Mrs. Leeds until possibly September, and they have planned to remain abroad a greater part of the Summer.

It is stated that the dancing class known as the Dinner Dance, organized by Mrs. Frederic de Peyster and J. Montgomery Strong, will be discontinued. The Neighborhood Cotillions have also been given up. This leaves a small list of dancing classes and assemblies for next season. Now that so many New Yorkers have splendid ballrooms of their own, the dancing class becomes more and more a thing of the past.

The week has been much enjoyed, notwithstanding the Marchlike weather, at Tuxedo and Baltusrol, where there have been numerous house and week-end parties. At Meadow Brook the hunt goes bravely on, and preparations are being made for the opening at Belmont Park.

The second week of the tennis tournament at the St. Nicholas Rink has attracted large audiences, and there have been any number of luncheons and dinners given at the Colony Club, which is now about the most popular place to entertain in New York.

The departure of Mr. and Mrs. George Gould and their family for Europe was one of the events of Thursday. Mr. Gould sold his polo ponies on Tuesday, and there was a representative gathering at the sale. Although it is stated that George Gould will have a new house on the site of his present residence on Fifth Avenue, there have been rumors of his purchasing the James Henry Smith mansion, which is said to be in the market. Miss Gould will then have a mansion ready equipped for her début.

Mrs. James Henry Smith, with the Duke and Duchess of Manchester, bringing home the body of James Henry Smith, will arrive in New York at the end of the week, and the funeral services will take place the second week in May. The coaching parade will be held on May 11, instead of the 4th. Lady Cooper and Mr. and Mrs. Anthony Drexel come from abroad to attend the funeral. Miss Drexel remains in London with Mr. and Mrs. Carter.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Goelet have determined to go abroad. They will sail in June and join Mr. and Mrs. Craig Biddle in Paris. The Prince and Princess of Wales have postponed their visit to Floors Castle, the family seat of the Duke of Roxburghe. They will go there in the Autumn, during the shooting season.

Among the entertainments of the week were the French charity concert at Sherry's, at which Mme. Calvé sang, and Miss Amy Baker's annual recital on Friday afternoon at the same place. Both were under fashionable patronage and were largely attended.

The Last April Weddings.

The notable wedding of to-morrow will be that of Miss Rachel Lenox Kennedy, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. H. Van Rensselaer Kennedy, and Frank Brinley Porter, son of Mrs. Frank Brinley Porter. It will be a quiet affair and will take place at the residence of the bride's parents. There will be a small reception after the ceremony for relatives and intimate friends.

On Tuesday St. Thomas's Church will be the scene of a fashionable wedding. Miss Frances de la Vergne, daughter of Mrs. John Chester de la Vergne, will be the bride. The bridegroom-elect is Craig Fitzrandolph Drake.

Monday is the date of the wedding of Miss Eleanor Sedley and Theodore Greppo, at the Church of the Heavenly Rest. There will be no bridesmaids and only a reception after the ceremony, at the residence of the bride's mother, for relatives and a few intimate friends.

Another wedding of Monday will be that of Miss Martha J. Hall and George J. MacCracken, a son of Chancellor MacCracken. This will also be a quiet affair.

The Madison Square Presbyterian Church will be the scene of the nuptials on Tuesday of Miss Anna J. Jenner and Sterling T. Foote. Miss Jenner is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. William A. Jenner, and the bridegroom-elect is a grandson of the Rev. Thomas Hastings, who will officiate, assisted by the Rev. Dr. Charles H. Parkhurst. Mrs. Hansen, the wife of Dr. Ejnar Hansen, will be matron of honor, and in the list of bridesmaids are Miss Hilda Lockwood, Miss Alice Clark, Miss Elizabeth Stevenson, all of this city, and Miss Elsa Whitin of Whitinsville, Mass. A small reception for relatives and intimate friends will follow at the residence of the bride's parents.

On Tuesday, at Pelham Manor, at Christ Protestant Episcopal Church, Miss Margaret Carmichael Roper, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Charles F. Roper, will be married to Walter Cook, Jr. It will be a small wedding, as the capacity of the church is limited.

Thomas Ludlow Clarke, son of Mrs. Elizabeth Clarke of New York and New Orleans, will be married to Miss Winifred Ives, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Theodore M. Ives, at St. Agnes's Chapel on Tuesday. The bride will have her sister, Miss Pauline Ives, as maid of honor. The wedding is of much interest to many of the Southern set as well as to New Yorkers. Mr. Clarke is a Yale graduate and a prominent member of the Rockaway Hunt, and has made his home here since he was quite a lad. His mother was the beautiful Miss McWilliams of the Teche. The late Thomas Clarke of New Orleans, the bridegroom's father, was a popular clubman in that city, and one of the chief organizers of the carnival processions. The Ives family have many relatives in Virginia and Maryland, but they have lived in New York for a generation or more. Robert Brewster will be best man.

Tuesday, which will be a day of weddings, will also be the date of the marriage of Miss Aline Virginia Kent, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas B. Kent, and Rutgers Ives Hurry, at St. James's Protestant Episcopal Church. The bridesmaids will be the Misses Marie Kent, Constance Fairchild, Marguerite Petit, and Ethel Levering. Renwick C. Hurry will be best man. A small reception will follow at the residence of the bride's parents, in East Sixty-fifth Street.

At St. George's, Stuyvesant Square, will take place the marriage of Miss Gwendolyn Wickersham, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George W. Wickersham, and Albert J. Akin. This will be a church affair with a small reception following the ceremony at the residence of the bride's parents.

In other cities there will be also many weddings, as the number is to be comparatively few in May. Two of the most interesting to New Yorkers will be the marriage of Miss Zaidee Forsyth Gaff, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Thomas T. Mrs. Viola Waterhouse, soprano; Paul Dufault, tenor, and Cornelius Rubner, pianist, have given their services, and William A. Brady gave the use of the Savoy Theatre. Kotlarsky is a native of New York, born on the lower east side, of Russian parentage, and received his entire musical education from Herwegh von Ende in New York. Davies, Mrs. Stanley Gifford, Mrs. J. Holland Forbes, Mrs. Joseph Knapp, Mrs. Edward Lauterbach, Mrs. G. Condony, and the Messrs. John D. Crimmins, John Pierce, Ashbel Fitch, Charles W. Dayton, Jr., Thomas Ryan, August Belmont, Samuel Untermyer, Roger Foster, Perry Belmont, Allan McLane Hamilton, and H. Content.

General Gossip.

Miss Mary C. Lefferts, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Marshall C. Lefferts, will be married to Henry Rawle on May 14 at St. Bartholomew's Church. On May 17 Miss Jane Ruthven Hall and Reginald W. Robbins will be married at Grace Church Chantry.

The engagement has been announced of Dr. Lewis Livingston Hyde, whose first wife was the late Mrs. John Stevens of Castle Point, and Miss Lelia Moss McGuire of Elbchester, who is a cousin of the late Mrs. Hyde. Mrs. Hyde's daughter by her first husband, John Stevens, became the bride of Ogden H. Hammond two weeks ago at Castle Point. She was Miss Mary Picton Stevens.

Mrs. Langdon Schroeder and Miss Neuville, who have been abroad this Winter, return shortly to pass the Summer at Babylon, Long Island.

Mr. and Mrs. Hollis Hunnewell are motoring in Dalmatia. They will remain abroad for the present.

Mrs. James B. Haggin, who has been in Paris this past week, goes to the Italian Lakes for the month of May.

Mrs. Frederick Bronson, who has been traveling in Italy, is in London, where she will remain for a greater part of the season.

Personal and Otherwise

MISS MURIEL DELANO ROBBINS, whose picture may be seen in the pictorial section, is the daughter or Mrs. Price Collier of Tuxedo by her first husband. On June 1, in St. Mary's Church at Tuxedo Park, she will marry Cyril Martineau of London, a distant relative of Harriet Martineau, one of the most distinguished women of her time, and who visited America many years ago, and, of course, of her brother, the Rev. James Martineau, who also achieved a reputation, but along different lines from his sister, who was as liberal minded as the clergyman was conservative.

Miss Robbins came out several years ago in town, where Mrs. Collier had a house for the Winter. She has also spent much time abroad, and was presented not long ago at the Court of St. James. The permanent home of the Colliers is in Tuxedo, and there Miss Robbins spends most of her time. She is a blonde, with wonderful red gold hair, and has always been considered one of the beauties of not only the Tuxedo set but of New York as well.

Miss Robbins is fond of outdoor life, and is an excellent pedestrian. She has charming manners and is a general favorite. She is an heiress in her own right.

Her mother, Mrs. Collier, was Miss Katharine Delano, a near relative of Walter Delano, Jr., whose two daughters, the Misses Laura and Ellen Delano, for whom Mrs. Pembroke Jones gave a superb coming-out ball at Sherry's several years ago, are to be bridesmaids. Miss Robbins is a niece of Herbert D. Robbins and of Mrs. Peter Lynch of Paris. She is a cousin of Mrs. William Earl Dodge and of Miss Emily Sloane. Her stepfather, Price Collier, has written several clever books.

Miss Emily Rogers is a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Pendelton Rogers of New York, and a sister of John Shillito Rogers, who married Miss Catherine Cossitt Dodge of Tuxedo and New York. Her mother was Miss Mary W. Shillito, a member of the distinguished old Shillito family of Cincinnati, Ohio. Another of her brothers is H. Pendleton Rogers, Jr. Miss Rogers is well known and well liked in society.

Miss Martha Calhoun, whose picture appears in the Pictorial Section, is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Calhoun, and made her début in Charleston early in the Winter. Her parents also have a house in New York, where she has spent part of the Winter. She is a great-great-granddaughter of the famous John C. Calhoun of South Carolina, a niece of John C. Calhoun, now of New York, and a cousin of Miss Julia Calhoun and of James E. and John C. Calhoun, Jr.

Miss Rachel Lenox Kennedy, who tomorrow will marry Frank Brinley Porter, is one of the youngest society buds to marry, and her young mother looks like her sister instead of a parent. Mrs. Kennedy was Miss Marion Robbins, and for years, up to the death of Mrs. Belmont, she was perhaps the most intimate friend of the late Mrs. August Belmont, who was Miss Morgan. Miss Kennedy is a granddaughter of Mrs. George A. Robbins, and spends a great deal of time with her. Arden Morris Robbins is her uncle. James Lenox, who gave the Lenox Library to New York, is among her ancestors, and from him she takes the name of Lenox. Her cousin, Robert Lenox Kennedy, presented Munkacsy's painting of the blind poet John Milton to that library. Miss Kennedy has spent many of her Summers at Bar Harbor with her grandmother, Mrs. Robbins. She was at Palm Beach the past Winter, but is barely "out," and that informally.

The engagement of Miss Kennedy and Mr. Porter was announced late in the Winter. Mr. Porter is the son of the late Gen. Frank Brinley Porter and Mrs. Porter of Park Avenue. Mr. Porter is a Yale graduate, Class of '05. His mother, who was a Miss Pond, gave a large reception for Miss Kennedy on her return from Palm Beach in March. Miss Harriette Porter is his sister. The wedding is to be a quiet affair at the residence of the bride's parents.

Miss Eleanor Lewis is a Philadelphia and Narragansett belle, and her engagement to Clifford Wheaton Vaughan of New York was announced some weeks since. She is the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Clifford Lewis (Miss Ella E. Cozens) of South Twelfth Street, Philadelphia. Miss Lewis's picture depicts her in a robe of cloth of gold brocade worn by her great-great-grandmother. Mr. Vaughan is a Columbia graduate, class of '97, and a member of the Knollwood, Racquet and Tennis, and Badminton Clubs, and is a son of Mrs. Henry W. Vaughan (Miss E. J. Potter.)

Mrs. Henry Lackland, who has arrived from Europe with Mr. Lackland, was married on March 25 at Dresden in the Court Chapel. She was Miss Elsie von Ende, a daughter of Major Gen. George von Ende, but is not unknown in this country, being a relative of the Kaisers and Catlins of St. Louis. She has visited the United States several times, once during the World's Fair. A special dispensation from the Pope permitted their marriage in the chapel and the waiving of certain formalities, an unwonted favor, as the bride is a Roman Catholic and her fiancé a Unitarian. Mr. Lackland and his bride have taken the Paramore house in St. Louis, fully furnished, for six months. Mr. Lackland's brother, Edgar C. Lackland, Jr., is to marry Mrs. Frances F. Page, a sister of Mrs. H. H. Rogers, Jr., at an early date. Mrs. Page is the widow of the late Charles Fellows Page of Harvard, Class of '92, a daughter of George Hilliard Benjamin, and granddaughter of Parke Benjamin, historian and poet. She is a cousin of Lady Vernon Harcourt. The wedding will probably take place next month.

Mrs. A. Browning Prentice, with her aunt, Mrs. Henry Brevoort, will occupy Elysian Views, the country place on Long Island adjoining the Lawrence estate on the Merrick Road. Mrs. Prentice purchased this place last year. It is a large old-fashioned house, and has many deep verandas and wide halls. It has been brought up to date with every modern convenience. The grounds are spacious. The dining room is a veritable Dutch dining room, and the wide halls are done in Indian colorings. Mrs. Prentice is a granddaughter of the late Jordan L. Mott.

Miss Beatrice Barclay, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George S. Barclay of Western Pennsylvania, whose engagement to Henry Wharton Shoemaker was announced on March 19 in this paper, is a niece of Col. Barclay, who served in Congress from Western Pennsylvania. She is a distant relative of the de Peyster and other old families of this city, including the Barclays.

Mr. Shoemaker's ancestors at the time of the Revolutionary War were Tories, save one, who served in the Continental Army. Mr. Shoemaker is a direct descendant of his. One of his ancestors was three times Mayor of Philadelphia before that war, and one was a member of Penn's Provincial Council.

It has happened before that a Shoemaker and Barclay have married, and that a descendant was named Henry Shoemaker Barclay.

In London—and would that practice were more prevalent here—tiaras of the fence or fender variety are being seen less and less. The coiffure ornaments there now take the form of jeweled combs, aigrettes, and wreaths, all in diamonds, or diamonds with other gems. One wreath worn by a well-known English woman, was done in a design of small roses, all diamonds.

A Louis XV. knot amid a trelliswork of diamonds and finished by a feathery, diamond-studded aigrette, forms one comb. The necklaces and chains also show more artistic beauty than of yore.

Unusual colorings in gems are the present London fad. Diamonds in black, yellow, blue, topaz, green, and gray are highly prized. Mrs. Ronald Greville possesses a wonderful set of black diamonds. The Hope diamond is the most famous blue diamond in the world, and received especial attention from the press at the time of May Yohe's marriage into the family owning it.

Lady Margaret Campbell has a diamond coiffure ornament set with yellow, mauve, and gray diamonds, and Lady Crawford has a remarkable collection of diamond brooches in all colors, each of fabulous value.

STOUT WOMAN'S ECONOMY

Nemo SELF-REDUCING CORSET

We have proved in our preceding statements that the Nemo Self-Reducing Corset is responsible for the improvement in the stout woman's figure, and that, in addition to its wonderful reducing qualities, it gives to the wearer comfort, health and style.

We have also shown why the patented features of this corset can alone accomplish these results; and why the Nemo Self-Reducing Corset is in a class by itself—without a rival.

We now call attention to the corset's marvelous wearing qualities, to the superior material used, to its perfect shape, smart style, and careful workmanship.

One of the most valuable features of the Nemo Self-Reducing Corset is undoubtedly its shape. So successfully does this corset reduce the abdomen, that, when it is worn for the first time, the skirt will have to be taken in, over the abdomen, three to four inches, in order to make it fit as it did before. It will give a stout woman a better shape than she ever had, and is a correct foundation for a well-fitting gown. Dressmakers recommend it.

All Nemo Corsets are famous the world over for their extraordinary wearing qualities. Every one is made with the patented "Triple Strip Re-enforcement," which means that each bone-pocket is provided with triple-strips, making it absolutely impossible for bones or steels to cut through the material. This means long wear.

The Nemo Self-Reducing Corset is made of strictly high-class materials. The Coutil and Batiste we use are especially made to combine lightness and flexibitity with extraordinary strength.

The Nemo Self-Reducing Corsets are boned throughout with double bones and double steels, making them practically unbreakable. In beauty of trimming, style and workmanship this corset equals, and in many respects is superior to the most expensive French imported or the best of other American-made corsets.

We have proved to your entire satisfaction that because of what this corset accomplishes, and its wonderful wearing qualities, that a Nemo Self-Reducing Corset at $3.00 is a much more economical investment than three ordinary corsets at $1.00 each.

The Sign Manual

DETECTIVE SERGEANT MULCARE of the Central Office got quite communicative the other day on the subject of "panhandlers" or professional beggars, in the handling of which class of "fakers" he has had many years of varied experience.

The conversation started apropos of a recent happening in the Jefferson Market Police Court. A policeman had brought in a man charged with swearing at a woman. In describing the occurrence the policeman stated that the man was a professional beggar.

"He squats on the sidewalk, all twisted up, looking just like a cripple," said the policeman.

This seemed incredible to the Judge, for the man was well-dressed, straight, and strong, with no trace of any deformity. The Judge was about to dismiss the complaint. But at this point Detective Mulcare intervened.

"Put out your hand," he said to the accused man. The latter obeyed. Mulcare rolled up the prisoner's sleeve and showed a scar about two inches long on the wrist.

"There, that is all the identification necessary," he said. "All 'panhandlers' have such a scar."

The Judge gave the "panhandler" six months in the workhouse.

In talking about the incident Mulcare said:

"The reason why the 'panhandlers' have this scar on their wrists is in order to fool green policemen, when arrested for begging. If accused of 'faking' they show the scar to prove that their sufferings are genuine. The scar is made by the use of some kind of acid. It is in reality no scar at all, and quite painless.

"New York is full of 'fake' beggars. Their favorite haunt is the shopping section along Fourteenth Street. This they prefer to shopping districts like Twenty-third Street, because they find that the poorer class of shoppers are more liberal to beggars than the richer class patronizing the shops further uptown. A rich woman may be charitably inclined, but she hesitates about taking out her pocketbook and giving money to a street beggar in the presence of a crowd. A poor woman feels no such hesitation.

"These 'panhandlers' are marvelous actors. Richard Mansfield isn't in it with them. Are most of them 'fakes'? All of them? I don't think so; I know it. Go down to Fourteenth Street late some afternoon about the time the fakers are ready to quit business for the day. Follow them a while, when they start homeward. If they do not know that they are being watched they will soon straighten up and walk without difficulty. Follow them a little further, and you will have trouble in keeping up with them sometimes. All their paralyses and scars worry them no more. They run as fast as their legs can carry them to their haunts on the Bowery—Nos. 99 and 101—that's where most of them hang out.

"And once they get down there you'll find nothing the matter with them. They'll spend the evening playing pool and drinking and having as good a time as anybody. And next morning they'll be back in front of the big department stores, all twisted and groaning and miserable, ready for a profitable day's business."

Costume Materials and Bridal Robes

THERE is no longer any uncertainty about the Summer gowns, wraps, and hats. The fashions in these various articles of wearing apparel are definitely settled. Of course, there are wealthy women of fashion who can cable to their Parisian modistes for their latest models to be adapted to their measurements and shipped them for wear a month later, but there are few of these. American women as a rule are not so much given to the worship of dress as their Parisian sisters, for whom the most wonderful creations in the world are prepared. Their love of fine feathers is usually tempered by common sense, at least to a greater degree than is commonly assumed.

Taffeta, so long the favorite in the sartorial world for serviceable costumes, is practically out of it this Summer. Rajahs, Tussores, Shantungs, all the soft, durable irregularly woven Oriental silken fabrics are well to the fore. These silks are made up in the severely tailored coats and skirts, as well as in elaborate models, the former lined with some very thin silk, usually white, and often the darker shades have collars and cuffs of the natural colored silk, or else the lighter silk is inlaid in the darker collars and cuffs.

Those having black taffeta coats and skirts in good condition will do well to keep them for traveling and shopping and ordinary occasions, and to have their new hackabout costume made of Tussore or any of the other similar silks. These latter wear much better than taffeta, do not show soil and dust as much if in the natural shades, and they clean beautifully. Very dark blue Rajah silks made up with plaited skirts, with medium length plain coats, and having insets of natural or light copper-colored Rajah in the collars and cuffs, make very smart costumes for town or country. Much latitude is allowed in the way of the contrasting color as insets on the accessories. Brown Tussores and the natural-colored Tussores and Rajahs, with white or some bright color, or black if one likes, let in about the neck and sleeves, are serviceable. All-black Rajahs are shown, but at a little distance they look anything but smart, having a dull, even dingy, appearance, that is anything but suggestive of smart gowning.

For formal gowns voiles, chiffon cloths, exquisite organdies, and light meteor satins are the thing. Chiffon voiles are likely to always remain with us. They must be of finest quality and made up over handsome linings, however, in order to look well and last at all. Of these something will be written later.

Late April Wedding Gowns.

The wedding gowns of middle and late April have been lovely indeed. One of the most superb was worn by Miss Irene Untermyer, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, who yesterday at Graystone—the famous country place of the late Samuel J. Tilden, that was purchased some time ago by Mr. Untermyer—married Louis Putnam Myers. The robe of exquisitely soft pearl-white satin was a beautiful creation, showing exquisite rose point and applique lace panels and hand embroidery in a rose pattern done in silk, satin, and silver. The design was copied from the wedding veil, a beautiful scarf over three yards long, of old rose point. This embroidery had the raised part done of fine satin instead of chiffon, making the gown much richer and more natural looking and also more durable than if chiffon were used.

The robe itself was an empire, and the little V-shaped guimpe was of lace tucked crosswise and having a high stock of the rose point. The bodice portion was crossed in toward the bottom in the front, whereas in the back the effect was more of the slanting satin section meeting than crossing. The bodice had the mandarin sleeves, with the armholes extending from the shoulders nearly in the empire girdle effect. Below the little tucked yoke came the panel of old rose point that extended to the hem of the gown. This panel was not over ten inches wide, and had on each side of it sprays of roses and rose leaves and ferns extending up to and over the satin folds of the girdle. On each panel also, between the perpendicular embroidery and the train, were several sprays of the embroidered roses.

The surplice pieces of the bodice, for their slight crossing is best designated as surplice, were also exquisitely embroidered with trails of roses, fine trails going up the edges next the centre, and several smaller, loose roses and foliage showing on each side toward the armholes and also on the sleeve proper below the elbows. These Mandarin sleeves, however, seemed simply an extension of the bodice, and were bordered at the edges over the arms by bands of smaller roses, and a border of roses and leaves also finished the hem of the gown.

The Court train swung out from a little above the Empire girdle. It was long and hung in deep boxplaited effect. It had sprays of roses at each side, and between it and the front of the gown there was a narrow panel effect in roses and foliage extending from the bodice to the hem of the gown. These panels, one on each hip, had the flowers arranged more in band fashions.

From under the Mandarin sleeves of satin came puffs of fine lace, finished by flounces of old rose point. All of this old rose point was of an exquisite pearly shade, and the satin in the embroidery roses matched it.

The veil came quite to the end of the train and was draped in scarf effect, and was extremely wide as well as long.

Mrs. Untermyer's Chiffon Gown.

Mrs. Samuel Untermyer, the mother of the bride, was gowned in an equally beautiful gown of pastel pink chiffon over soft white satin, the chiffon being embroidered in rich white silk floss roses afterward painted in very pale shade of pink and salmon-pink. This, too, was an Empire model, with the crossing fronts and a little tucked guimpe. It had Mandarin sleeves edged with the shaded roses embroidered solidly at the edge and from under these came little puffs of Brussels net having narrow ruffles of point lace as a finish.

There was a panel effect of embroidery in roses down the front of this gown, the embroidery being done on the chiffon and the roses extended up over the satin fold of the girdle. The edges of the surplice section crossing over the lace guimpe were edged with inch wide bands of white satin edged with tiny folds of pale pink satin. The skirt of the gown was embroidered all around the lower edges with roses, roses appearing in somewhat solid designs several inches from the hem. Up each side of the back there was also a single smaller row in a more open design of the shaded pink roses, and these, too, went up over the girdle. This gown was topped by a large hat in soft rose pink, trimmed by one long and very full castor brown ostrich plume.

White Chiffon and Satin.

Miss May Appleton Tuckerman, a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Bayard Tuckerman, who married G. Hermann Kinnicutt in the Church of the Incarnation, wore an extreme girlish and pretty wedding gown of shirred white chiffon over liberty satin, having a Court train of satin and a novel satin collarette arrangement of lace-bordered satin on the bodice.

The skirt proper was shirred at the waist line, and for fully seven inches below, falling thence in fine folds to the floor. About the bottom were several—three, I think—moderately wide tucks.

The bodice was surplice, and trailing slantingly from the left side at the waist line nearly to the shoulder on the right was a spray of orange blossoms. The bodice was a full-shirred chiffon affair, and forming a decoration was a satin collar much like a sailor collar, cut out very low about the neck to show a point-lace guimpe. This satin was bordered with a ruffle of point lace. In the front the ends lapped under at the sides of the surplice-crossing fronts. In the back the top of the Court train was inserted under this collar, whose ends crossed, and fell in a graduated box plait far out in the rear. Her point-lace veil was long, coming to the train, and was arranged in a diadem effect with orange blossoms.

Miss Tuckerman's attendants included her maid of honor and sister, Miss Joan Tuckerman, who is not yet out, and eight bridesmaids—the Misses Josephine Flagg, Dorothy Whitney, and Susan Sedgwick of New York; Dorothy Tuckerman and Julia Tuckerman, cousins of the bride, of Boston; Alice Meyer of Washington, and Edith Greene. All were frocked alike as to gowns, save that the maid of honor wore an ankle-length frock. They wore rose pink chiffon robes, having trailing skirts, decorated by a number of deep tucks between the hem and the knees. The skirts were gathered at the top and had rose-colored satin girdles.

The bodices had little V-shaped yokes of yellow lace with high stocks, and their mandarin sleeves had their body part of yellow lace edged by a two-inch hem of pink satin, and under sleeves of yellow lace or net. The bodices were arranged in semi-surplice effect, with drapery coming over the shoulders down the sides of both the front and the back, the ends being drawn in under the girdle, and the inner edges outlining the yellow lace yokes or guimpes. The part of the bodice next the lace was of the pink chiffon embroidered in silk in fine flowers and leaves in the same shade as the chiffon. The hats were of moderate size, with low crowns and slightly drooping brims. They were covered with extremely fine cream batiste with embroidered edges, and were done in open work embroidery all over. This batiste was draped carelessly but artistically over the crown, the edges coming over the rim of the hat brims and drooping down in the back in a pointed valance effect that came almost if not quite to the top of their lace stocks. Rose pink liberty ribbon was twisted about the crowns and looped at the back and sides in short chou loops, and on the hats at the left, next the front, crushed in between brim and crown and partially covering both were masses of pale pink apple blossoms. To carry out the apple blossom idea each attendant carried apple tree boughs with their red buds just changing to pink at the tips, the little leaves of the foliage just peeping out.

Mrs. Flagg's White and Black Frock.

Mrs. W. Allston Flagg, who returned in March from a long trip abroad with her two daughters, the Misses Josephine and Beatrice Flagg, wore at the Kinnicutt-Tuckerman wedding a distinctively Parisian gown of white chiffon, trimmed with Peking striped white and black liberty satin. The stripes, of equal width, were perhaps a bit more than half an inch wide. The full, sweeping skirt was decorated between its inner edge and the knees with three bands of this white-and-black striped material. The lower band was perhaps seven inches wide, the second five, and the third about four inches broad. There was a space of some four or five inches or more between the bands, and the widest and lowest was above the hem, so that the decoration extended up as far as the knees or further. The bodice had Mandarin sleeves, and these sleeves were outlined over the shoulder, where they joined the bodice, with a band perhaps two inches wide of the striped satin, and two or three inches from this on the sleeve itself was another band. The stripes all ran up and down, and the effect was as chic as possible. With this was worn a white-and-black hat.

Miss Burlingame in Ancestral Lace.

Miss Constance Burlingame had ancestral point lace and a new lattice-work effect in her satin bridal gown. She is a granddaughter of the late Anson Burlingame, at one time Minister to China, and a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Edward Livermore Burlingame. She married Tracy Hoppin, a son of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Street Hoppin of Providence, a grandson of the late William Warner Hoppin, at one time Governor of Rhode Island, and a nephew of William Warner Hoppin of New York. Mr. Hoppin's mother was Miss Clara Tracy, a sister of Mrs. J. Pierpont Morgan, who was also a member of the Boston Tracy family.

The bridal gown was Empire, with a collar and yoke of old point lace, with sleeves formed of single puffs of crisp tulle, shirred to fit the arm above the elbow, and finished there by fine ruchings of the tulle.

A little bolero jacket and oversleeves attached to the jacket, which, by the way, was fastened firmly to the gown in the back, formed of narrow milliner's folds of satin wove in a basket or lattice work design, showing interstices an inch square. Where the folds crossed, tiny flat, endless bows of satin, without ends, were fastened. This bolero was edged with a satin fold and stood out a bit from the gown save in the back, where it was fastened under the edging fold to the gown proper, and from under the fold the Empire train started. The bolero pointed up in the centre back in a slight point, where a large button mold, satin covered, was placed. The train swept out in a graduated box plait effect to the floor. In the front the lattice work covered the bust, and the sleeves covered the shoulder curves and then stood out in modified epaulet effect over the tulle undersleeves. Several narrow satin folds went over the shoulders, down the back and front of the lace and tulle guimpe, all the folds slanting in slightly toward the centre. The tulle veil, having a deep border of point lace, was arranged quite high above her pompadour and had sprays of orange blossoms arranged in cluster effect, outlining a diadem. She carried valley lilies.

Miss Mary Dows, a niece of Mrs. Benjamin Brewster, was Miss Burlingame's only attendant. Her white chiffon robe had the skirt bordered with a band fully twenty inches wide of pale pinkish and creamy-hued roses on a grayish background; the band, woven in the goods, of course, was edged on each side with a band varying—according to the floral design—from four to six inches in depth of so dark a shade as to appear black, which it may, indeed, easily have been. The bodice showed narrow but full loose bretelles of the flowered chiffon in smaller designs of roses edged in the same way and going over the shoulder from the back of the girdle to the front.

Miss Dows's large hat was cream white, straw trimmed, with very large white roses just tinged in places with pink, and their leaves. These roses were set on in bunch effects. The hat was raised a little at the left back and a chou of white satin ribbon was fastened under it. She carried a bouquet of pink rosea.

Mrs. Edward L. Burlingame, the bride's mother, wore a lilac-colored chiffon cloth gown showing a guimpe and undersleeves of white lace and white chiffon. In the centre, front, and back of the bodice, and also in the top of each elbow sleeve, the section of the chiffon was cut away, and the diamond-shaped openings were filled in with a lattice work of half-inch velvet ribbon in a shading quite a bit darker than the gown. The lattice work interstices were diamond shaped. She wore a small heliotrope hat, with aigrettes to match.

Mrs. Frederick S. Hoppin, the bridegroom's mother, was in soft gray chiffon satin, a skirt and skirted coat effect. Both the coat and the skirt were trimmed with lengthwise bands of rich silver embroidery. This gown was topped by a gray hat with silver plumes.

Mrs. H. L. Satterlee in White and Black.

Mrs. Baylies in Dark-Blue Faille.

Mrs. Edmund L. Baylies, at the Hoppin-Burlingame wedding, wore a dark-blue faille costume and Eton coat, and skirt. The coat was a bit novel in that it had a suggestion of a pony coat front, while the back was the regulation Eton, being almost tight-fitting and being cut up a trifle in the centre, and having the side seams lapped over toward the back of the coat, this last being one piece. The front of the coat had on each side either a seam lapped like a fold or narrow bands of velvet. The coat closed down the front with a double row of large hollow buckle effects in cut steel. Probably these buckles were fastened each side of the centre, and the real closing was effected by means of invisible eyes and hooks. These buckles from the bust down gave a vest effect. The long coat sleeves had turned-back slightly flaring cuffs of faille, and velvet, too, I think, with the back edges slashed and cut longer. The steel buckle effect was also repeated on the cuffs.

The sweeping skirt was glove fitting about the hips and had in the centre back several inward turned and invisible plaits that met in the centre back. Her hat was a very small, round, brown, rough, satin finished straw, with a crown perhaps an inch high. This was trimmed with dark green satin ribbon, twisted about the crown and forming the little cachepeigne, and at each side of the crown were green wings. She wore a white ostrich feather boa, the feathers being short and undercurling crosswise of the boa. This ended in the front above the waist line with white ribbon loops.

One of the most beautiful gowns seen was a white chiffon with a border so deep it went to the knees of rich, deep, and pale pink roses with greenish leaves, the roses being bordered on each edge by a velvet in a rich deep blue some five inches wide. The bodice also showed the roses set in velvet.

Miss Woolworth's Paneled Robe.

Miss Edna Woolworth, who on Wednesday in the Church of the Heavenly Rest married Franklyn Laws Hutton, wore a white satin Empire princess robe, close fitting at the front and sides, and with the modified Empire back and sweeping train. The collar, yoke, and sleeves were of point lace, the top of the sleeves being deep epaulets, and the under sleeves small puffs of lace.

In the front of the robe a panel of rich lace extended from the yoke to the hem of the gown, and this was outlined twice on each edge with folds of satin. Otherwise the gown was severely plain. Her veil was a heavy piece of uncommonly rich lace fastened with orange blossoms.

The matron of honor, her sister, Mrs. Charles McCann, wore a white chiffon gown sprayed with lavender lilacs. The full skirt had a hem of lilac-colored satin, and several inches above this was a straight insertion of white lace some five inches deep, and above this was another lace insertion of about the same width, but curving in an exaggerated serpentine fashion, the lower rounded points being some sixteen inches below the upward curves. About the waist line the skirt was apparently shirred in. The gathered bodice opened over a white lace guimpe, and deep armholes in mandarin effect were outlined by folds of lilac satin. The six-inch mandarin sleeves were also finished with satin folds.

Mrs. McCann wore an immense round high-crowned yellow isghorn hat trimmed with a quantity of large, full lilac colored ostrich plumes that started from the base of the crown and nodded toward the front and sides, and laid across the right side front of the brim was one stem of pale bluish wheat ears, with a single tiny pink rose at its base, half covered by a lilac ostrich tip. The only bit of hat really showing, save the edges of the hat's brim in places, was the centre back, and there was not even a hat band. One of the latest things in millinery is to have hats trimmed with feathers alone, the latter being of such quality and thickness that the tendrils conceal the bases. She carried a bouquet of purple lilacs, with showers of lilies of the valley.

Miss Jessie Woolworth, the maid of honor, was in white chiffon, made with a round skirt. The skirt had three deep ruffled tucks, dividing it into three sections, and between these tucks were wide insertions of rich white lace. The bodice had folds of white satin going over the shoulders, to which was attached small white silk passementerie, with swinging balls at the edges, and two long ends swung from a point a little more than half way between neck and waist and ended in tassels. Her large white hat was laden with sweeping, limp white ostrich plumes.

Mrs. Franklyn Woolworth, the mother of the bride, was in white chiffon cloth, trimmed with bands perhaps five inches wide of silver thread, embroidered chiffon bands, the silver showing merely as threads, the whole being apparently mounted chiffon colored satin. She wore a large white tulle and lace hat, trimmed with a large pale blue ostrich plume.

Mrs. Glen Collins in Gray.

Mrs. Glen Collins (Miss Nathalie Schenck) was seen on Fifth Avenue on Wednesday in a light gray cloth gown, topped by a mandarin jacket in gray, with blue silk appliques and gray silk braid as a trimming.

The skirt of the gown was kilted with regular, full, wide side plaits going all around it. The skirt not only touched but swept, and its raising showed a petticoat of white liberty satin cut into inch wide bands by numerous lace insertions of the same width.

The little coat would have been square in the back had it not been longer than it was wide. It came below the waist line, even below the widest part of the hips, and hung perfectly straight. In the front it hung square and straight also, but did not come as far as the waist line. The sleeves were the elbow kimono sleeves. The material was gray, exactly the color of the gown, and perhaps of the same material, and on this were irregular patches like appliques of bright almost sapphire blue silk. Both gray and blue were partially concealed by thin, flat pale gray silk braid, perhaps a third of an inch wide, that traced designs all over the jacket, and particularly at the edges and corners, where it was wound into floral designs. The sleeves were similarly treated.

A Practical Coat.

A woman in an orchestra chair at the Manhattan Opera House last week recently donned before leaving a sensible coat in light tan cloth showing a yellow tinge, relieved by bronze brown velvet. The coat came to within ten inches of the floor, and had a series of little simulated capes about the neck, with sleeves showing a series of simulated cuffs, and a double box plait down the back. In detail the coat began with a little flat circular collar section of the bronze brown velvet. This was deeper in the centre back and at the side fronts than at the points between, and it tapered down the front to nothing at all, disappearing under the cloth fronts. Then came three circular sections of the cloth, the outer one coming to the armholes; these went across the back and down over the shoulders to the bottom of the coat, the top one forming the inner edges of the coat; these were each stitched about a quarter of an inch from their edges to the foundation.

In the centre back a double box plait was laid. This was some seven inches wide at the top by fourteen at the bottom, and was pressed in, the inner box plait being fastened twice at each side at both the top and the bottom by two bronze buttons an inch across, eight buttons in all.

The coat, which was flat at the bottom line of this yoke arrangement, hung in full folds at the bottom, it being gored to spread. The front hung straight and flat owing to the stitched bands, and was closed down the front by a row of the bronze buttons and loops of silk cord. Across the fronts, also above the bust, was arranged a double row of bronze buttons, two on each plait or band, the upper row an inch and a half above the row below.

The sleeves were immense and were plaited at the top into armholes of extreme width, and were again plaited above the wrists into shaped flaring cuffs of the cloth, each made of three three-inch biss sections of the cloth, arranged to overlap and stitched at the bottom to the foundation and at the top also, but detached at that point. The cuffs flared at the top and were open at the back seam, each three-inch section showing two bronze buttons somewhat smaller than those on the body of the coat. These buttons made a straight up and down line at the back, and the lower section had its half next the bands of bronze velvet, or, rather, the velvet was inlaid.

From under the lowest of the three neck pieces a double piece of the bronze velvet came out over the sleeve tops. This formed a crescent-shaped epaulet and relieved the otherwise too drooping shoulder line, so ugly and yet the fashion at the moment.

In a Bridal Trousseau.

A handsome gray panne velvet reception gown in the trousseau of a bride has a trailing skirt, glove fitting at the front and sides, in the back also, but with a curious drapery caught into a panel outlined at the sides with bands of Irish crochet lace. These bands are two inches wide at the top by ten at the bottom, and the size of the flowers is carefully graduated. The panel section is five inches wide at the top, the material being laid in narrow overlapping plaits. Eight inches below the waist line a silver ornament crosses like a large flat buckle, and holds the plaits down, and eight inches lower there is a second longer or wider buckle. The plaited material is cut with a bias edge, and as it is plaited it forms a cascade at the edges, and being of gray crêpe de chine, the back showing as it falls, does not detract from its appearance. The edge is finished by a fine line of embroidery in silver, just a thread or two outlining a sort of coral stitch. The cascade effect begins a little below the knee line.

The top is on the pinafore order, the stock, guimpe and elbow length sleeves being of baby Irish crochet, and over this is slipped the panne velvet pinafore. This pinafore shows a deep wedge-shaped yoke of heavy Irish lace, trimmed in turn with silver arabesques and small, flat, semi-worked-in bow knots of narrow gray velvet ribbon.

The panne velvet itself forms the lower quarter of the bodice and is draped like a scarf around the body and over the shoulders. At the shoulder, like extensions, forming a part of the bodice, are cut to form straight-down extensions six inches wide over the lace undersleeves. Large silver cabochons are caught at both the front and the back where the sleeves join the bodice, and in the centre, back and front, a little above the waist line, a still larger cabochon is fastened. The scarf-like arrangement of the velvet on the lower part of the bodice forms the girdle also. The velvet sleeve sections are faced with cloth of silver, and the lace falls in wide frills over the elbows.

One on the Greek.

SPEAKING of brain storms," said Billy the Bell Hop, "there was an Englishman came in here the other day who had about fifty-seven different varieties. He wanted to see one of his countrymen who was a Peace Commissioner. He sent up his card, and the Commissioner sent word for him to come on up. Just around the corner of the room clerk's desk there are three telephone booths, all made of polished brass. There was a Greek scrub man at work in front of the booths. Well, the Britisher, after being told by the clerk to go right up, turned the corner and almost stumbled over the Greek.

"'Me good man, where is the lift?' he asked. The Greek scrambled to his feet and grinned and bowed and pointed to the three telephone booths. He had never heard of a lift.

"The Britisher entered the first booth, closed the door, and sat down in the chair. He didn't seem to notice the telephone there at all. Well, Sir, he waited there for the lift to lift. He then waited some more, but naturally enough it didn't go up a bit. He finally turned around in the chair and looked out. The view was just the same as when he had entered. Then he hustled out. The Greek was still there, bowing and salaaming to beat the cars.

"'You bloomin' servitor. Why in thunder don't the lift go up?' said the Britisher. The Greek bowed some more and grinned with what he evidently intended as a pleasant smile. He waved again at the telephone booths. The Britisher reentered the little boxlike affair and again awaited results. But there were none.

"'When he backed out this time his face was very red, and he was puffing like an automobile. He seemed about to kill the Greek scrubber. Just then I happened his way.

"'What is the matter with your blarsted lifts?' he sputtered.

"'What? Elevators, do you mean?' I asked. 'Why right around here, Sir.'

"And I pointed to the elevators. The Britisher dashed into the nearest one, and I could see him biting his big mustache and looking apoplectic as the elevator slowly ascended. I hope he survived the storm in that precious British brain of his."

IN THE WORLD OF ART AND ARTISTS

The New Luxembourg Museum in Paris

M. Benedite Goes Back Charmed with American Hospitality and Tells of the Plans for a New Luxembourg.

LEONCE BENEDITE is Director of the Luxembourg Museum in Paris, where the French Government exhibits the paintings and sculptures bought from the two Salons during their annual shows in the Grand Palais on the Champs Elysées, and such gifts as are made by the society called Amis du Luxembourg, an association of amateurs who help to increase the national collection.

M. Bénédite returned last week from Pittsburg, where he was a guest of the Carnegie Institute, having obtained about Easter time a furlough from the directory of French museums to make a trip to America.

"My visit," remarked M. Bénédite, "is entirely unofficial. It was very lucky for me that the ceremonies of Founder's Day in Pittsburg should fall within a period when there is little doing in Paris. I leave by the Provence to-day, and shall be in good time for the opening of the old Salon, while the 'Nationale' will be in its early weeks."

"You have been long identified with the Luxembourg?"

"When the collections were taken out of the Luxembourg Palace, twenty-one years ago, because the Senate required the galleries, and were transferred to the Orangerie near by, I became Director. So you see the collections have been my constant care for nearly a quarter of a century."

"How comes it," he was asked, "that the foreign contingent, most of the paintings in your collections by outsiders, were not visible last Summer?"

"That was only a temporary eclipse due to lack of space. You know, perhaps, that we have been terribly cramped for room, notwithstanding the arrangement which permits the transfer to the Louvre of works by artists who have been dead ten years?

"Yes? Well, I am glad to say that we are to migrate from the Orangerie into quarters more suitable to the importance of our national collections of contemporary art."

"Whither away?"

"Just across the Rue de Vaugirard into the buildings recently occupied by the Sulpitians as a seminary for priests. Before I left Paris I had the pleasure of seeing plans of the new galleries, which ought to be ready some time early in 1909."

"And will the Orangeris be torn down or used for other purposes?"

"I do not know. It is not in my power to dispose of the building which has been so long the home of the moderns, a stepping-stone to the Louvre. But I hope that it will remain for use as a place to hold exhibitions. We need such galleries for special shows, and there is also a demand for it on the part of residents in that part of Paris, which is a long distance from the Champs Elysées. It seems to me that it would be poor economy to use for any other purpose a series of galleries all arranged for exhibitions—lighting, heating, wall spaces, entrance, large and small rooms, &c. We Frenchmen are very reasonable beings in such matters; we hate to waste money; perhaps you may call us parsimonious."

"The Carnegie Institute has cost a pretty penny—"

"Ah, that is a wonderful creation of Mr. Carnegie! I take off my hat to him. Lorenzo il Magnifico of Florence did great things for Italian art; but then Lorenzo was born and bred to such ideas. What strikes my imagination is to find an ironmaster who has passed his life in conflict with economical ideas and commercial facts having the capacity or indeed even the conception of erecting such a home of the fine arts! We like to think of the past as greater in many ways than the present, but when we come to such establishments as the Carnegie Institute we grope about through history in vain to find a parallel.

"Oh, yes, I have enjoyed every day spent in America, and consider myself fortunate to have escaped being killed by kindness. I only wish my vacation were longer in order to see more of your art museums. New York, Chicago, Boston, and Philadelphia may be the cities where the largest exist, but there are many others I hear about yet cannot reach. Besides, even those I can see deserve a longer inspection."

"Have you any suggestions to make regarding those you have visited?"

"I can only say that the few I hastily visited did not suggest any new ideas in the arrangement of art museums. When I come again I hope to have plenty of time to examine everything. My coming year will be the liveliest possible, for the new Luxembourg will be under way."

"Are there new features?"

"We shall be able to realize the dreams of my predecessors and my own. You know, it has always been the aim of Directors of the Luxembourg to have historical collections setting forth the changes and progress of contemporary art during the preceding quarter of a century."

"Independently of the other national museums?"

"Yes. You see, the Luxembourg is the oldest of our museums; it was the germ whence the Louvre and other museums sprang. As far back as 1750 a certain art critic of the Salons of that time, named La Font de Saint Yenne, suggested that the royal pictures should be brought together in the Luxembourg Palace and he shown to the public twice a week. There were private collections which the public could not see, and there were pictures in churches—that was all. His idea seemed good. Mme. de Pompadour was one of those who aided, and the gallery was formed. The pictures were chiefly Dutch genre and landscapes of no great size, paintings by Teniers, Ostade, Cuyp, Ruisdael, &c., which may account for the art of Chardin and other French painters of genre and still life. At one time these collections were sent to the Louvre, and after they came back they were levied on to fill gaps, as in 1815, when the Allies forced the return of many pictures seized in different countries by Napoleon. But the idea of making the Luxembourg a gallery of contemporary paintings was not carried out until 1818. The Luxembourg collection, as it now is, dates from that year."

"And the new property?"

"It was the seminary of the Sulpitians. The building is a square of several stories surrounding a courtyard, with a chapel extending from one side of the square. We shall glass over the court, and this, together with the chapel, will give us a fine place for sculpture. The lower stories will provide wall space for prints and medals; there, too, will be the cases for arts and crafts. The upper stories will be thrown into one high gallery with top-light, giving many times the space now at our disposition in the Orangerie. There is a fine garden about the former seminary and chapel extending right up to the Rue de Vaugirard, so that one will only have to cross that quiet street to pass from the Luxembourg gardens to our own garden."

"You will rearrange the exhibits?"

"Yes, indeed. And as regards modern work by foreigners, we hope to have separate galleries for the American, British, German, Italian, and other pictures; so that students can be posted on the chief artists in the different countries. We intend to have a carefully organized collection which will be instructive historically, as well as attractive by reason of the quality of art works admitted."

Current Art Notes.

ACADEMY exhibitions may vary from year to year; one may present several sensational pictures and a low average of work, another a majority of excellent canvases without a single eminent masterpiece, but on the commercial side they remain pretty constantly the same. Somewhere around twenty thousand is the usual Academy figure, and the show which ended last Sunday doesn't differ from the Academies that went before. Two paintings brought $2,000 each—namely, the group by Sergeant Kendall, bought for his gift to the National Gallery, Washington, by Mr. William T. Evans, and the landscape by J. Francis Murphy, bought by Mr. Herman Schaus. Then there were the fine landscape in the South Gallery by Redfield—"Village of Centre Bridge," for which Mr. Heye paid $1,500—and the Italian peasant woman by Walter Shirlaw, called "Homeward," which was bought by Mrs. Page of Boston for a like sum. These four pictures represent nearly half the total amount paid for pictures and sculptures at the close of the exhibition. The aggregate then was close to $16,000, with probability in favor of further sales to waverers, which would bring the amount to $20,000. Thirty pictures out of 400, or, to be exact, 27 out of 378, is not a success to boast of. It reinforces in the most practical way the argument that our painters have not yet hit upon the kind of painting that attracts the people, or else that they have not discovered effective methods to get their pictures before the buying public. Probably both arguments are safe. The odd thing in this permanent and apparently incurable trait of the National Academy is the stubborn belief of Academicians that theirs is the best of methods. Why should they know how to sell as well as paint?

The Grolier Club is holding a very delightful exhibition which may be seen on presentation of a personal card until April 29. It consists of lithographs engraved and printed by James McNeil Whistler lent by members of the club who are not mentioned in the next catalogue. This is a department of Whistler's work very little known, partly because the editions were small, partly because lithographs have suffered for many decades under the stigma of vulgarity. And no wonder. Between the ordinary lithograph and the print which Whistler lovingly lifted off his private press there is a gap not easily estimated. There are 160 numbers, including portraits of Count Robert de Montesquiou; Joseph Pennell, Henley the writer, Lady Haden the artist's sister, Miss Philip his executrix, Miss Charlotte R. Williams, Dr. Whistler his brother, Walter Sickert the painter, Miss Howells, and that smith that he drew so often.

There are sketches of models, draped and nude, bits of the Luxembourg, the Louvre, and the Hotel Colbert; views on the Thames, and many other sketches that repay examination.

The Salon des Independents in Paris has a few pictures that show artistic quality, but the public lingers before others which attract for other reasons. One represents a wrestling match between two nude champions surrounded by a circle of nude onlookers. In itself this repulsive scene, for it has no beauty of line, composition, or flesh tints, would not arrest the attention, but one sees that it is a big caricature in which all participants are the rulers or temporary heads of nations. The wrestlers are the Emperors of Russia and Japan, the onlookers Loubet of France, Wilhelm of Germany, Franz Josef of Austria, Victor of Italy, young Alphonso of Spain, Edward of England, &c., the older men represented in grossly caricatured shapes. A newspaper during to publish such a picture might expect to have a hard time with the police.

Panels by J. W. Alexander in Carnegie Institute

One Painting Sixty-five Feet in Length and a Series of Fifteen Smaller Ones Comprise the Largest Commission Ever Assigned to One Artist.

THE paintings by John W. Alexander, which appear in the Pictorial Section of to-day's TIMES, compose part of the mural decorations which he has executed for the recently dedicated Carnegie Institute.

The largest painting of the group is composed of five panels. It is sixty-five feet long and sixteen feet high, and is placed above the grand stairway. The small panels form a separate series each measuring four feet by ten and one-half feet. There are fifteen of these paintings set three feet apart in the marble walls of the rotunda. Because of their size and number, the work on all of the paintings has occupied Mr. Alexander's entire time for two years. The paintings were completed and put in place only four weeks previous to the opening of the new building.

The fifteen small panels represent "Labor"—the brutal labor of the strong men who have to toil with the coarse elements and products of the earth—surrounded by the intense heat, smoke, and flames of Pittsburg foundries.

The rich and powerful manufacturing city which has arisen from this mighty labor is symbolized in the large painting. The armored figure typifying force and resistance is "Pittsburg." To the left is a chorus of trumpeters, heralding his power throughout the world. Below roll billows of smoke in which are faintly suggested the figures of writhing demons, the sparks amid the smoke forming the eyes of the fiends. To the right is a procession bringing tributes from many nations. One is crowning "Pittsburg" the foremost manufacturing city in the world. The other floating figures are bringing offerings of poetry, art, music, textiles, jewels—all that invariably follows success and power.

The panels representing "Labor" are painted in subdued tones, which harmonize exceedingly with the buff-colored Hauteville marble of the rotunda walls. The large painting is unusually composed, the important figure of the picture being placed very much to the left of the centre. In color it is very brilliant. The gray-blue armor of "Pittsburg" is contrasted with the bright red and strong green in the costumes of the figures near him. In the centre panel red is almost eliminated; there are only touches of it here and there in the green and gold costumes of the other figures. The colors in the fourth panel balance with those in the second—yellow and pinkish red predominating. A brilliant glow from the blazing furnaces beneath penetrates the smoke and steam enveloping all of the figures and illuminates the entire painting.

The Carnegie Institute Directors unanimously chose Mr. Alexander to execute the decorations for the building, and the commission is the largest ever given to one artist. The work was so assigned to assure the absolute harmony of decoration throughout—a result that is not always attained when several artists' efforts are combined.

Mr. Alexander, too, was peculiarly fitted for the work: he was born in Pittsburg and spent his early life there. When a boy the movement, the life, the vast force about the mills fascinated him, and every Saturday he roamed from one to another, studying the men at their toil. He left Pittsburg when only seventeen, but the power of the city's industries made a tremendous impression—an impression that many years of study and work in New York and abroad have never effaced.

With the Artists.

Mr. Huret has an article in Figaro about the German Emperor, in which the latter is made to say concerning Auguste Rodin—the conversation having taken place in the studio of the sculptor, Kraus—"This Rodin has a fame quite unbelievable. Here are the English making him President of the International Society in place of Whistler! But that's quite absurd; for they don't like him at all. His statue of Balzac made a great noise at the time, but all the world considered it ridiculous. Those drawings of his, which the Secession painters exhibited, would not be looked at in France. Yet here our good Berliners gaze on them wide-eyed and find them wonderful." Words like these will endear Rodin to German artists and may make him truly popular in France, so convinced are they on both sides of the border that in matters of art the Kaiser is always mistaken.

A. Phimister Proctor has some late water color paintings of animals on permanent view at the Montross Gallery. One is a picture of a stag standing alert; a second is a big grizzly bear trotting along, and another is a panther sneaking over the ground. Each animal is portrayed amid his wild haunts, surrounded by a view of Rocky Mountain solitude. Mr. Proctor makes annual trips to the Rockies to study the wild animals in their native environment.

At the Keppel Gallery the etchings by Auders Zorn have given place to drawings and etchings by C. F. Daubigny. They complete the impression left by this charming master's oil paintings, and the introduction to the catalogue contributed by Robert J. Wickenden, a friend of the late painter's family, aids in the enjoyment given by these attractive works of art. They will remain the rest of the month.

Mary Helen Carlisle has just finished a miniature portrait of the very young son of Mrs. Marshall Clyde. Wearing miniatures has become again the vogue in London. Many women there have their babies' faces painted in tiny miniatures, which are then set in frames studded with pearls or other stones, and worn as pendants. Occasionally Miss Carlisle makes a double portrait in these very small pictures.

With the Musicians in Concert and Recital

Music in American Colleges.

THERE are not a few indications that the movement to increase the importance of the study of music as a branch of liberal education in American colleges and universities is making a steady headway. A few weeks ago there was some discussion of the subject in this column, in which attention was called to the effort making at Harvard under Prof. Spalding's enthusiastic initiative to transfer the principal attraction from the "grammatical and theoretical" side of the subject to appreciation of the art on the part of the less technically trained. In Prof. Spalding's own words, "it should be the purpose of musical study in the colleges to help students to an understanding and knowledge of music as the students of the great literatures of the world are helped to an understanding of them."

It was one of the late Prof. Paine's desires to have music put into the list of subjects upon which at their option candidates for admission to college might pass examinations and receive a due proportion of credit. How far this has already been done is shown by the adoption of the College Entrance Examination Board of the Eastern colleges of a scheme of subjects on which such credit may be given. It includes harmony and counterpoint and musical performance; but the most interesting feature is the division entitled "Musical Appreciation." This requires one year's training, three lessons a week, or its equivalent. The candidate is expected to have "a general knowledge of the principal musical forms, and of their historical development"; a general knowledge of the lives and environment of "at least ten composers," five of whom are prescribed, the other five to be chosen from a list of twelve; and finally, familiarity with certain designated works; the works set for this year include music by Bach, Handel, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, and other composers down to Schumann and Wagner. "Familiarity" is thus explained: "The candidate will be expected to identify characteristic portions of the works set, when played by the examiner; and to give intelligent information concerning the form and character of the works themselves. The test will not require ability to perform nor to read from printed music."

Only four of the Eastern colleges permit the offering of such an examination as a part of the entrance requirements, and it is apparently at the present time something of an experiment. It involves a possible readjustment of the study in the preparatory schools, which is likely to come slowly, although one school is already reported that has made provision for fully developed courses in musical appreciation, theory of music, and musical performance, based upon the recent action of the College Examination Board.

The standing of the subject at Columbia University is already that of the most dignified "humanities;" as President Butler not long ago called it, "an integral element of culture." And for this Prof. McWhood has been working hard and intelligently. He himself not long ago called attention to the need for the implanting of the aesthetic impulse in the mind of every student that is capable of the awakening. "It is quite possible for a student to remain four years in an institution that is supposed to impart liberal culture, and finally to receive the Baccalaureate degree in arts, without having come in contact with any aesthetic influence."

The extension of this influence is what the chair of music in the colleges ought largely, indeed chiefly, to be devoted to. And there is need not only of study and the illuminating guidance of a teacher, but also of the frequent listening to music itself in the interpretation of an artist.

CROTCHETS.

Mme. Schumann-Heink in her Chicago song recital last week used a new song by a young American composer, Louise Llewellyn, with words by Swinburne, called "A Prayer of Thanksgiving." Miss Llewellyn is a daughter of a former Governor of Kansas, and has had several songs published, including "The Lament of a Kiss;" and "The Spider and the Fly." She has spent some time recently studying in Paris, and returns in June to work under Reynaldo Hahn.

SHOULD ACTRESSES MARRY?

Footlight Favorites Take Up a Subject Previously Discussed by Playgoers.

FOLLOWING a discussion at the Playgoers' Club as to whether actresses should marry, the London Daily Express sent out for opinion upon the subject from actresses themselves, which appears to have been exactly what the playgoers themselves forgot to do. These are some of the replies:

MISS EDNA MAY.

"I think every woman should marry, actress or otherwise."

MISS MARIE STUDHOLME.

"I hope nobody will insist on actresses marrying dramatic critics. I should hate to be doomed to marry one of the men who wrote the early notices about 'My Darling.' That sort of thing would not be fair to the dramatic critic either, because I am sure his wife would make him say awful things about all the other actresses.

"Don't you think that the Playgoers Club might be induced to let actresses marry whom they like? A woman ought not to marry anybody but the man she loves.

"I think every actress should decide the matter for herself, and I am fairly certain they will do so. Painters marry and poets marry. Who ever heard of their art suffering for it? Why, then, should an actress?"

MISS SYBIL ARUNDALE.

"The luckiest thing an actress can do is to marry a man who can keep her, so that she can leave the stage.

"It is hopeless to be married if you remain on the stage, I should imagine. It kills home life. I should hate to see my husband making love to another girl on the stage.

"And it is no good marrying a man who is on the stage unless he is in a fine position and you can be sure of acting with him. That is all right, and likely to be happy. That is the next best thing to marrying and leaving the stage altogether.

"But to marry an actor you do not act with must be heart-breaking.

"The stage is all right for girls who like supper parties. It is no place for those who want to lead a quiet, domesticated life."

MISS EVA MOORE.

MR. CYRIL MAUDE.

"By all means let an actress marry if she wants to and let her marry the man she loves. It seems to me that an actress would be most happy in her married life if her husband were an actor, because their hours would be similar, and they could be more together.

"One might as well discuss the question of whom should a doctor or a barrister marry. After all, an actress is a woman, and, woman-like, will doubtless marry the man she loves. And we all know that that is the great desideratum. Really, I do not believe it makes the slightest difference to a real artist whether he or she is married or single.

"The question of an actress marrying a layman is always open to debate, because an actress must give so much of her life to her profession, to her art, that she may be expected to set the demands of her art against the dictates of her affection for her husband.

"Is not the question, viewed from that standpoint, not whom should an actress marry, but who should marry an actress?"

MR. JAMES WELCH.

"I wish those kindly intentioned friends of the stage who meet to discuss these more or less intimate matters concerning actors and actresses, such as what we eat, what we wear, and what kind of tooth powder we use, would leave us and our private lives alone. If, instead of asking such questions as 'Should actresses marry' they would take an intelligent interest in our performances, we should have a much greater chance of making the profession of acting an art."

New York's Expensive Public Library

When Completed It Will Have Cost $10,000,000 or More, but Will Be a Monument to Municipal Taste in Architecture

IN 1910 or 1911 the New York Public Library will be completed, at a total cost to the city of $10,000,000. That, in a sentence, gives the latest development regarding the great white structure that has been in process of erection during the past eight years in Bryant Park. This final estimate of the cost of the building was made last week by Mayor McClellan, in connection with the giving out of a contract for $3,300,000 for the interior work; the estimate of the time that is needed to finish the library is based on the opinions of the various officials who are taking an active part in its construction.

This final development of the work on the Public Library is in startling contrast with the original plans. Just ten years ago the Legislature at Albany passed an act authorizing the City of New York to build a library in Bryant Park for a sum not to exceed $2,500,000. Following the passage of this act the Trustees of the library invited the architects of the city to compete for plans. According to the method adopted the first competition was an open one and was engaged in by eighty architects. From these the best six were chosen by a committee composed of three Trustees, three architects, and the Director of the library. A second competition was then held between the six architects selected by the committee and six other architects named by the Trustees. As a result of this double competition the award for the building of the library was given to the firm of Carerre & Hastings.

It was not until the architects and plans were thus determined that the discovery was made that the cost of the library would probably exceed the limit contemplated by the act of the Legislature. As this difference in the preliminary calculations is explained to-day, the sum of $2,500,000 was merely an estimate for a plain brick building about the size required for the library, the erection of which was roughly figured at a rate of 30 cents a cubic foot. The city authorities, however, taking the matter up after the architects' competition, decided that a building of the character implied in a great public library called for the best material to be used in its construction. This view seemed to meet with the popular approval, and it was thereupon determined that the library should be built throughout with the best white marble: at the same time the original plans were somewhat enlarged. This made necessary a greater expenditure of money than was at first intended. An amendment to the original act authorizing the building of the library was passed in 1900, leaving the whole question of cost to the discretion of the Board of Estimate. It was still asserted, however—and the idea was maintained until a year ago—that the cost of the library would not exceed $5,000,000, just half the amount that is now said to be required.

With the removal of the legislative restriction as to the cost the city has taken up the work of building the library step by step in awards to various contractors. As the library is situated in one of the city parks the Park Commissioner is the official having this work particularly in charge.

Awarding the Contracts.

"Every contract for the building of the library has to pass through five hands before it is awarded," explained Park Commissioner Herrman to a TIMES reporter, "according to the following method: The architects, consulting with the Trustees, prepare applications and specifications for contracts and send them to the Park Board. The latter then submits these applications to the Board of Estimate, whence they go for approval to the Corporation Counsel. They are then returned to the Park Board and bids are advertised for. The resulting bids are opened by the Park Board and submitted to the Board of Estimate. From these bids the latter selects, not necessarily the lowest, but the one which, in the judgment of the board, will best secure the efficient performance of the work required. This work is then carried out under the joint supervision of the architects and the Park Board.

"In accordance with this method the building of the library has been carried on for the last eight years under six contracts. The first of these was awarded in June, 1899, to Eugene Lentilhon for the removal of the old reservoir, at a cost of $288,344.75. The second, in March, 1901, to H. Probst, for the construction of a vault on the Fortieth Street front, for $35,567.80. The third, in January, 1902, to Thielman & Co., for the removal of rock for the foundation, $27,183.76. The fourth, in August, 1902, to Norcross Brothers, for the erection of the superstructure, $2,866,124. The fifth, in January, 1905, to the Snead & Co. Iron Works, for building the book stacks, $916,703. The sixth, in January, 1905, to Frank Dobson, for the steam power and ventilating plants, $299,000. These contracts brought the cost of the library, up to the beginning of this year, to the sum of $4,432,923.31. To this has been added a contract to M. J. O'Brien for plumbing, $100,000. Last week the largest of all the contracts was awarded the John Pierce Company for interior finish, $3,300,000, making the total contracts that have been awarded to date $7,832,923.31. There are still something like three more contracts to be given out, covering the electric work, the approaches to the building, and the furniture. Whether these additional contracts will bring the final cost of the library up to the $10,000,000 announced by the Mayor remains to be seen."

According to the information given by the officials of the Park Board the $3,300,000 awarded last week is to be expended on "all the work necessary to complete the library, with the exception of that undertaken by the contracts already awarded and still to be awarded." This means that the contractor is to put in the interior masonry, the marble, stone, tile, bronze, and iron work, as well as all the cabinet work, hardware, painting, general finishing, and cleaning. This involves the plastering, flooring, and decorating of a mile of corridors and the adorning of the inside of a structure whose cubical contents are 7,500,000 feet. It does not include, however, any mural paintings or interior statuary, nor any decoration of an essentially aesthetic nature; whatever the library will have of such adornment is left entirely to the future. As the building is planned to-day, under this last contract, the aim is to make it an essentially "working library," without any attempt to include in its interior decorations such artistic features as have made the Congressional Library at Washington famous. The interior finish, however, will be rich of its kind. Thus, many of the ceilings will be of carved and gilded wood, the floors of inlaid marble, and the walls of the same material. Nine kinds of marble are to be used in this finishing work, most of them from European quarries, principally from Siena, Italy, and Limoges, France. According to the terms of the contract the John Pierce Company is required to complete the work within three years from its commencement.

How Delays Were Caused.

Judging by the experience of the Trustees with the other contractors, a time limit in such matters is hard to observe. Thus, the Norcross contract for the erection of the superstructure was to have been finished nearly two and a half years ago—it still lacks completion. The excuse made by the contractors in this particular case has been that it was impossible to get the particular marble used in the construction of the library from the quarry as fast as it was needed. Only 25 per cent. of this marble came up to the specifications, leaving the remainder useless for library purposes. Then the Norcross award was held up for eight months on account of a suit brought in the courts by a contractor whose bid for the same work was $170,000 less than that of Norcross Brothers. Similar delay was encountered by the contractor for the book stacks, who was kept from his work for the space of a year by an order of the court in the suit of the Hecla Iron Works, whose bid was $200,000 less than the Snead Company's bid.

A year ago the Trustees appointed a special commission, with John L. Cadwalader as Chairman, to inquire into the cause of the delay in the completion of the library. Nothing came of the inquiry except the statement that red tape in the city departments was largely to blame, and that from the outlook at that time it was not likely the library would be finished for four or five years. This "red tape" has also been the subject of complaint on the part of the architects, who have added to this cause for delay the fact that the work has several times been impeded by labor troubles as well as the slow process of getting the requisite marble from the Vermont quarries.

The library when completed will be the largest marble building in the world, with the exception, of course, of the Capitol at Washington. It is also said to represent the second greatest single contract for a building that was ever given out in the United States, the New York County Court House, erected during the Tweed régime at a cost of $12,000,000, being the first. Taking the Mayor's estimate as a basis for comparison, the New York Library will cost $3,655,000 more than the Library of Congress and $7,514,000 more than the Boston Public Library. Neither of the last-named buildings is of marble. The amount of the latter used in the New York Library—400,000 cubic feet, five times as much as that used in the Stock Exchange Building—is advanced as the main reason for its great cost. In size the New York Library is 366 feet in length by 246 feet in depth, inclosing two interior courts. The Congressional Library is 470 feet in length and 340 feet in depth, inclosing four courts and a central rotunda surmounted by a dome. The Boston Library is 228 feet in length and 225 feet in depth; inclosing a central court.

As a "working library" the Bryant Park building when completed will boast of features that will make it unique among the libraries of the world. Chief of these is the giant steel book stack, occupying all but the top floor of the back part of the building. This book stack is by far the largest ever constructed, and with its 80 miles of shelves is capable of holding 3,500,000 books. Other book stacks in the building bring the total book capacity of the library to 4,500,000 volumes—nearly 3,000,000 more than the Public Library has at present. Another unique feature in the interior construction of the new building is the main reading room, built directly over the main book stack. This room is quite the largest in any public library, providing seats for about 800 persons, which is almost twice as much as the seating capacity of the famous circular reading room of the British Museum, built fifty years ago.

If you are visited by Summer sand fleas try this remedy: Place sheets of flypaper on the floor and in the centre of each sheet put a piece of meat. The fleas jump for the meat and fasten themselves to the paper.

DIED UNDER SCIENCE, SISTER PROTESTING

After Wife's Death Husband Has Sister Arrested as Disorderly.

CORONER NOW CALLED IN

Takes Up the Case of Rich Mrs. McBride, Said to be a Victim of Eddyism.

Mrs. Robert McBride, wife of a wealthy Christian Scientist living at 225 West Eightieth Street, died late on Saturday afternoon of pneumonia. She had been under the care of a Miss Margaret Duncan, a healer of the First Church of Christ Scientist, at Central Park West and Ninety-sixth Street.

Mrs. McBride's sister, Mrs. Alice Chasma, who had been nursing the patient, had repeatedly demanded of Robert McBride, her brother-in-law, that a physician be summoned when the illness became critical. Mr. McBride and the healer, Miss Duncan, refused, she says, to accede to her request.

Yesterday morning Mrs. Chasma went to the McBride apartment, on the second floor of the Varuna, to see her sister and learn of her condition, and was then informed of her "passing." When the first shock of grief had subsided, Mrs. Chasma began to say things to Mr. McBride. As a result of the scene which ensued the brother-in-law had her arrested and locked up on a charge of disorderly conduct.

Later in the day when Mrs. Chasma was arraigned in the West Side Court before Magistrate Walsh, the remarkable story of the case, which has caused a stir in the fashionable congregation of the First Church of the Eddy following, came to light.

Mrs. Chasma, according to her story, had visited the house on Saturday afternoon. She made a final appeal that a physician, Dr. Arthur Schrady, be called in, and was so insistent that Mr. McBride had her ejected from the house. The Christian Scientists present termed her the "discordant note" that prevented the recovery of her sister.

Policeman Guards the Body.

After the departure of Mrs. Chasma, Mrs. McBride died. At 11 o'clock on Saturday night a Mr. Benedict, an undertaker at 180 West Thirteenth Street, notified Dr. Weston of the Coroner's office of the case. Coroner Acritelli took charge of it personally yesterday morning, ordered Dr. Weston not to permit the burial of the body, and to perform an autopsy. A policeman was stationed in the apartment to guard the body, and was still there until a late hour last night.

There was a dramatic scene when, after the morning's events, Mrs. Chasma, who is a member of the Professional Woman's League and a woman of evident refinement, was brought into court on the charge of disorderly conduct. She frankly told of the protests she had made over the failure to provide proper medical treatment for her sister and of how they had been ignored.

When she learned, she said, yesterday morning that her sister was dead, she spoke plainly in her grief about the Christian Science way of nursing the sick, and declared that her sister was "nothing more nor less than a victim of the false teachings of the Eddy cult." Mr. McBride had then called in a policeman and had her arrested.

While she was speaking, Mr. McBride, who was accompanied by a woman whose name was not disclosed, was in court. He was there to press the complaint against her. There was no one there to look after the interests of Mrs. Chasma.

Had No Medical Attention.

"My sister," Mrs. Chasma told Magistrate Walsh, "did not receive any medical attention whatever, although every one must have realized that her condition was critical. Yesterday afternoon when I looked at her and realized how ill she was I could stand it no longer, and again demanded of my brother-in-law that he call in a physician. Then I was put out of the house."

Here Mrs. Chasma broke down and sobbed. When she had regained control of herself she told of a visit that she and her sister had made to Atlantic City, where it was hoped the change in climate would restore Mrs. McBride's health. A few weeks ago the sisters had returned to New York. About a week ago Mrs. McBride was taken seriously ill and had to go to bed.

"While I was protesting over their failure to call in a physician," continued Mrs. Chasma, "the Christian Science healers were there. For a week they starved my sister with talk, while she was starving in fact. I do not believe that she would have lived as long as she did had I not been able to smuggle some food to her now and then. Day and night, in those last days, I nursed her.

Sobs on Magistrate's Desk.

Here Mrs. Chasma's voice broke again and she stopped and sobbed on Magistrate Walsh's desk. Magistrate Walsh ordered her remanded for a further examination this morning. It was said that the Magistrate desired time to look into certain charges that were made in Mr. McBride's complaint against his sister-in-law with reference to her behavior yesterday morning.

After Mrs. Chasma was taken back to her cell, newspaper men visited her and to them she told her story in detail. She spoke clearly and like a woman of excellent education.

"Isn't it terrible," Mrs. Chasma cried, "to be locked up in this place and all the time realizing that my poor sister is dead. Why, I had to borrow a handkerchief from a policeman who was kind enough to give me his own."

"It has been said, Mrs. Chasma," a reporter said, "that you were drinking before returning to your sister's home yesterday morning, and that the disorderly charge made against you grew out of that."

"A Victim of Christian Science."

"That is false," she answered indignantly, and her deportment and conversation seemed to corroborate her words.

"The truth is," added Mrs. Chasma, "that my sister was a victim of Christian Science."

Then Mrs. Chasma told of finding a slip of paper in the McBride apartment which had written on it "97 treatments, $97," and of how Miss Duncan, the healer, had

SCHMITZ OFFERS TO CONFESS.

Mayor of San Francisco Ready to Resign and Join Reformers.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 28.—The latest candidate for immunity is the indicted chief executive of the municipality, Mayor Eugene E. Schmitz. Through trusted representatives within the last few days the Mayor has made a proposal to the graft prosecutors, which is now under consideration. The Mayor's proposition may be accepted at any moment, but Rudolph Spreckels and Assistant District Attorney Francis J. Heney have declared themselves against giving the indicted Mayor any of the immunity balm he craves.

Schmitz has offered to resign his office as Mayor of San Francisco, to make a full confession to the Grand Jury of his knowledge of municipal graft, and to join the ranks of the reformers.

There undoubtedly is much that Mayor Schmitz might tell the graft prosecutors which they would be delighted to learn. There are many so-called cases which rest largely on suspicion alone, but whether the full details and evidence, desirable as it would be, is worth the price of immunity to one of the arch conspirators against the people is a matter of grave doubt to many.

"As far as I am concerned, you might say that I am not in favor of granting any immunity to Mayor Schmitz," declares Spreckels.

Heney was somewhat evasive in his answer to the direct question as to whether he would extend immunity to the Mayor. He says:

"I will tell no one whether immunity will be granted to Mayor Schmitz, except the Mayor himself. In my position as prosecutor I cannot do otherwise."

A complete confession from Mayor Schmitz would undoubtedly involve some of those "higher up," whom the graft prosecutors are known to be anxious to bring to the bar of justice.

MORE BARREN ISLAND SINKS.

Two Buildings Carried Down with a Loss of $50,000 to $100,000.

With scarcely a warning quake a portion of the eastern end of Barren Island, in Jamaica Bay, near Rockaway Inlet, sank early yesterday afternoon, carrying down a part of two buildings of the New York Sanitary Company's plant and nearly 200 feet of the company's pier. The buildings injured were a storehouse near the pier and a building not yet finished, in which was stored some valuable new machinery. The police sent in two estimates of the damage, one of $50,000 and the other of $100,000.

The crash came shortly after 1 o'clock. The ebb tide had just begun and the sea was calm. One hundred men, mostly Poles and negroes, were at work in other buildings of the plant. A few negroes were idling on the land side of the pier.

Suddenly there was the sound of cracking timbers and grinding stonework, and the whole outer front of the pier sank under water. The negroes yelled in terror as they saw a corner of the storehouse and nearly two-thirds of the new building crash down and disappear. The water washed back toward the land and covered the ruins.

The negroes fled up the beach, calling out that the whole island was sinking. They were met by Policemen Isaac Van Houghton and William Millspaugh of the Canarsie Police Station, who were patrolling the island. The policemen quieted the men, and after seeing that there was no panic among the other workmen, set out in a naphtha launch belonging to William Doll to make sure that no one had been swept into the sea. None was hurt.

The officials of the Sanitary Company assert that the rest of their plant, which covers five acres, is in no danger, but an examination will be made to-day of the concrete foundations and piles on which the buildings stand.

Parts of the island have been disappearing for many years. Twenty years ago a breakwater was built, and since then boatloads of stone have been dumped off the eastern end without avail. The last time a portion of the island was undermined and collapsed was in 1905. It is supposed that the tide in ebbing around the breakwater forms a miniature whirlpool, which eats into the land. Last year the entire plant of the Sanitary Company was destroyed by fire.

KILLED BY BLEACHERS' FALL.

One boy was killed and four others were injured by the fall of a section of the bleachers' stand on the St. John's Baseball Grounds, at St. Paul's and Tonnele Avenues, Jersey City, yesterday in the progress of a game between the St. John's Club and the Chatham Club of the Lackawanna League, two well-known local teams.

The boy who was killed was Russell Neilson, 6 years old, of 270 Van Winkle Street. His neck was broken and his skull fractured. His elder brother, who accompanied him, was unhurt. They were not on the stand, but under it. Alexander Poppewski, eleven years old, of 1,012 Newark Avenue, who was on the stand, suffered a fracture of the right leg. He was taken to the City Hospital. Four other boys were badly bruised, but as they did not require medical attendance their names were not taken.

The game was the first called on the grounds which were only completed on Saturday, the St. John's old grounds having been blotted out by the Erie Railroad improvements. It was said that the bleachers' stand was imperfectly built, owing to its hurried construction, but no definite information on this point could be obtained. The police will inquire into this report, and if it is substantiated those responsible will be arrested. There were about 200 persons on the stand, most of whom were boys, friends of the respective teams.

Two persons were slightly injured late Saturday night by the collapse of a section of the seats at the Balmas Trained Animal Show. The show was performing at Prospect Street and National Avenue, in Corona, Queens, and was about over when the collapse took place.

AIR BATTLESHIPS FOR THIS COUNTRY

Dr. Alexander Graham Bell Has Information That They Are Soon Coming.

FLIGHT PROBLEM SOLVED

Inventor Says We Will Be Able Before Long to Dine in America and Have Breakfast in Europe.

Special Cablegram.

LONDON, April 28.—Dr. Alexander Graham Bell, the inventor of the telephone, said to me to-night that it was only a question of a brief period when the progress of aerial navigation would make it possible to have dinner in America and breakfast the next morning in Europe, covering the distance across the Atlantic in considerably less than twenty hours.

"My expectation," said Dr. Bell, "is that an airship will be perfected capable of making 150 to 200 miles an hour. My opinion, however, is that the next step in aerial flight will take the form of such improvements as will make possible the creation of aerial battleships.

"The actual problem of the navigation of the air has already been solved by the Wright brothers. Naturally there will be development along commercial lines, a feature of which will be a great increase in speed, but the most attention will be paid to adapting airships to the purposes of war. My belief is that America will be the first country to perfect aerial battleships. This belief is based on inside information, and from the same source I get reliable statements on which I base my prediction of the early production of an airship of enormous speed.

"I hope to be able to add much to what is known of aerial flight by experiments at Cape Breton Island this Summer. My problem this year will be to propel my kites with a specially constructed engine of fifteen horse power, weighing 120 pounds. I hope to get a machine of the heavier-than-air variety that will support a man and the necessary equipment to operate it at low rather than high velocity. Last December I constructed a vehicle that supported itself and a man in a ten-mile breeze. I now want to fly a machine carrying an engine at ten or fifteen miles an hour. If I can accomplish this there is hope that the aviators, or the men who are trying to solve flight on the bird plan, will be able to avoid fatal accidents long enough to learn how to fly. Even a bird has to learn to fly, and, as with the bird, one of the first considerations is safety, so man must learn to go slow before he goes fast.

"I am confident that it will not be long before flying machines will be everywhere. The developments of the next few months will be unprecedented, but the most interesting point is that only very few know how near America is right now to solving a question which will revolutionize warfare throughout the world—I mean the construction of a practical aerial battleship."

Dr. Bell is here to receive the degree of Doctor of Science at Oxford on May 2.

ROOSEVELT TO RUN—DORSEY.

Ex-Senator Says That Republicans Fear Election of Bryan.

Special Cablegram.

LONDON, April 28.—Ex-Senator Stephen W. Dorsey, formerly of Arkansas, now of California, who has just arrived from New York, thinks that the candidates in the next Presidential campaign will be Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. Bryan.

"Mr. Roosevelt," said Mr. Dorsey, "is a candidate for re-election, and has been a candidate for some time. The impression is growing that he is the only man able to handle the peculiar situation that has developed in the United States in the last few years. I am convinced that he is the only man with whom the Republicans can beat Mr. Bryan.

"Though I am a strong Republican, I believe that Mr. Bryan would make a good President, notwithstanding he has queer ideas occasionally. He is the strongest man the Democrats have, and, unlike Roosevelt, he does not go around with the big stick.

"Just before leaving home I had interviews with several Republican leaders. Their chief fear is of Mr. Bryan's growing strength. I don't think Gov. Hughes would make any show against him. I don't doubt Mr. Bryan would be able to raise a larger campaign fund than Mr. Roosevelt."

SURE OF ANOTHER CARDINAL.

Bishop O'Gorman Certain Red Hat Will Be Given to American.

Special Cablegram.
Copyright, 1907, by THE NEW YORK TIMES Co.

ROME, April 28.—Bishop O'Gorman left here for America yesterday convinced, this time, that the Vatican has really decided to create another American Cardinal at the next consistory, but entirely in the dark about who will receive the Red Hat.

He thinks, however, that on reflection the Vatican will see that there is only one man who can thus be honored.

STROMBOLI VERY VIOLENT.

Ashes and Cinders Damage Vineyards in Italy and Sicily.

CATANIA, April 28.—The Royal Observatory on Mount Aetna records an extraordinary eruption of the volcano on the Island of Stromboli.

The volcano is throwing out large quantities of ashes and cinders, which are damaging vineyards in both Sicily and Calabria.

MESSINA, April 28.—The Stromboli volcano is again in active eruption.

An explosion so strong that the concussion broke a window here was felt to-day. The peasants were terror-stricken.

The extent of the eruption is not known here, as the cable line with the Lipari Islands is interrupted. The only news received at Messina has been by means of signals.

NAPLES, April 28.—Frequent slight shocks of earthquake were felt in Calabria to-day.

The populace of Southern Italy, especially in Calabria, is fearful lest there be a repetition of the earthquake disaster of 1905.

Stromboli, which has a population of about 2,000, is the northeasternmost of the Lipari Islands, and is about forty-five miles from Sicily.

The island is wholly of volcanic formation, consisting of a conical bifurcated rock, rising 2,500 feet above sea level.

SAY TAFT HOLDS MACHINE.

Majority of Ohio State Central Committee Reported with Him.

Special to The New York Times.

CINCINNATI, April 28.—It is asserted to-day by Taft adherents that they have captured the Republican State Central Committee, which heretofore had been conceded to the Foraker-Dick alliance.

When the committee was formed at the last State Convention Dick and Foraker had twelve of the twenty-one members. Two months ago, it is asserted, the Central Committeemen from two districts began to lean to the Taft forces because they said that the Republicans of their districts were opposed to the Senatorial alliance. Now comes the declaration that the Taft men have succeeded in winning enough of the rest of the committee to their side to insure their overwhelming control of the organization.

Walter Brown, Chairman of the committee, will make a statement on Tuesday which may throw some light upon the situation. He has deserted the Senatorial alliance, and although he personally is opposed to the primaries suggested by Foraker, he says he will offer no opposition to them should the Taft forces desire them.

CHANGED FAMOUS STATUES.

Carnegie Institute Trustees Did Not Want Exact Replicas.

Special to The New York Times.

PITTSBURG, April 28.—Artists who have been attracted to the magnificent new Carnegie Institute have criticised the fact that among the statuary in the splendid Statuary Hall not one of the casts is an exact replica of the original. The reason has just become public.

When the hall was planned, agents were sent to Europe to get famous pieces of statuary, no matter what they might cost. If they could not be had, the agents were instructed to get replicas of them. Sculptors in France and Italy had been at work on these replicas for two years. When they reached Pittsburg they were exact fac similies of the originals.

John W. Beatty, director of fine arts, accepted them without question. When the Board of Trustees of the institute had a private view of the statuary, however, there was a strong protest. A dozen local sculptors were put to work. For two weeks they were busy, and the Trustees declared themselves satisfied. Mr. Beatty wept real tears.

TO PENSION CITY'S HORSES.

The signature of Gov. Hughes is all that is needed to-day to free from an old age of slavery all horses that become disabled or broken down in the service of the city. Mayor McClellan signed and sent to Albany last week a bill, which has passed the Legislature, empowering the Fire, Police, and Street Cleaning Commissioners to transfer to the custody of the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals all horses unfit for municipal use, instead of selling them at public auction. The Governor, who is a member of the A. S. P. C. A., is expected to make the measure a law to-day.

Plans to provide an easy old age for veteran horses, which will be "honorably discharged" by the city in the next year, are being drawn up by the society. A fund will be created and a Long Island farm site will be obtained where the society may pasture its charges.

FIRE WAGON KILLS A BOY.

The wagon of Battalion Chief Patrick F. Lucas of Brooklyn ran down and killed Ernest Thompson, 15 years old, of 220 Forty-ninth Street, last night, as the Chief was hurrying to a small fire in the home of Stanley Vinnity, at 210 Twenty-eighth Street. In the wagon with the Chief was his driver, Thomas Kelly.

Young Thomson was crossing the street at Fourth Avenue and Forty-ninth Street when the boy was struck. Chief Lucas stopped, and, telling Kelley to take the boy to the hospital in the first automobile he could find, drove on to the fire. Kelley took up the boy, signalled a car belonging to Thomas F. Lynch of 420 Forty-second Street, and drove rapidly to the Norwegian Hospital. There Dr. Straiman said that the boy was dead, and had probably died instantly, as his skull had been fractured.

GOV. BUCTELL GOES AWAY.

Strain of the Colorado Legislative Session Breaks Him Down.

Special to The New York Times.

DENVER, Col., April 28.—Because he is almost prostrated by his arduous labors at and since the legislative session, Gov. Buctell has been ordered by his physician to go to California and take a long rest. He is now on his way there, accompanied by a younger brother who is a physician.

Since adjournment the Governor has been the hardest worked man in Colorado, delegations crowding the Capitol during the day and many following him to his home at night to advocate or denounce measures before him.

"JOHN DOE" INQUIRY INTO INSURANCE?

FORGERY CHARGES MADE

International Policy Holders' League Has Been Urging Him to Act on Testimony They Gave.

The fact that at least one well known insurance man in this city has received a subpoena calling him to the District Attorney's office became known yesterday, and was taken as an indication that District Attorney Jerome has already begun or is about to begin "John Doe" proceedings to inquire into the charges of fraud and forgery made in connection with the recent elections of Directors in the New York and Mutual Life Insurance Companies.

These charges have been in the hands of the District Attorney since even before the election in the Mutual, whose administration ticket has been declared elected. In the New York Life the votes have not yet been counted. Since the attention of his office was first called to the matter, the District Attorney has received many affidavits of persons who swear that ballots favoring the "administration" tickets, and purporting to bear their names, are forgeries.

These affidavits have been procured and supplied to the District Attorney by the International Policy Holders' Association, whose ticket suffered defeat in the Mutual election. In addition, the Policy Holders' Association has obtained twenty-five of the original ballots in the New York Life election, which they assert carry forged signatures. These, too, have been turned over to the District Attorney and are now in the hands of Assistant District Attorney Smyth.

These ballots, all of which were obtained in this city, are not only forgeries, according to the association, but the persons whose names they bear never cast a ballot of any sort, with one exception. This man it was, declared the association, after investigation, had cast a ballot in favor of the Association ticket. On the count his ballot, as well as a second one purporting to bear his signature, but counting for the Administration ticket, came to light. The first ballot was declared void and discarded.

George R. Scrugham, Chairman of the International Policy Holders' Association, called on Assistant District Attorney Smyth on Friday and handed to him additional affidavits charging forgery. According to Mr. Scrugham, his investigations have shown him that forgery was practiced in almost every State in the Union. From Texas alone came several hundred ballots all bearing the name of U. S. Grant, an agent of the Mutual, as witness. He alleges that in every instance these ballots were forged. All were cast for the Administration ticket.

The aid of the District Attorney has been sought, Mr. Scrugham said last night, because of the refusal of the Board of Inspectors appointed by Superintendent of Insurance Kelsey, to allow themselves judicial powers, on this ground declining either to receive affidavits charging forgery or to take testimony. The matter was argued before the Inspectors by counsel for the company and for the association. In refusing to receive either affidavits or testimony, the board sided with the company, and deprived the association of its only means of proving the fraud which the managers allege was perpetrated.

"Apparently, dead men were permitted to vote in some instances," said Mr. Scrugham last night. "The address given on one ballot which was received and counted for the Administration was 418 East Twelfth Street. Investigation showed that a cemetery occupies this and several adjoining numbers on the street. No one connected with a church in the neighborhood had ever heard of the name signed to the ballot."

Since laying its information before the District Attorney the Policy Holders' Association has urged that the agents of the companies through whom these ballots came be indicted for forgery.

IMMIGRANTS SHED KNIVES.

All Kinds Surrendered Following Ellis Island Inspector's Warning.

Within the last two days hundreds of Italians have arrived on liners from Italy. Yesterday the Nord America and the Citta di Milano came up to their pier at the foot of West Thirty-fourth Street. The Inspector who went down to supervise the taking of the steerage passengers to Ellis Island made a speech to the newly arrived on the dangers of carrying knives and guns. This was without effect. Then the Inspector told them that this Government considered that no good citizen would carry a knife or gun, and that if any among them had any they had better give them up.

The result of the last appeal surprised him. There was a stir in the dense crowd, and then came a perfect rain of knives. All were eager to get rid of their weapons, for all wanted to enter the country. Some threw knives away openly, some dropped them over the side, and some quietly dropped them where they were standing.

After it was over quite a number of knives, most of them long and sharp, and some dull, were gathered up. The Inspectors said it was safe to say that such a weaponless crowd of Italians has not landed at Ellis Island in many a day.

J. H. SMITH'S BODY ARRIVES.

Duke of Manchester Says There's a Will Leaving the Fortune to Widow.

Special to The New York Times.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 28.—The body of James Henry Smith of New York, who died recently at Kioto, Japan, arrived today on the steamer Siberia. Accompanying the body are the widow and the Duke and Duchess of Manchester, who were traveling with Mr. and Mrs. Smith when the death of Mr. Smith occurred.

Eugene Zimmerman of Cincinnati, father the Duchess, met the party. The body of Mr. Smith will be conveyed to New York for burial.

Mrs. Smith declined to be seen, but the Duke talked briefly concerning the affairs of the widow. He said:

"The only will of Mr. Smith of which any of us have any knowledge is that made in Scotland at the time of the wedding. This leaves the bulk of the estate to Mrs. Smith. It is not considered likely that there is a later will. We never heard of the document which Lady Cooper is said to have brought from England with her."

Mrs. Smith will continue her journey to New York to-morrow night.

Credit was given by those in the boat to the talk among the passengers as to the prospect of a posthumous heir to the Smith millions.

16 BOMBS FOR KAULBARS.

Discovered in a House He Has Rented for the Summer.

ODESSA, April 28.—Sixteen bombs were discovered to-day in a villa which Gov. Kaulbars has rented for a Summer residence.

The local committee of the Constitutional Democrats has learned that the Black Hundreds have formed a plot to kill Ossip Y. Pergament, member of the Duma for the Province of Kherson, when he arrives here for the Easter holidays.

PRESIDENT IN WASHINGTON.

WASHINGTON, April 28. — Returning from the visit to the Jamestown Exposition and the day's holiday on the James River, President Roosevelt and party arrived here on the cruiser yacht Mayflower shortly after 1 o'clock this afternoon.

President Roosevelt stood on the starboard side of the vessel and waved a greeting to the crowd and officials who had gathered to welcome the party home. The President was the first to come ashore and he was greeted with cheers. The Presidential party were at once driven to the White House.

EDISON HOME AGAIN.

Will Now Take Up the Scientific Side of Electrical Progress.

Thomas A. Edison, who has returned to his home after a vacation of several weeks in Florida, will start to-morrow on the new line of work he mapped out on his sixtieth birthday, just before he went away.

The inventor will hereafter devote his time to the purely scientific side of electrical work. Mr. Edison put in some good time tarpon fishing and made several fine catches. The big tarpon caught by Mrs. Edison is being mounted by a taxidermist. Mr. Edison is much improved in health.

TELEGRAM FLOOD FOR MAYOR.

Petitions Asking Him to Sign Teachers' Bill to be Sent by Wire.

The women teachers of New York City took the first steps yesterday to urge the Mayor to sign the White bill, putting their salaries on an equality with men's, at once. Early yesterday morning they started out with petitions to be signed by three taxpayers, asking the Mayor to take immediate action, and these petitions are to be sent him by telegraph to-night. There are about 14,000 women teachers in the city.

The telegrams will cost 75 cents, which the teachers have pledged themselves to pay. The idea is said to have originated at the Normal College in Brooklyn.

CORTLANDT ST. MAIN BREAKS.

Ferry Passengers Obliged to Use Other Streets—Little Damage.

Although it did little damage, the breaking of a ten-inch water main in Cortlandt Street, between Broadway and Church Street, late yesterday afternoon, caused considerable annoyance to thousands of persons bound to the ferries, as the street was closed by the police.

Just what caused the break in the main could not be determined. Water trickling through the boards into the excavation of the City Investment Building was the first sign of the break, and the Superintendents immediately caused the water to be shut off at Church Street and at Broadway. For a distance of about 300 feet the street has been torn up and covered with heavy timbers. In order to get at the break the timbers had to be ripped up for a distance of about twenty feet.

TO EXAMINE A GOVERNOR.

Arkansas Legislature May Send a Committee to a Sanitarium.

Special to The New York Times.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., April 28.—Senator John G. B. Simms of Chicot County will introduce a sensational resolution in the Legislature to-morrow providing for the appointment of a committee of two Senators and three Representatives to inquire into the condition of John L. Little, Governor of the State.

The resolution will direct the committee to go to Corpus Christi, Texas, where the Governor has been under treatment in a sanitarium since January, have a thorough examination of his condition made, and report back as soon as possible.

Several informal conferences of members of the State Senate were held here to-day, at which, it is stated, the sentiment was unanimous that the air of mystery surrounding the illness of Gov. Little should be removed before the Legislature adjourns sine die, so that measures to relieve the situation may be adopted if necessary.

OUR NEED IS POETS, SAYS JAMES BRYCE

Great Ones, of Course; and as for Great Dramatists, Two Continents Pant for Them.

TALK WITH AMBASSADOR

In Which Not a Word of Politics or Money Getting, but Much of the Mystery and the Decline of Genius.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, April 28.—"You have been celebrating over here, too, the birthday of the poet Swinburne," said James Bryce, the British Ambassador, to a reporter of THE NEW YORK TIMES, to-day. "Many years ago I was one of those who knew and appreciated Swinburne's brilliant gifts when he was still an undergraduate at Oxford. There was then in the university a small group of men belonging to different colleges, though most of them were at Balliol College, who had formed a little society which met once a week in the rooms of some one of its members. It was of the type of what were jestingly called 'mutual improvement societies.' We read essays, or passages taken from some favorite author, and discussed the subject over tea and toast.

"Swinburne, who was a fascinating companion, with great social charm, has always seemed to me the most brilliant members of this group. In all he wrote, as well as in his talk, we discerned the genius that has since been so universally recognized. I remember a striking little poem he recited at one of our annual festivals, and still can recollect by heart his admirable parodies of what was then called the 'spasmodic school of poets.' He had been educated at Eton, but it was as much his own fondness for study as, anything his school had done that gave him his wide knowledge of the Greek poets and mastery of Greek verse. He was also extraordinarily well read in French as well as in English literature, a fervent admirer of Victor Hugo, and, like pretty nearly all of us, a no less fervent denouncer of Louis Napoleon, who was then Emperor in France.

"Among the other members of the group were Thomas H. Green, afterward famous as a metaphysician; John Nichol, whose book on American literature is doubtless still known and valued here; R. S. Wright, in later life one of the ablest English Judges, (he died three years ago;) T. E. Holland, now Professor of International Law at Oxford and one of the highest living authorities on that subject, and Henry Nettleship, a famous Latin scholar, who subsequently became University Professor of Latin.

"Walter Pater was another member. He wrote admirable essays, full of grace and refinement of thought, but in those days he was more of a metaphysician than a student of art and letters. So, too, we had Albert Dicey, author of some of the most authoritative legal and constitutional treatises which have been produced in England in recent years, treatises well known in America also for their breadth and penetration of thought. He was in those days the most brilliant speaker at the university debating society. Some years ago he gave a course of lectures at Harvard.

"Nor ought George Birkbeck Hill, whose studies on Dr. Johnson have won so much reputation in the United States as well as in England, to be forgotten.

Swinburne and Browning.

"It was Swinburne, who, by reading some of Browning's poems to us at one of our meetings, I think in 1858, first introduced us to the work of that great poet. I recollect, as if it was yesterday, his reading aloud of 'The Statue and the Bust' and 'The Heretic's Tragedy,' with, I think also, 'Bishop Blougram's Apology,' certainly one of the most marvelously clever pieces of work that ever Browning produced.

"Tennyson had, of course, been long famous, but Browning, though he had already published some of his very best poems, had remained hardly known to the general educated public. Then, all at once, he so laid hold on men's minds that for a while other poets were almost forgotten.

"Browning came into fame much like a tree bursting into blossom. For a long time a few had known and loved him, when, suddenly, one day the Spring of popular regard seemed to descend, and he stood revealed to all England in the full flower of his genius. Then he unquestionably came to a season when tendencies less favorable to the charm of poetry prevailed. 'The Ring and the Book' may still contain many a rare, belated bloom, but there is far too much of it. After all, human life is not endless. Few can be expected to travel the long road through the many sides in which the same tale is presented for the sake of the trophies of our patient journeying which we may pick up along the way. There is much that Browning has written that will live—very much. But not everything is worthy of immortality. There are vast tracts of desert, especially in his later work. Some of his finest and deepest verse is contained in 'Dramatis Personae.' Toward the end of his life the writing of poetry in the kind of form his earlier work had taken seemed to have become well-nigh an impossibility with him. He undertook to translate the 'Agamemnon' of Aeschylus. He turned it into rough, mostly unpoetical, involved English.

"Who are our coming poets in England? One ought to have watched the horizon more carefully and constantly than I can claim to have done before venturing to answer. William Watson? Yes, a finished artist, a man of heart, of righteous ideals, and the author of delightful and inspiriting verse.

Necessity for Poets.

"But who are yours? That is the question for you. Who are writing your songs and stirring your heart—or isn't your heart being stirred? Nothing is more important than that each generation and each land should have its own poets. Each oncoming tide of life, each age, requires and needs men of lofty thought who shall dream and sing for it, who shall gather up its tendencies and formulate its ideals and voice its spirit, proclaiming its duties and awakening its enthusiasm, through the high authority of the poet and the art of his verse.

"Any generation is indeed bereft among whom poetic inspiration might seem to be dying out. However much we enjoy and prize the old singers, new ones are needed to express the everchanging attitude of man to nature and life. There are immortal themes—but changing accents and altering modes of art.

"No, I should not be prepared to say that the great fact that a generation is without great poets is an evidence that there is no postical possibility in the life it leads. I would not asperse, for instance, the middle of the eighteenth century. And many other generations and centuries have not had the highest among poets, or musicians, or painters.

"It does not follow at all that there is no song because the bird is not there to sing it. There are times of brooding and times of labor.

"In this matter we are in the presence of one of the great mysteries of nature. There seems to be little connection between the demand for genius and its appearance. Genius is wont to flash forth not only in the inauspicious place, but in the unprovocative time. At all events, the needs of the age do not always succeed in evoking the answering response of genius. Many a Trojan War has been without a Homer.

"Is there really any ground for the view of history which declares that great occasions create great men to meet them? The French Revolution didn't produce a first rate man—hadn't one to show after Mirabeau died (if, indeed, he was first rate)—till Napoleon appeared.

The Puzzle of the Drama.

"Take the case of the drama. There you have one of the most puzzling phenomena of the age. Never was there a greater call for a great dramatist than there is to-day. Think of it, two continents are panting for great plays. A quarter of a century ago a few dimly lighted playhouses in more or less inconspicuous quarters were resorted to by small audiences of people of little influence. Playgoers were, in fact, looked upon askance by not a few who cultivated strict respectability. Such was the state of the matter in London; I dare say also in New York. In the provinces, here and in England, prim respectability waa, of course, averse from admitting any merit in the drama and offered little but discouragement to the actor and the playwright.

"How have the times changed! Nowadays, brilliantly lighted playbousea occupy the best sites and stretch block after block, while night after night the streets are impassably thronged with the processions of people crowding to pay high prices for the privilege of witnessing some times far from excellent performances.

"Think of the vast sums poured out for the support of the theatre, think of the audience which waits upon the playwright to-day; never in the world's history was there anything like it, never. Would it not have been expected that the opportunity for a dramatist would produce one of the first magnitude? It has failed to do so. I am not competent to discuss the modern play. It is too varied, too complex a theme. But I cannot refrain from feeling that one of the greatest opportunities offered the dramatist in the history of the modern world is going unavailed of.

"No, I should hardly agree that the dramatist's art is one in which genius is rarely exhibited. It is true that there are a few names which stand so very high in dramatic glory that they put all other claimants to greatness out of countenance. But, aside from the Greeks and Shakespeare, there have been in all lands and ages dramatists the like of whose genius exhibited in any art, would entitle them to immortality. We may claim this for several, certainly, of our English playwrights of earlier days. The Germans have had their great dramatists in the past, and I have warm admiration for Hauptmann and Sudermann to-day. But to-day has not given another Goethe nor another. The French would insist that Racine, Corneille, and Molière are among the world's greatest men—and they would be right.

Cannot Prophesy Genius.

"Curiously enough, though France has had great dramatists, she has had fewer great poets, either lyric or epic, than her commanding intellectual fertility might have led us to expect. And yet one would have expected that the spirit of France would inevitably have expressed itself in poetry. This, again, is another manifestation of the mysterious workings of nature—in the phrase we use nowadays. You cannot attempt to prophesy the appearance of genius. It will emerge in accordance with no laws which we can detect. Favorable, even insistent and clamorous, conditions do not beget it. Nor when it appears is it likely to take the course conditions would seem to have made inevitable for it. It ought to revive the drama, but instead, perhaps, it paints pictures. It ought to compose poetry, but lo, it promises to invent machines.

"It le one of the great problems. All our meditating upon it goes no way at all toward solving it. Yet it is a problem with which the mind may well concern itself, for the charactsrs of civilizations and the destinies of nstions are involved in it. Human genius, the conditions under which it appears, and the aspect which, when it appears, it chooses to assume, what can we say of all this except that: 'The wind bloweth where it listeth, and thou hearest the sound thereof, but canst not tell whsnce it cometh or whither it goeth?'"

BANDAGED THE AMBULANCE.

Surgeon Patched Broken Shaft with Splints and Plaster.

Dr. Hilfer repaired a shaft of an ambulance of the Sydenham Hospital with splints, bandages, and plaster last night after it had been broken in a collision with a westbound Forty-second Street car in First Avenue.

While going south on the avenue, Max Rosenthal, the driver, kept the ambulance on the northbound tracks. Near Fortieth Street, he atarted to turn into the southbound tracks, and a car crashed into the ambulance. Rosenthal was thrown to the pavement, and Dr. Hilfer was thrown inside and the horse knocked down. Ths shaft of the ambulance was broken almost in half.

The surgeon requisitioned all the splints, bandages, and pieces of plaster the ambulance contained. Placing the splints alongside the break, he wound bandages about it and then placed the plaster on. Yards and yards of bandages wero used, and n the end the surgeon made the shaft atrong enough for the return trip. The horse was hitched in, and as they drove off some one in the crowd yelled:

"You are all right, Doc! If I ever have my shaft broken I'll call you in."

SMATHERS AS A HUMORIST.

Offers Gold Cup for Mule Race, Negroes to Drive.

Special to The New York Times.

MEMPHIS, Tenn., April 28.—Another contest will take place for the famous Memphis Gold Cup, provided the wishes of Eimer E. Smathers of New York are carried out.

Through his attorney, Caruthers Ewing, Mr. Smatbers announces that the trophy which nas attracted so much attention through the trotting and civil courts will be donated for a contest to take place over over the same course that Lou Dillon and Major Delmar taveled, which ended in the charges of doping.

The event, according to Mr. Smathers, will be for mules, and will consist of but a single heat. The driver of the winner will be given permanent possession of the valuable trophy, which is said to have an intrinsic value of over $2,000.

According to Mr. Ewing, Mr. Smathers would be glad of the opportunity to rid himself of the gold cup in this manner, and the offer will stand good until accepted. There is but one stipulation that the New York man has made, which he insists shall be carried out by the Memphis Association in the event his offer is accepted. According to the conditions governing, "all members of the Caucasian race are ineligible to drive their mules or mules owned by others, with exception of C. K. G. Billings."

POULSON PLAN TRIED AGAIN.

Better Results This Time, but Traction Officials See Flaws in it.

Another and better trial of the Poulson plan to relieve the crush on Brooklyn Bridge was had yesterday morning at the Coney Island terminal of the Culver Line. oBrough Presidents Ahearn and Coler, Comptroller Metz, Bridge Commissioner Stevenson, Chief Engineer Lewis of the Board of Estimate, Louis T. L. Martin, Engineer of the Williamsburg Bridge, Neil Poulson, originator of the plan, and officials of ths B. R. T. witnessed the experiment.

Trains of six cars were used. Twenty-eight such cars were run in thirty minutes. It was estimated that with the superior switching facilities on the bridge, from 75 to 100 trains of six cars each could be run every hour under this plan, as compared with the sixty trains of five cars that now run on the bridge.

The city official and the representatives of the B. R. T. said that the only difficulty is that when this number of trains is being run it is impossible to have them scheduled to reach a particular platform. Four platforms are required for the system, and a passenger standing on one of them cannot know how long it will be before his particular train will reach his particular platform.

JEROME WANTS TWO GRAND JURIES

Also an Increase in Judges' Pay and to Abolish the Recordership.

FOUR BILLS FOR ALBANY

Going Up with Them To-day to Ask the Legislature to Reform Criminal Procedure.

District Attorney Jerome will go to Albany to-day to arrange for the introduction in the Legislature of four bills which, if thsy become law, will effect radical changes in the criminal system employed in this county since 1895. In brief the bills provide:

First—For ths abolishment of the office of Recorder of ths County of New York on Dec. 31 of this year, the expiration of ths term of the present incumbent, who until then is to be known as a "Judge of the Court of General Sessions."

Second—For the abolishment of the office of City Judge and ths substitution for it of a fourth Judge of General Sessions. The present incumbent to be retained under the nsw title until the expiration of his term of office.

Third—For the election at the general election in November next of two more Judges of the Court of General Sessions, making six Judges in all, and for a new division of this court into five instead of four parts.

Fourth—For an increase in the yearly salary of these Judges from $12,000 to $15,000.

Fifth—For the holding in the months of July, August, and September of three parts of General Sessions instead of two, as are now held.

Sixth—For the empaneling each month of two instead of one Grand Jury, before which any Assistant District Attorney, whether Deputy or otherwise, may appear.

Seventh—For the appointment of two additional full Assistant District Attorneys, at a salary of $7,500 a year, making ten in all.

To Facilitate Criminal Cases.

It is the purpose of tbis proposed legislation to facilitate tbe handling of criminal cases, a question which the steady increase in crime from year to year has made a problem. For tbe last three months criminal cases have been piling up at the rate of 100 a month, and ths city is again confronted with conditions similar to those of the days when admission to bail meant virtual acquittal of any ordinary criminal charge.

Although apparently the most radical of the proposed measures, since it does away with one of the oldest city offices, the abolishing of the office of Recorder meana nothing more than the dropping of what has gradually become an empty title. For yesrs the Recorder has performed the duties and assumed the responsibilities of a General Sessione Judge, the additional duties which once distinguished his office having disappeared from year to year, or having been transferred to some other official.

Despite the fact that it aims to abolish the office to which he was elected no longer ago than January last, Mr. Jerome's measure is in no way directed at Recorder McAvoy, however. Under the proposed bill his duties ars unaffected, and his tenurs of office continues to the end of the term for which he was elected. Up to date, however, Mr. McAvoy has performed none of these duties. He has never taken his seat upon a General Sessions bench, and his fellow-Judges have shared between them the work assigned to him, a protracted illness making it impossible for him to take up the work of his office.

Another at whom the proposed legislation apparently strikes is City Judge T. C. T. Crain, to whom public attention has been recently attracted by the efforts of the District Attorney to have increased what he termed the "inadequate sentence of two months' imprisonment" imposed by Judge Crain on Daniel Sullivan, convicted of robbery nearly two weeks ago. As in the case of the Recordership, however, Judge Crain under his new title will retain all of his present powers, duties, and jurisdiction.

In point of effect upon the future handling of criminal cases in this county the measures providing for the election of addtional Judges to Gensral Sessions and the division of this court into one more part, together with the proposal for two Grand Juries instead of one, as at present, are of the greatest importance. Undsr the present system of four parts of General Sessions and one Grand Jury the number of prisoners awaiting trial or action by the Grand Jury has been steadily increasing, and the standing calendar has now reached a point where it is nearly twice as large as at the same time last year.

In commenting upon the situation yesterday Mr. Jerome said:

"It must be remembered that the population of New York County has been increasing for the last ten years at the rate of nearly 80,000 persons a year. The figures may mean little in thomselvss, but when one realizes that this yearly increase is nearly twice the standing population of cities like Dubuque, Galveston, Knoxville, Sacramento, and Salem, Mass., besidss exceeding that of Springfield, Yonkers, Lynn, Manchester, and Mobile, and almost equaling the population of Hartford, one may obtain a concrete idea of their size.

"Now crime, unfortunately, increases in direct proportion to an increase in population. The census of New York County last ysar was 2,553,100. In 1895 it was 1,873,201. In other words, our population is now nearly twice what it was ten years ago. Presumably there is twice as much crime. And now look at our resources for coping with it.

"In the old days there was a Recorder, a City Judge, and a Judge of General Sessions. In 1887 there was felt a need of more Judges, and an additional Judge was elected to the General Sessions. In 1895, when we were about half our present size, there was one more Judge elected to that court. And we stand to-day where we stood eleven years ago. The same number of courts, the same number of Judges who served less than 2,000,000 people are to-day supposed to be able to serve nearly 3,000,000, and to serve them equally well."

Referring to the increase in salary for which he is asking for the General Sessions Judges, Mr. Jerome pointed out that the Court of General Sessions is a court of general jurisdiction, and its Judges have practically all the powers of a Supreme Court Justice. The present salary, he added, does not appear commensurate with the dignity of their position.

Mr. Jerome went to his home in Lakeville, Conn., yesterday, and will leave there this morning on an early train for Albany.

A THREAT BY MEXICO.

Will Sever Relations with Guatemala if Gen. Lima is Not Given Up.

MEXICO CITY, April 28.—Minister of Foreign Affairs Marical issued a statement last night in which he said that the Mexican Government had made a demand on Guatemala that Gen. José Maria Lima of the Guatemalan Army he held on the charge of the murder of Gen. Barillas until extradition papers reach the Guatemalan capital.

In his statement the Minister says that the Central American republic is not bound by a treaty to acquiesce in Mexico's demand. He adds, however, that unless Guatemala accedes to Mexico's request on the ground of courtesy, diplomatic relations between the countries will be severed. This, the Minister adds, will not necessarily lead to a further or more serious breach.

It is authoritatively stated that the report that Mexican troops are being moved to the Guatemalan frontier is correct, but the Government maintains that such action haa no particular significance at this time.

Manufacturing Openings in the Middle West.

The manufacturing trend is westward. The actual capital invested in manufacturing industries in the States of Illinois, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, Iowa, North Dakota, South Dakota and Missouri was 42% greater in 1905 than in 1900——And there was a considerably larger percentage of increase in these prosperous Western States than in a corresponding number in the East.

THE CHICAGO MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILWAY

reaches the important manufacturing and commercial centers of these "money-making" States. Right now—to-day—there are industrial openings which offer numerous opportunities and advantages to new or enlarged industries.

Manufacturers who desire to establish new or branch factories at any point reached by the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway in these flourishing Middle-West States are invited to write to the Industrial Department. Prompt attention will be given to all inquiries. Address, called in Miss Anna Crowley, another healer, who, like Miss Duncan, is connected with the First Church Scientist, the church in which Mrs. Augusta Stetson is the leading figure.

"When I suggested calling in Dr. Schrady," Mrs. Chasma added, "these Scientists would not listen to me. They said my thoughts were bad and that because of all this Christian Science was not helping my sister. When I went back this morning they told me I could see my sister after she was laid out. I told them I wanted to see her then, as was my right, but they would not listen to me.

"Why, they would not let me in to see her until a policeman came in. He stood at the door while I looked, for perhaps the last time, on the features of my poor sister. My sister and I were all in the world to each other. We had no other relative, and I feel sometimes as though I shall lose my reason over all this."

McBrides Owned Apartment.

Mrs. Chasma then made the statement that the Varuna apartment house, in which the McBrides live, was owned in part by her sister. The house is one of the finest on ths middle west side. It is ten stories high and is marble trimmed throughout. Mr. McBride, it was said by another person, also had a large interest in the property.

Mrs. Chasma said that she and her sister came from Lexington, Ky., and that their father was the late Robert Campbell of that city. She is said to be the woman who made the first silken Cuban flag, which flag is now in the possession of ex-President Palma of Cuba.

Late yesterday afternoon local Christian Scientists began to become active in the McBride case. V. O. Strickler, the head of the Publication Bureau, was one of those that called at the McBride apartment. He came in while a number of reporters were trying to see Mr. McBride. He remained within quite a while, and it was said that it was by his orders that Mr. McBride had refused to make any statement to the newspapers.

Strickler Says Doctors Were Called.

When Mr. Strickler left the house the reporters asked him whether he had any statement to make. At first he said he would send a statement to the papers; then he changed his mind.

"Will you say nothing at all?" he was asked.

"Mrs. McBride," he replied, "certainly had the right to be treated according to the Christian Science belief, if she so desired. If you want to put your trust in medicine, and I desire to put mine in God, why should we not be allowed to do so? Physicians, I understand, were called in the last moments of Mrs. McBride's illness. As for Mrs. Chasma, I am told that she came back this morning and made a disturbance, whereupon Mr. McBride had her arrested."

The physicians referred to were Dr. Weston of the Coroners' office and a Dr. Beatty. Dr. Beatty, said Policeman David Roach of the West Sixty-eighth Street Station, arrived at the McBride apartment some time after Mrs. McBride's death, while Dr. Weston came much later.

At 11:30 o'clock last night Mrs. Alice Chesma was still a prisoner in the West Side Court prison. Only one person had called to inquire about her, a woman, who could not see the prisoner because she did not have a permit. The policeman on guard at the McBride home was ordered to remain there all night by the Coroner.

MURDER AFTER A PARTY.

Special to The New York Times.

MOUNT HOLLY, N. J., April 28.—David Beebe of Red Lion, a small town about two miles from Medford, was murdered about 1 o'clock this morning at Chairville, a suburb of Mcdford, while quarreling with some young men who waylaid him as he was leaving the home of Irving Mathis, where he had been visiting. His body was found lying in the road in front of the Mathis house an hour later, and Deputy Sheriff Fleetwood this afternoon arrested Caleb Rogers, Harry Hammill, Howard Reeves, Harry Reeves, and Theodore Wills and took them before Justice of the Peace Milton H. Allen of Medford, who committed them to the Mount Holly Jail charged with murder.

Beebe's head and body were covered with bruises. Two wounds on the right temple, apparently a bullet and a blow from a club, caused his death. He had been attending a house warming given by Irving Mathis and objected to the intrusion of the young men now under arrest. A quarrel ensued and continued until the party broke up.

It is charged that, leaving before Beebe, the accused men attacked him as he came out of the house and beat him to death. They say that Beebe assaulted them and that they acted in self-defence.

Hammill, one of the accused, is the husband of Beebe's niece. Bad feeling had existed between Hammill and Beebe for a long while, and it was between them that the quarrel originated. Beebe leaves a wife and five children.

ENGINE PLUNGES INTO CREEK.

PITTSBURG, April 28.—Marion Boyd, engineer, and Frank McIsaacs, fireman, were killed and 100 passengers narrowly escaped a like fate in a wreck on the Wabash Railroad to-day when the engine and one passenger coach of a westbound train left the tracks half a mile west of the Bridgeville station, near here, and plunged into Chartier's Creek, forty feet below. It is regarded as a marvelous circumstance that not a single passenger was in the coach.

The train was made up of four passenger coaches. It was crossing a trestle over Chartier's Creek when, without warning, the engine suddenly leaped from the rails and shot to the stream underneath, taking the first coach with it. The forepart of the engine sank several feet into the mud, and the coach was smashed to splinters by its impact with the locomotive.

The coupling between the first and second coaches was wrenched in two when the first coach wae torn from the trestle by the engine, and none of those in the three rear coaches knew of the accident, or realized bow close they had come to death until several minutes afterward, when the cars, deprived of motive power, slackened their speed, and came to a stop.

A new schedule went into effect on the road to-day, and to this fact many owe their lives. The train left this city forty-five minutes earlier than usual and over fifty persons missed the train for this reason. On account of the reduced number of passengers all were placed in the three rear coaches.

"SIR JOHNNY" DID GET HOME.

Immigrated from Canarsie Just in Time for Late Mass.

"Sir Johnny" Dunn gat home for Sunday, anyway. The little lieutenant, who is of many years and et is not old, came in yesterday morning from Canarsie, whither he waa transferred on Friday from the Wall Street branch of the Detective Bureau. He got back in timo for late aervices at the Dominican Church in Sixty-firth Street, even though he had to miss his customary 6 o'clock mass.

"'Tis a long journey to Canarsie, Nellie," said the seventy-four-year-old lieutenant to hia favorite daugbter yesterday morning when he rushed to his home at 995 Lexington Avenue. He laid aside his cutaway coat, white waistcoat, and stick. The boutonniere in the lapel of his coat was a bit faded. "Bad aign for Sir Johnny,' said his children later. "He has been worrying."

"Yes, but Nellie, I know the way to Canarsie now all fine," he continued. "You can get there quicker than theae blatherskitea of my grandchildren made out. Heavens, Nellie, I came near forgetting—"

He sailed upstairs to plunge into the first of his two daily cold bathe. "Another bad sign—that he forgot it five minutes," argued his children, grandchildren, and great-grandchildren in consultation.

"Sir Johnny" goes to Canarsie again thia morning at 8 o'clock. He may be able to get back home two or three times this week.

SOLDIER A SUICIDE AFTER MAKING WILL

Writes He Was Disgraced and Dismissed from Army on False Testimony.

LEAVES $600 TO S. P. C. A.

Letter to Coroner Denounces the Officers on Court-Martial—Takes Gas in Bedroom.

In a remarkablo letter addressed "To the Coroner," and frankly stating that the name was an assumed one and that the reason for his act was his "unjustified" dishonorable discharge from the United States Army, George Sturm, 36 years old, committed suicide by gas yesterday afternoon in the furnished room house kept by a Mrs. Hassamen at 203 East Fifty-fifth Street. The dead man left a will dated April 14, leaving his savings of $600 to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

Mrs. Hassermen traced the odor to tbe small top floor room occupied by Sturm, and when the room was entered the exsoldier was found dead upon the small bed, dressed only in his underclothes. Gas was flowing freely from an open burner.

Sturm had evidently spent the morning in preparing for hia death. The room was separated from the one adjoining only by a partition, between which were many cracks. Sturm had pasted strips of newspaper over these cracks and the crevices in the windows. He had only lived in the houae three weeks, and Mrs. Hassamen knew little of him save as a quiet, well-behaved lodger.

Coroner Shraoy found the letter, unsealed, addressed to the Coroner, and the will made by Sturm. The latter was addressed "To the Public Administrator of New York." Two bank books accompanied the latter document, one on tbe Bowery Savings Bank of this city, showing a credit of $483.17, and one on the Paterson Safe Deposit and Trust Company of Paterson, N. J., and indicating deposits amounting to $118.34.

Sturm's Story and Will.

Tbe letter to the Coroner, in a clear-cut penmanship, was written upon a double sheet of ruled note paper. The will was similarly written. The letter was dated on Friday, April 26. The will, according to its date, was just two weeks old. The letter follows:

April 26, 1907.

To the Coroner: I respectfully state as cause for my suicide the following facts:

I am German by birth, 36½ years old, and served from June 23, 1902, until Aug. 10, 1906, in the Hospital Corps, United States Army. At tbat date I was sentenced by a general court-martial to be dishonorably discharged from the service of the United States and to be confined at bard labor for the period of six months.

The charge was referring to the illness and death of a private of Company F, Eighth United States Infantry, in disrespectful language, in violation of the Sixty-second Article of War.

The offense as charged I never committed, and only through tbe efforts of an officer (Lieut. Widdifield) and the false statements of two lying witnesses, notorious enemies of mine, I was convicted.

I could not obtain counsel and was not permitted by the President of the court (Major Perkins) to cross-examine the witnesses. This at Camp Jossman, Guimaras, Philipine Islands.

The disgrace of my unjustified dishonorable discharge and tbrough the same caused impossibility to secure a suitable position.

Friends or relatives I do not have, at least in this country, and since my name is not original one, so nobody will care.

As I wrote down, hand my little hard-earned money to the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals.

A pauper's grave is good enough for me.

Very respectfully,
GEORGE STURM.
203 East 55th Street, New York City.

New York, April 14, 1907.

To Public Administrator, City of New York:

I, George Sturm, do make, publish, and declare tbis my last will and testament. I give, devise, and bequeath to the Society for tbe Prevention of Cruelty to Animals of the City of New York all my property in cash money as is deposited in the Bowery Savings Bank, New York City. (Book No. 92,222.) and in the Paterson Safe Deposit and Trust Company of Paterson, N. J., (Book No. 12,240.)

I have no relatives nor friends, and please hand money over to said society.

This is in my own handwriting.

GEORGE STURM.
255 East Fifty-fifth Street.

Real Identity Undisclosed.

Coroner Shrady found in Sturm's room an unlocked trunk containing some books and papers, relating chiefly to army matters, and with them some discarded articles of army wearing apparel and a number of partly worn campaign hats.

But there was found nothing that would give a clue to the man's real identity or whether or not he had served out the six months' sentence imposed upon him by the military court. From her roomer Mrs. Hassamen said she had learned that he had been out of work for six months.

Joseph C. Holmes a Suicide.

Joseph C. Holmes, 51 years old, committed suicide yesterday afternoon by inhaling illuminating gas, at his home, 105 Kingsbridge Road, East, The Bronx. Holmes had for many years been employed as cashier by E. H. Van Ingen & Co., woolen dealers, at 160 Fifth Avenue, but for a year he had been in ill-health and had acted peculiarly of late. He leaves a wife and daughter.

Plan for a State Headquarters.

A second interstate society meeting will be held in the yacht rooms at the Hotel Astor this evening to discuss the plan proposed recently by the Michigan Society of New York for an interstate headquarters, in which each State society shall have its separate committee, university, and clubrooms, with other facilities, in common. It is hoped that eventually an interstate building may be erected by private subscription with National and State assistance.

UNIONS AT PEACE WITH EMPLOYERS

Few Signs of Trouble in the Big Cities with May Day's Approach.

MANY AGREEMENTS MADE

San Francisco, However, May Suffer from a General Disagreement of Labor and Employers.

The opening of the out-of-door construction aeason finds New York, both city and State, without apprehension of serious labor troubles. In the building trades especially prosperous and reassurling conditions prevail.

There is a large and well-met demand for both skilled and unskilled labor, due to the extensive private construction projects now under way, and the tunnels, railway terminals, and other undertakings of a public or quasi-public nature.

This contentment is generally reflected in the manufacturing and industrial centres, and beyond a few localized and sporadic strikes the labor situation is regarded as brigbter than for many years.

PHILADELPHIA, April 28.—May Day, which marks the beginning of the fiscal year in labor circles, promises to pass in this city with little friction between workmen and employers. With few exceptions the agreements under which the union men are working are acceptable, and trouble is not anticipated.

PITTSBURG, April 28.—May Day in Pittsburg and its vicinity is expected to pass with fewer labor disputes than in previous years. Heretofore considerable difficulty has been experienced between the workmen and uilding trades, but this year scales have been signed and the men ar apparently satisfied.

With the exception of the machinists, about 300 of whom are already on strike, it is believed all the wage scales will be amicably adjusted.

BOSTON, April 28.—According to the union officers and business agents of workingmen's organizations, the industrial situation in New England May 1 will be marked by fewer contentions between capital and labor than for many years. In the building trades several small strikes are threatened in a number of cities, but in Boston there promises to be little suspension of work in any branch of the industry.

The most serious condition existing in Boston is due to the strike a month ago of teamsters. In New England at large there are several causes for unrest in cotton mills, and it is reported that an attempt will be made to advance wages in Fall River some time next month.

CHICAGO, April 28.—The relations between employer and employe were probably never so harmonious in Chicago as they are now.

Every union in the building industry, with the exception of the structural iron workers, has renewed contracts with employers, and the iron workers expect to reach a settlement without a strike.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 28.—May 1 will find San Francisco facing serious labor troubles. Eleven unions, including every branch of the metal trades, have called meetings to be held between now and next Tuesday night to consider the refusal of employers to grant an eight-hour day with nine hours' pay. A vote will be taken to decide whether the men shall accept the offer of a continuance of the nine-hour day with a 5 per cent. increase of wages or go on strike. About 10,000 men are involved.

The street car men have issued a call for a mass meeting at midnight Tuesday to take a vote on a proposal to strike. The strike of steam laundry workers, which went into effect in this city and Oakland a month ago, is still on.

ROSENTHAL'S TRIBUTE TO THE WEBER PIANO

The opinion of the distinguished Austrian pianist, after a six months' concert tour of this country, during which he has made a critical study of the resources of the WEBER PIANO:

New York City, April 19, 1907

To the Weber Piano Company, New York:

Gentlemen—When, two years ago, I tried one of your instruments for the first time, I not only found it to be a piano of the very first rank, but also an excellent medium for my pianistic purposes. This favorable impression was enhanced upon coming to this country last fall, when at that time I submitted your pianos to the crucial test by playing them at my concerts.

I found them still more sonorous in the unsurpassable strength and grandeur of their bass, the bell-like and crystalline purity of their treble, and the absolute perfection of their delicate mechanism.

The blending of all these sterling qualities makes your piano indeed an instrument of superlative merit, and I congratulate you most heartily upon the artistic success which it has achieved and so richly deserves.

Yours very sincerely, MORIZ ROSENTHAL.

"JAMESTOWN EXPOSITION SPECIAL."

The "Jamestown Exposition Special" provides the most attractive night service to Old Point Comfort, Norfolk, and the Jamestown Exposition. The schedule is so arranged that the leaving time from New York is most convenient, as well as the arriving time at Cape Charles where the steamers of the "Cape Charles Route" are taken for the trip across the Bay.

The train leaves New York daily at 10.55 P. M. with Pullman drawing-room sleeping cars and standard coaches, and arrives Cape Charles at 7.30 A. M., Old Point Comfort 9.30 A. M., and Norfolk 10.30 A. M.

The boat ride from Cape Charles across the Chesapeake Bay is a delightful experience. The steamers leave Cape Charles at 7.30 A. M. and serve breakfast en route. Just beyond Old Point Comfort, on which stands Fort Monroe, one of the chief seacoast defenses of the country, the steamers enter historic Hampton Roads and pass through the waters on which occurred the famous fight between the Merrimac and Monitor, the world's first iron-clads.

Within plain view of the steamers' decks lie the Grounds of the Jamestown Exposition facing directly on Hampton Roads.

MILLIONS STOOD IN DOUGLAS'S NAME

System Designed to Aid Speculating Depositors Made His Thefts Easy.

LOSS PUT AT $140,000

Large blocks of stock deposited with the Trust Company of America, it seems, were allowed to stand in the name of Douglas, the $2,500 a year hond clerk, although all the responsihility for their safe keeping lay with the company. Some of the securities he stole were thus on the face of it his own, and consequently his operations with the hrokers were considerably facilitated. One of the Directors of the trust company admitted this yesterday, explaining that this was done in order to enable manipulations to he made more easily. He did not deny that while the financial transactions of the legitimate owners were expedited by this system, the rohbery hy the defaulting clerk was made much easier.

Not only were Chicago & Rock Island honds taken, hut also 1,000 shares of Pennsylvania Railroad, and a block of Interborough-Metropolitan with other shares. However, the Director asserted that all had now heen recovered. He confirmed the official statement that the actual loss to the company will not be more than $140,000 in cash, but he added an interesting detail. Douglas was bonded for $25,000, and the trust company will be able to collect that amount from the surety company which undertook the risk. That hrings the total amount of loss to he charged to Douglas and Dennett up to $115,000.

When the Director was asked whether the company entertained any hope of getting any of this hack from the prisoners, he seemed very dubious of it. He declared that there was very little cash upon them, when they were arrested, and he said he did not believe that Mrs. Douglas was secreting any of it.

"She seems to be very frank with us," he said. "I think that most of it has heen lost in speculation from time to time."

From tbis it appears that the conspirators had no opportunity to convert into cash much of their plunder of the last two days before the discovery of the robbery. The Director accepted the desire to demand immunity theory as the explanation of the taking of $400,000 on Friday and $50,000 on Saturday. The only reason why the last haul was not for a still greater sum, he said, was that in the hurry of his departure Douglas found too many people about to gather up more.

As a matter of fact, this haste was one of the strokes of luck which alone saved the trust company from a very heavy loss. There was not the least suspicion on the Saturday Douglas left that anything was wrong, and if he had not "gone out to lunch" at 10:45 o'clock and failed to come back he could have marched out with as many securities as he could find at the end of the day's work, got off safely to Canada, and no one would have suspected him until he failed to appear on Monday morning.

It now comes out that the man who was with Mrs. Douglas when she went to the hotel in which her husband was in hiding was Dennett. According to the Director, a good many of the missing securities were found upon Douglas when he was arrested, and a little under $300,000 worth were beneath the mattress of Dennett's room in the Manhattan Club. Bonds were taken out from the bank, pledged as collateral and replaced, and the actual number missing at the time of Douglas's arrest is no indication of the total amount involved in the defalcations.

"The bonds taken at one time or another were more than the least amount reported in the newspapers and less than the greatest sum mentioned," was the enigmatical reply of the Director to a question upon the subject. Probably, then, from first to last Douglas handled illegally something hetween $500,000 and $1,000,000 worth of bonds and shares.

A full statement of exactly what was taken, the date of the abstractions, and the way in which the securities were dealt with has heen furnished to the trust company by Douglas and Dennett. If there is any trouble about recovering the securities from the brokers with whom they were pledged the trust company may rely upon the fact that in many cases they were put up for comparatively small loans, as showing that the brokers ought not to have accepted them without question.

Big Security for Small Loans.

"If a man offers you as collateral bonds worth $36,000 for a loan which he should have been able to raise on bonds worth from $8,000 to $10,000, I think you would be inclined to suspect there was something wrong," said the trust company Director yesterday.

However, he pointed out that in some cases it is a common thing for a man to deposit with a trust company securities at a small advance in order to save himself the trouble and expense of securing a safe-deposit hox. But this applies to men holding bonds for investment and not to speculators like Douglas and Dennett, who were hypothecating securities for short periods in order to raise money for a flier on the market.

With regard to Josiah Quincy's connection with the case, the director had nothing to say.

"Mr. Quincy has spoken," he ssid, "and I do not care to go into the matter."

He did say, however, that he thought all persons in any way connected with the affair were now known.

When the Trust Company of America moves into its new quarters in Wall Street the system under which its business is conducted will he thoroughly overhauled. There will be no more "going out for lunch." A restaurant will be provided in the building, and the clerks and officials will be kept under surveillance to see that their relations with hrokers are not too close.

But the trust company's Director declared last night that, despite precautions under the conditions prevailing in Wall Street, the hanks, after all, had to trust to the integrity of the clerks.

"In one institution of which I am a Director," he said, "there was a few years ago a serious rohbery of securities, and the board met to discuss the situation. There were many suggestions, and one of the officials at last quietly left the room. On his return he walked round the Directors and said:

"'Do you notice anything peculiar ahout me?'

"They declared they did not. Then the official pulled out of his pockets securities worth a million.

"I have just stolen these downstairs," he explained. "There are sixty clerks at work there, and I walked among them and picked up all these honds off their tahles. No one noticed me take any of them. What's to prevent a real thief doing the same?"

William F. Sheehan, counsel for the Trust Company, declared yesterday that there were civil suits in preparation by the company, but he would not give any particulars.

DENNETT'S LIFE IN BOSTON.

Regarded as a Financial Wonder When He First Started In.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 28.—This has been a busy day for the members of old Boston families whose names have been involved in various ways in the Dennett-Douglas bond robbery case. Conferences have been in progress almost continually since the investigation hegan. The deliberations have produced in two instances at least denials that serve only to complicate the situation. The account of things given by Josiah Quincy on Friday and amplified on Saturday is still incomplete. Mr. Quincy did not care further to elucidate the case to-day more than to reiterate his statement of last Friday that he had not seen Dennett from the time they met eight years ago until the man who is accused of being associated in the Trust Company of America theft met him in the Manhattan Club in New York a week ago last Wednesday.

Frank O. Squire, son of John P. Squire of packing house fame, was the first to be heard from. His name was brought into the matter on Saturday by the recollection of Mr. Quincy that Dennett at their Manhattan Club conference preceding the Douglas "get-away" had mentioned Squire's name.

"Dennett told me that Mr. Squire had said I was just the man to handle the case," was the way Mr. Quincy put it on Friday.

Yesterday Mr. Squire, after conferring with his counsel, John P. Wyman, made this statement to the newspapers:

"I bave not been in New York for a year and have not seen Dennett in that time. My dealings with Dennett date back five years, and the matters connected with the Squire corporation have not brought us together within a year.

"I never mentioned Mr. Quincy's name to Dennett in any way, shape, or manner. I have always regarded Mr. Quincy as a person whose only qualifications as a lawyer had to do with real estate matters, and I have not thought of him as a practicing lawyer at all. All I have to say about this case is that I know nothing whatever about it."

Quincy Puts on the Lid.

Mr. Quincy, who lives in Weston, a suburban town, spent Saturday night in Boston, and was in the city part of the day. His law office at 15 State Street was open, but the clerks there said that Mr. Quincy had not heen there. After he had gone out to Weston late in the afternoon Mr. Quincy was asked what comment he cared to make on the statement of Mr. Squire and also that of Forbes J. Hennessy, counsel for Dennett, that he—Mr. Quincy—was much hetter acquainted with Dennett than appeared from his interview of Friday. Mr. Quincy said:

"I have not looked at a newspaper today. I do not propose to spend my time denying garbled statements telegraphed over here from New York. When this matter is all known I will make whatever comment is necessary."

Mr. Quincy was told that Mr. Hennessy was known to have made the assertion stated above. He replied:

"You can deny as positively as you like that I have had any acquaintance with Dennett other than that told of in my first statement. It does no matter how many false statements are made about this case. The truth will come out in the end."

Regarding Mr. Squire's denial that he had suggested Mr. Quincy's name to Dennett Mr. Quincy said:

"I am glad that Mr. Squire said he had nothing to do with the case. His denial is not at all incompatible with what I have already said. I think it quite possible that Dennett mentioned Mr. Squire's name to me as a means of interesting me in the case, and what he said to me may have been either true or false without affecting the fact that he did speak of Mr. Squire as having suggested that I could be found at the Manhattan Club."

Dennett's Life in Boston.

Oliver M. Dennett was once regarded in Boston as a financial wonder. He walked into the office of John A. Gale one day back in 1896, a youth of 22, and applied for the post of Treasurer of the Beacon Trust Company, which Mr. Gale had just organized. There was something about the youngster that appealed to Mr. Gale, and he gave Dennett the place at a salary of $1,000 a year. It was little more than a clerkship then—the treasurership of a baby trust company—but Dennett made it grow. Dennett got out and hustled for accounts. He brought in the business of hrokerage houses. He went up to Haverhill, where Mr. Gale came from originally, and got that business for the Beacon Trust.

So things continued for three or four years. Wilbur F. Whitney was a Director of the trust company, and he and Dennett were on cordial terms.

The Beacon Trust Company did not go down in the crash that brought down the Squire Company, the Lovell Arms Company, the Globe National Bank, and the Broadway Bank—in which Josiah Quincy and Frank O. Squire were co-Directors—in December of 1899. But within a year thereafter disaffection developed hetween Dennett and some of the Beacon Trust Directors.

Gale stood by Dennett until, some time in 1901, he discovered that Dennett's visits to Haverhill had been frequent and to a purpose. All of a sudden it dawned upon Mr. Gale that a lot of his Haverhill friends had given options to Dennett for their stock and that if these and some other options were not gathered in it would not be any time before Dennett controlled the Trust Company. There were some pretty lively doings in the hoard of the Beacon Trust, but Mr. Gale succeeded in buying up enough of the Haverhill stock to control the situation and the day was saved. Dennett left.

Dennett then formed the firm of Dennett, Crane & Blanchard, of which the second-named member was the son of Amos F. Crane, one of the Beacon Trust Directors. He got a membership on the Boston Stock Exchange, and it was at this time that Dennett, Crane & Blanchard undertook to handle the securities of a reorganized Squire corporation prior to the absorption of the Squire business hy the Beef Trust.

Dennett Brothers succeeded Dennett, Crane & Blanchard. The firm was not a member of the Boston Stock Exchange, and went in for mining stocks to a large extent. Its failure in 1903, the flight of Dennett, his arrest, his subsequent return and arrest on a larceny charge have already heen told, and that hrings Boston's rising young financier down to the time when he went to New York.

DENOUNCE DOG QUARANTINE.

Westchester Up in Arms Against Law Forbidding Their Transportation.

Many residents of Westchester County are denouncing the State Agricultural Department for the quarantine which it recently put upon all dogs entering that county. Under the edict of the department, a copy of which has heen sent to all railroad and transportation companies, no dogs can be shipped into the county unless a certificate is first obtained from Albany to the effect that they are not suffering from rahies. Baggage men on the New York Central and New Haven Railroads have received strict orders not to handle dogs. They have been warned that if they violate the rules they will be subjected to a fine of $100.

G. W. Floyd, manager of the Hotel Broztell of New York, declared to-day that he intended to make a test case of the law. Mr. Floyd was put off of a train at New Rochelle when he attempted to board the baggage car with his champion buildog, Fitz. The hotel man protested vigorously, and at first refused to leave the car, and when the baggage man advanced to seize the dog the animal growled at him ferociously. Mr. Floyd declared that he had purchased a ticket and that he would not get off.

The conductor declared that the train would not move until the dog was put off. Then Mr. Floyd left the car. He was obliged to hire a cab, in which he rode with Fitz to Woodlawn Station, on the Harlem Road, which is in New York City.

BROWNLOW SHOUTS FOR A THIRD TERM

Tennessee Leader Hastens to Tell Roosevelt He Is Not a Reactionary.

HIS FRIENDS ARE IN PERIL

Will Consult Marion Butler, President's Campaign Manager—Tennessee Now Solid for Roosevelt.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, April 28.—Representative Walter P. Brownlow of the First District of Tennessee, arrived in Washington to-day, summoned here by friends in office who are menaced with succession by others suspected of not being as thoroughly loyal to the Administration as the exigencies of the situation demand.

Mr. Brownlow, who is the Tennessee member of the National Republican Committee, lost no time in declaring himself for President Roosevelt for the Republican nomination next year. He expressed surprise that his name had been used as one of those who were looking for another man than Mr. Roosevelt as the Republican standard bearer in 1908. It had been stated in some of the press that Mr. Brownlow was an original Taft man. Referring to this impression he said that while he had always particularly admired Mr. Taft, he had never advocated the Secretary's nomination for President next year, and that he was now, as he had been known to be early in Roosevelt's present term, an advocate of Mr. Roosevelt's renomination.

"I have thought ever since he issued the statement that President Roosevelt made a mistake when he said he would not be a candidate and would not accept another nomination to be President," said Mr. Brownlow. "No man ought to declare himself against the wish and will of the people as long as he is able in every way to serve them. He ought to take no position while holding office contrary to the wish and will of the people that he continue to serve them.

"The popular will, based upon the conviction that President Roosevelt is better equipped than ever for the exalted office which he has honored and adorned, attracting the attention and admiration of the whole world, demands that his service be continued for another term. He is confronted by an appeal to the sense of duty that ought to cause him to respond with as cheerful obedience as he gave to his country's cause when with his Rough Riders he went up San Juan Hill."

Brownlow was asked if he was aware that all Southern Republicans must henceforth report for conference and advice to Marion Butler, ex-Populist Senator from North Carolina, whom the Administration had appointed chief of staff for the Southern campaign department.

"So I hear," he answered. "Well, he is a mighty fine man."

This is another confirmation that the ex-Populist is driving the Roosevelt bandwagon in Dixie.

The arrival of Mr. Brownlow is expected to lead to important developments in two Tennessee patronage cases, the result of which has been regarded as dependent upon his attitude toward the Administration's campaign policy. One of the cases was the removal from the Post Office at Columhia, Tenn., of Col. A. M. Hughes, an ardent follower of Mr. Brownlow, in his long factional war with H. Clay Evans, the last Republican candidate for Governor.

Charging that Postmaster Hughes had neglected his duty, the Evans faction, which seemed to be in favor with Secretary Cortelyou and First Assistant Postmaster General Hitchcock, got an order from the latter for Col. Hughes's removal. Col. Hughes hastened to Washington and went to the White House with Representative John Wesley Gaines. He indignantly and emphatically stated his side of the case, declaring he had been shot from ambush. President Roosevelt, although at first offended by the vehemence of the Tennesseean, was impressed and relented.

When Postmaster General Meyer came upon the scene, the President introduced Col. Hughes and asked that Mr. Meyer give him a hearing. This was done the same day, and the case is yet under consideration, with the understanding that a settlement shall be reached as soon as Mr. Meyer returns from Boston and goes over the papers in the case with Mr. Hitchcock. Mr. Brownlow will participate in any effort to sustain Hughes, and they will consult with ex-Senator Marion Butler.

Tho other case is that of Joseph W. Dillin, Surveyor of Customs at Nashville, a Brownlow man, whose scalp is sought by the Evans faction. It is interesting to note that, while the Evansites, including H. Clay Evans and Chairman Sanders of the State Republican Committee, were striving to oust the Brownlow man, they were giving out interviews here declaring themselves for Roosevelt for a third term. This made a false impression, the Brownlow men say, because it was Brownlow who was first on the Roosevelt hand wagon.

A phase of still further interest in the situation is that in some quarters the reactionaries had been counting Brownlow as one of those in the Republican National Committee who would help make a majority against the renomination of Roosevelt. The logic of the matter is that Tennessee will send a solid Roosevelt delegation to the National Convention.

HUGHES THE DARK HORSE.

Watterson Says He Has Learned the Lesson of Tilden.

LOUISVILLE, April 28.—Henry Watterson, in The Courier-Journal, to-morrow will say:

"Mr. Roosevelt has broken all the records, Tyler, Fillmore, Johnson, and Arthur long ago paled their ineffectual fires before him. He is a law unto himself. The good in bad men, the bad in good men, are sometimes magnified and sometimes denied; hut here is a man who gets credit for good and bad alike, and, there is nothing so successful as success.

"Yet, nevertheless and notwithstanding, the President is going to find Jordan a hard road to travel.

"If the country wants an overhauling of policies it will not go to the author of those policies for trained workmen and a chest of tools. The whole people may not be quite ripe for this overhauling. Or they may consider that the Democrats are not ripe for it. Thus, there may be one more victory for the Republicans in 1908, as there was for the Democrats in 1856. But it will have to be gained hy a change of riders and a straddle, for the talk about a 'third term' is the purest nonsense.

"Eminent jurists make disappointing candidates. You may remember that before the last Democratic National Convention I said something of this sort about Judge Parker. It is equally applicable to Judge Taft. The President has overworked Judge Taft as a man of all work, made him too much of a fetch-and-carry.

"The Vice President is an old, a cool, and a shifty hand at the bellows. He is the incarnation of orthodox and conservative Republicanism. Indiana is a pivotal State. What Foraker may do to Taft in Ohio remains to he seen.

"Our National Conventions are growing more and more like our race-courses, where to the knowing ones there are few surprises. Being in France, I am going to buy 'a Paris Mutuel' on a dark horse I picked nearly a year ago—that is, in June, 1906—though I see my 'long shot' is beginning to show in the betting, to wit, Charles E. Hughes, Governor of New York.

"Gov. Hughes seems to have learned the Tilden lesson pretty well already and the rest wil ltake care of itself."

ANOTHER RISE IN DIAMONDS.

Prices Increased Despite Larger Output—Americans Heavy Buyers.

Diamond importers who have returned from Europe within a few days agree in saying that they have been obliged to pay higher prices for diamonds than ever before, and that American buyers are eagerly taking all the choice stones they can get.

The output of South African diamonds has been increasing in quantity as well as in price, according to New York dealers. The independent diamond companies have of late heen taking from the ground about half as much in weight of stones as has the De Beers Consolidated Mines, Limited, which had control of 97 per cent. of the world's output up to three years ago.

Even now, say the importers, the De Beers control has not been shaken because it gets from its mines the higher grades of stones which alone appeal to the American gem buyers.

COSTLY HUDSON MEMORIAL.

The Hudson Memorial Bridge at Spuyten Duyvil, originally intended to be a comparatively small affair, bids fair to cost in the neighborhood of $13,000,000. In addition to the $8,000,000 already requested, application has just been made to the Board of Estimate for an additional $5,000,000 with which to purchase land for a park about the approaches.

As at present figured out the land will cost $5,000,000, the bridge itself $8,000,000, and the construction of the approaches another $5,000,000. Ths Mayor expressed the opinion yesterday that the price of the land was too high. The Board of Estimate referred the whole matter to the Controller.

CRUSADING MONK VISITS THE DUMA

FRIENDS SAVE MILIUKOFF

Practically Kidnap Him and Hurry Him Out of Russia—Alexinsky's Power Growing.

Special Cablegram.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 28.—The monk Iliodor, the Crusader from Volhynia, arrived in the Duma yesterday, fortunately without the 200,000 peasant fanatics with whom he threatened the Assembly. He is a wild, unkempt creature, with mad, staring eyes, and gives one, if nothing else, a realizing sense of Peter the Hermit.

The peasant members of the Right follow their prophet about with the implicit obedience of well-trained puppies. He implores the peasants to stand by the old creeds, religious and political. I heard him declare to his listeners: "In the autocracy of God's annointed is your only safety. Otherwise you infallibly will have to bow your heads to the yoke of the Jews."

The fact that he is obviously insane will not curtail the fanatical monk's powers for mischief.

Prof. Miliukoff, the balance wheel of the Constitutional Democrats, whose life has been notoriously in jeopardy at the hands of reactionary assassins for some weeks past, was practically kidnapped by friends on Friday night and hurried out of Russia.

I saw M. Alexinsky again to-day. He said:

"Really, I and those who stand with me are not so terribly iconoclastic. At present we are giving our Constitutional Government, so falsely called, a fair trial, though every day I work here in the chamber to overthrow the Stolypin Ministry because it is idle to expect that a new régime will be given to us by such men. I shall continue to work openly against this Ministry, and all succeeding ones formed exclusively by bureaucrats, until a Government is formed with the purpose of helping the Russian peasant and laborer to live a life higher than that of the beasts of the fields, which is his at present.

An altogether extraordinary man is Alexinsky, a physical reproduction in Slavic colors of Hugo's Quasimodo. He is intellectually a Bebel, though I fear he did not favor me with one of his most precious gems of thought. He is unquestionably the ablest debater in the Duma, and is acquiring power every day outside his own group.

That the Holy Synod remains the same as in the days of Pobiedonostzeff is shown by the appointment of Bishop Plato, a reactionary member of the Duma, as Bishop of America, with residence in New York. Plato led the applause at the public meeting a few days ago which demanded a dictatorship. The eloquent priest Petroff, of Liberal leaning, has been sent to a monastery to do two years' penance.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 28.—The streets and railway stations here are filled with picturesque groups of Molokanye, or milk-drinking Quakers, who are on their way to Finland, whence they will embark for America. They have been driven from their farms down the Volga by famine and politics.

Two thousand sailed last week and more will sail this week.

WITTE PLEASES LIBERALS.

Makes a Speech in the Upper House Criticising That Institution.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 28.—Count Witte, the ex-Premier, made a characteristic speech in the Council of the Empire to-day. The speech was a bid for Liberal support.

Count Witte criticized the paralysis of the Council of the Empire, and said it was unworthy of being called the Upper House. "What kind of an institution is ours," he exclaimed, "drifting aimlessly, avoiding its work, afraid to assert its will or proclaim its existence? Let us follow the Duma's example and take part in the country's business; otherwise we will be swept away as a useless piece of State mechanism."

SCURVY SPREADS IN RUSSIA.

11,000 Cases in One of the Famine-stricken Provinces.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 28.—Scurvy has increased greatly in the famine districts. An urgent meeting of the Government Relief Commission has been called for to-morrow, following the receipt of a telegram from M. Koropatchinsky, Zemstvo President of Ufa Province, reporting 11,000 cases in the province up to April 25. Official reports of the last two weeks of March showed 1,055 cases in that province.

M. Koropatchinsky asks for $27,500 and additional medical aid.

WE'LL LIGHT CZAR'S PALACE.

American Electrical Companies Place Orders Abroad for $5,000,000.

American interests have captured a number of important foreign contracts for electrical equipment, including a complete plant for lighting the Czar's palace at Tsarskoe, near St. Petersburg. Contracts have also been obtained within the last few days for the construction and operation of a British municipal electric traction system and for rails for one of the biggest corporation tramways on the other side.

The carrying out of the work, which calls for the shipment of turbines, etc., to England, France, Italy, Australia, and South America, will represent an outlay of upwards of $5,000,000.

The British Westinghouse Company, Limited, which represents the Westinghouse interests in Great Britain, and which is largely controlled by the American Westinghouse connection, has now on order more than 100,000 horsepower of steam turbines and 40,000 horsepower of generators on English account. The principal turbine orders have been obtained for London traction and lighting plants, while the generators are intended for installation in municipal power stations in the British metropolis, Bristol, Neasden, Middlesboro-on-Tees, and Brighton.

The Italian affiliations of the Westinghouse people have contracted for turbo-generators for the Giovi lighting system, while the Australian engineering and contracting firm of Noyes Brothers, which represents the same interests in the Antipodes, has ordered dynamos and motors for operating batteries, stone crushers and ore tramways in the New Moon Company's gold mines at Bendigo, New South Wales.

The Usina Electrica of Montevideo, South America, has ordered different apparatus for its new substations, while big gas engines of a new type are to be shipped to Buenos Ayres. Other orders for gas engines, which foot up a total of nearly 6,000 horsepower, have been received from the Midland Railway Company of England, of Heysbam docks and from Gibraltar.

The London County Council has allotted the Westinghouse concern another contract for motor equipments for cars to be operated in and around the British metropolis, making an aggregate of thirty-four equipments ordered within the past few months. One thousand and forty magnetic brake outfits have also been requisitioned.

J. G. White & Co., Limited, of London, which is the British branch of the New York electrical engineering and contracting firm of J. G. White & Co., has entered into an arrangement with the Luton municipality for the construction and operation of an electric traction road. The initial road will be six miles long. The overhead system will be employed. The contract price is $300,000. The White Company contracts to pay all interest and sinking fund charges on the loan and 20 per cent. of the net profits earned to the corporation. The contract is for five years, with the option of renewal for ten years more.

The United States Steel Products Export Company, the foreign business end of the United States Steel Corporation, which recently secured a contract for rails, etc., from the Glasgow corporation, received an order from the Manchester municipal tramway authorities for special rails.

ICELAND WANTS A FLAG.

Nationalist Demonstrations May Be Made Before the Danish King.

COPENHAGEN, April 28.—An agitation for a special Icelandic flag is being strongly pressed in Iceland. The country holds a favored position in the Danish monarchy, and all its demands, particularly in the direction of home rule, have been granted in recent years. Denmark maintains, however, that so long as Iceland belongs to her the Danish flag must be its emblem.

The municipality of Reykjavik has agreed to display an Icelandic flag during the contemplated visit of the King, and there are reports that nationalistic demonstrations of other sorts will be made. Foreign nations having trade and fishing interests in Iceland are encouraging the movement, and would be glad to see Iceland entirely separated from Denmark.

Iceland Plants for Alaska.

COPENHAGEN, April 28.—The American Department of Agriculture has ordered different kinds of Icelandic seals and potatoes from the Agricultural Society in Reykjavik, proposing to experiment with them in Alaska.

King Edward Visits Harrison Davis.

NAPLES, April 28.—King Edward, who is visiting the Vesuvian villages, to-day stopped at the villa owned by Harrison Davis, an American, with whom he took tea.

Notes of Foreign Affairs.

GUAYAQUIL, April 28.—The campaign for the Congressional elections, which begin on May 5, is resulting almost daily in collisions between the partisans of the Government and the Independent Liberals. A serious fight has taken place at Quito, where Independents attacked the Alfaristas, (followers of President Alfaro,) several persons being killed and a number wounded. A collision occurred here to-day. Several persons were wounded.

ROME, April 28.—The Messagero says the reason for the delay in the transportation of the remains of Pope Leo XIII. to the Church of St. John Lateran is a disagreement among the Cardinals who form the committee having the transfer in charge, some of them wishing to have the function private and the others wanting it to be of a semi-official character. The objection to the latter proposal is that the Vatican would be compelled to request the assistance of the Italian Government in maintaining order.

BAKU, April 28.—The shipowners and exporters have decided to grant an increase of pay to the striking Captains and engine-room men belonging to the naphtha flotilla on the Caspian Sea. The strikers are considering the offer. It is rumored that the workmen in other trades contemplate striking in sympathy with the seamen.

LISBON, April 28.—Government officials announce that a treaty of arbitration between Portugal and Denmark has been signed and that differences between the two countries hereafter will be submitted to The Hague Tribunal. Similar treaties with other countries are in preparation.

ROME, April 28.—Deputy Fusinato, ex-Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs and ex-Minister of Instruction, has been added to the Italian delegation to the ePace Conference at The Hague.

NO WAITERS' STRIKE LIKELY IN NEW YORK

But It's True That New Yorkers Have Helped to Make Paris Waiterless.

AMERICANS TIP SO WELL

Waiters in Clover in the Better Class Restaurants Here—Their Earnings Estimated.

New York waiters who have grown old in the service and to whom the growth of the tip habit has meant the swelling of bank accounts, said yesterday that the cabled despatch from Paris to THE TIMES that America is, in a measure responsible for the conditions which brought on the waiters' strike there, is true. They characterized New York as the "home of the tip" and said that wealthy New Yorkers and other Americans who travel in Europe have increased the scale of tips to such an extent that in Paris the café and restaurant keepers decided to increase the amount they have been levying for years on their waiters, thus causing the strike.

The New York waiter, according to his own admission, is probably the best tipped waiter in the world. The tip habit, he says, has grown with the years, until now there are many waiters in New York who own houses, not only to live in themselves, but to rent to their less fortunate or less saving fellows. One, at least, of New York's waiters owned a race horse a few years ago.

There is no danger of a waiter strike in New York. Oh, my, no! The tips are coming in too well for that. In fact, it is worth from $25 to $40 a week to be a waiter in any one of a dozen or more first-class restaurants and hotels in this city. And most of this comes, needless to say, from tips. The average salary of a waiter in one of the high-class places here is only $20 or, at best, $25 a month. Tips make up the rest. True, the waiter gets his meals free if he wants them, but hundreds of the waiters have homes and wives and children with whom they prefer to eat rather than breakfast or dine on the food of the hotel or restaurant in which they work.

This condition has spread to Europe, to Paris especially. Men who followed the tide of custom and tipped liberally when eating in public places here in New York kept up the custom when abroad. They found it necessary in Europe, according to several waiters who began service on the other side before coming here. The Parisian waiter is more mercenary than his New York brother and is more prone to show his feelings when a paltry tip comes his way. Here it is not so bad; at least the head waiters and the hotel or restaurant managers say they try to keep it from being so bad.

The captains of the dining room say they see to it that the non-tipping diner gets just the same service as the liberal one—the slave to the tip habit. It means nothing to the head waiter if his subordinate does not get as large a tip as he expected from a diner, because the head waiter reaps no monetary return from the tips of his subordinates—at least he says he doesn't. Really the salary of the average head waiter would be considered large enough to deter him from any such system of graft. There are head waiters in the city who receive $4,000 a year.

It is hard to strike an average on the tips a New York waiter receives in one of the first-class places. They vary from a dime to half a dollar, and sometimes reach $1 for one person, the same percentage holding good when two or four or more persons are eating together. Rare instances of ridiculously large tips, $10 or $20, from the host of a small party, have been related, although not by the waiters. The latter are not inclined to boast of those phenomenal tips, although they do not attempt to disguise the fact that by far the larger part of their weekly earnings comes from tips.

"It's a gamble in a sense," said Dave, one of the veterans of Shanley's uptown restaurant, yesterday, in talking about tips and those who give them. "Some weeks a fellow plays in good luck and the tips are good. Other weeks are bad."

Dave has been with the Shanleys for fourteen years. He has seen the evolution of the tip almost from its infancy, so to speak. He says that New York waiters, as a rule, are satisfied. He says, too, that it depends to a large extent on the personality of the waiter whether his weekly earnings are large or small.

"There is only one trouble with the New York waiter," said Thomas Shanley, the restaurant man. "They make too much. Sometimes that causes them to grow careless. None of our 300 waiters belong to unions. There is always a waiting list. The job of waiter is much better than it used to be."

Arthur L. Barney of the Knickerbocker Hotel said that the waiters as a rule are satisfied with 10 per cent. of the amount of the check, although the average man who tips rarely bases the size of his tip on the size of the check.

"There are occasions where the head waiter comes in for a slice of the tip, although they never levy on the underwaiters," said Mr. Barney. "Sometimes a man will call up the headwaiter and order a dinner for, say, six, over the telephone. He will leave it to the head waiter to select the dishes. After the party the host will slip the head waiter a bill in addition to the tip he has given to the waiter."

Under waiters, or waiters' assistants, receive, on the average, $5 less a month in wages than the regular waiters. These helpers are almost always tipped by the waiters they assist. This is apparently the only instance of profit sharing among waiters in the high-class restaurants and cafés.

The acting manager at Sherry's said yesterday that the wages paid to waiters in this city are probably less than in other cities of the United States. This is owing to the larger tips that are given here. In San Francisco, he said, a waiter at the good places gets $40 a month, but he does not make as much in a month as his more fortunate New York brother.

One of the oldest waiters in this city is Rientz, at Delmonico's. He is 67 years old, and has been with the Delmonicos thirty-four years. He says he can remember when 10 cents was considered a fair tip for the same meal which now nets a waiter 25 or 50 cents. The waiters at Delmonico's average between $30 and $35 a week when business is good. The manager of the Forty-fourth Street place said yesterday that no waiters' strike will hit New York so long as present conditions hold. While none of the first-class waiters belong to unions here, they have clubs, such as the Geneva Society, but these associations do not attempt to regulate the wages of their members. So much of the weekly pay is tips that unions could not regulate it.

The story told of the waiter who owned a racehorse is this: Franz, who for years was head waiter at the Claremont, purchased a racer. He entered it at Morris Park one day to race on the next. That night, if he appeared a little preoccupied, he had ample excuse. Visions of the rich stake were in his mind.

Early the next morning he received a telephone message saying, "Come and get your horse." It was from the police. Franz's hostler had taken the animal out for a stroll, had visited several places where mental tanglefoot was dispensed, had started a race on his own hook, and had been arrested. The racer was much the worse for wear, so much worse that it did not run next day. Franz then, as the story goes, decided to abandon his ambition to own a racing stable.

Daily Paper for Russian Exiles.

Announcement was made yesterday that Ivan Okunkoff, the Cossack editor and revolutionist, who was condemned to death for editing a revolutionary paper in Russia, but whose sentence was commuted to life imprisonment, and who escaped from Siberia, will soon publish a Russian daily newspaper in this city. Associated with him will be Mr. Jacob Gordin, Winchevsky M. Katz, Goldzeff, and several other Russian publicists.

CUBANS OPPOSE ARMY PLAN.

Force of 12,000 Men Not Wanted—Derision Among the Liberals.

HAVANA, April 28.—The plan of a Cuban standing army of 12,000 men, as suggested by the General Staff of the American Army, is most attractive to that element of the Cuban people which is fond of the gold lace and regalia of Spanish-American armies. But among the conservative elements the plan excites really less interest than the preceding one to recruit the Rural Guard up to 12,000 men.

The latter plan was vigorously opposed even by the Liberals, who, it was supposed, would have jumped at the opportunity opened by such a lavish distribution of patronage. While the standing army scheme evidently has been framed to meet their objections, the apparent impossibility of this accomplishment has caused it to be received with something very like derision.

Gov. Magoon, who has not yet been advised of any intention of the War Department to adopt the elaborate programme of the General Staff, does not believe it possible to recruit in the Island of Cuba 12,000 soldiers who shall come up to the standard of the United States Army. Where, it is asked, are to be found the officers to command this force?

Still more serious objections to the scheme are that it at once imposes on the republic the double burden of a huge military establishment, which will absorb at least one-third of the revenues, and diminution of the already thin ranks of labor by just so many men as are called upon to bear arms.

That the project does not excite any very grave apprehensions among Cubans of any faction is due to the impression that the plan is merely a tentative proposition of the General Staff, and that the manifest obstacles in the way of its accomplishment render it entirely unlikely of serious consideration by the American Government. Probably a moderate increase of the Rural Guard, now about 1,500 men below its authorized strength of 5,000, will be regarded by most Cubans as a satisfactory establishment of the status of the armed forces of the republic.

FIRE THREATENED COLON.

Cristobal Fire Brigade Prevented a Disastrous Conflagration.

COLON, April 28.—At 2 o'clock this morning fire started close to the costly Panama Government public buildings, which are nearing completion, and destroyed the Wesleyan schoolhouse.

A fresh breeze was blowing, and only the timely arrival of the Cristobal fire brigade saved the entire portion of the city south of Sixth Street. The city is grateful for the help rendered by the Cristobal firemen.

Spanish Queen at a Banquet.

MADRID, April 28.—Queen Victoria went driving this morning, and this evening attended a banquet at the palace in honor of Cardinal Aguirre y Garcia, Bishop of Burgos, upon whose head King Alfonso to-day placed the red hat. The King has abandoned all of his usual automobile excursions.

American Artist's Success at Venice.

VENICE, April 28.—The first sales made at the International Art Exhibition, which was inaugurated here yesterday, include three pictures by an American artist, Richard Miller. The purchaser was M. De Stefani of Buenos Ayres. The price paid was $4,000.

FOUND DEAD IN BATHTUB.

Jay Stern Was on a Business Trip to Worcester, Mass.

Special to The New York Times.

WORCESTER, Mass., April 28.—Unable to get any response to his repeated knocks on the locked door of the bathroom of his apartments, at 80 Pleasant Street, and hearing the water trickling to the floor, Dr. Benjamin M. Pevey sawed his way through and found dead, lying face downward in the bathtub, Jay Stern of New York, a man about fifty years old.

According to the police Stern came here three days ago, arriving on a business trip. He returned last night to the Pevey home, where he had a room, and was shortly afterward heard to enter the bathroom. In his overcoat was found a letter from a brother, apparently, Henry E. Stern of the law firm of Stern & Hirshfeld, in Albany. It was dated Feb. 9 and the contents indicated that the dead man was worth about $75,000. Nothing is known of the man here. Another brother, Dr. Moses Stern, was traced in New York City to-day by the police.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, April 28.—Jay Stern, who was found dead in a bath tub at the home of Dr. Pevey of 80 Pleasant Street, Worcester, Mass., on Saturday, was a wealthy manufacturing optician, who for several months had made his home with friends in this city. He was identified by means of a letter addressed to "Jay Stern, 434 Market Street, Philadelphia." This letter was from Henry E. Stern of the law firm of Stern & Hirshfeld, Albany, N. Y., and referred to a transaction in which Stern had invested $75,000.

F. Ahren, an auctioneer, of 434 Market Street, said to-night that Stern had letters addressed to the Market Street address while in this city last Winter. He stayed here with the Ahren family for several months. He was in ill-health and was often attacked with spells of vertigo. Stern was a brother of Moses Stern.

CASTRO MAY RESIGN OFFICE ON MAY 23

Venezuelan Advices Says He Will Seek Health in Swiss Mountains.

HOPES FOR POWER AGAIN

Gen. Gomez, with Whom He Has Become Reconciled, Will Be Venezuela's New President.

President Cipriano Castro of Venezuela, according to information received in this city yesterday from two independent sources, is planning to retire from office on May 23. The reason is his continued ill-health. He will go to Switzerland. Gen. Juan Vicente Gomez, First Vice President, will succeed to the Presidency.

President Castro has been in poor health for nearly a year, and while he has continued nominally as Chief Executive, he has given little attention to Government affairs. About three months ago a serious operation was performed on him at Macuto, a seaside resort near La Guayra. He was not expected to survive it, but in a few weeks had recovered sufficiently to be taken to Caracas. However, he has not fully regained his health, and has accepted the advice of friends to seek restoration in Swiss mountains.

The date reported to have been set by Castro, May 23, is the anniversary of his greatest achievement. On that day eight years ago he struck the final blow against the Andrade Government and became Dictator of Venezuela. So he has chosen the same date to make his exit. On that day also the Venezuelan Congress convenes, and will be asked to act on the retirement.

It is understood by persons in this city that Castro is not laying down permanently the power which he has wielded for eight years. He expects to take it again when he returns from the sojourn abroad. During his illness some bitter feeling was engendered between him and Gen. Gomez because the latter, although President pro tem., was not permitted to exercise the functions of that office. Instead, Castro delegated his power to his close friends in the Cabinet, and to Dr. Revenga, his Secretary General, who was also his physician. There was even evidence that Castro was preparing to place Francisco L. Alcantara, President of the State of Aragua, in the Presidency to succeed him if he died. There has since been a reconciliation between Castro and Gomez, and the latter will be left in charge.

UNITED IN THE AMBULANCE.

Strange Case of a Deserted Baby and Young Mother.

It was evidently willed yesterday that Mary Mikolio, a young Austrian woman whose husband is away, should not be separated from the baby to which she had just given birth. Though half a mile was put between them by the nearly exhausted young mother, she was glad when circumstances brought the baby back to her.

Henry Elder of 140 Greenwich Street saw a crowd standing around an ash barrel at 132 Greenwich Street late yesterday afternoon. He brushed them aside, took off his coat, and ran with the newborn babe to the Church Street Station. Capt. Gallagher ordered out the reserves to make a house-to-house canvass for the mother, that her life might be saved. As the men were lining up to march out and as Surgeon Leslie was still working on the child, a telephone message asked for an ambulance at Murray and West Streets immediately.

Dr. Leslie could not desert the little girl. He took her with him to the new call. The patient there was a woman, who had fallen on the street in a pitiably weak condition. She had just given birth to a child. And the girl in the surgeon's arms was her's. She knew her in the strange clothes. They were both hurried away to the Hudson Street Hospital. The girl will live, Dr. Leslie said.

CHRISTIAN UNITY PRAISED BY TAFT

Tells Y. M. C. A. of His Experience in Negotiations Over Friars' Lands.

THE CHURCHES TOLERANT

Association Has Great Influence for Good in the Nation's Far-Off Possessions, He Says.

DAYTON, Ohio, April 28.—Religious tolerance was the chief subject of a speech made this afternoon by Secretary Taft at the dedication of the Young Men's Christian Association Building. He referred particularly to his mision to Rome to settle the problem of the friars' lands in the Philippines.

In beginning Mr. Taft warmly praised the Y. M. C. A.

"It believes in the Christian religion," he said, "but is tolerant, liberal in its scope, and knows no denomination, no race, no politics. The truth is, the growth of the Young Men's Christian Association has been an evidence of and at the same time an assistance to the growth of the spirit of Christian tolerance among all denominations. We are all more tolerant to-day than formerly.

"I never was so fully conscious of this fact as when the questions arose which had become intensely acute in the Philippine Islands in regard to the continued ownership of a large body of agricultural lands by certain religious orders of the Roman Catholic Church. The prospect of a new insurrection was immediate, and the solution which offered itself was that the Government should buy these lands from the friars and then sell them on easy terms to the present tenants.

"In order to bring this about, however, it was necessary to secure the consent of the head of the Roman Catholic Church, and it was thought wise, therefore, to send a representative to Rome to confer with Leo XIII. upon this question in order, if possible, to bring about a friendly and amicable solution. But it was seriously objected that the Protestant denominations of the country would resent deeply the establishment even temporarily of what might seem to be diplomatic relations with a church.

"Finally the President, after consulting the representatives of the leading Protestant denominations, counted upon the good sense and the religious tolerance of the people of the United States, and concluded to follow the ordinary business principle that when one wishes to accomplish a result he should deal directly with the person having the power effectually to agree upon the result desired, and a representative was sent. The business, after much negotiation both at Rome and at Manila, was finally concluded, and no persons were more considerate of the difficulties presented and sympathetic with the policy adopted to meet them by the President than the Protestant denominations whose opposition had been feared.

"I venture to think that fifty years ago such a result would not have followed, and that the motives of the Government, and of the President, would have been misunderstood or misconstrued. I regard that as one striking instance of the greater brotherhood that now exists between the great Christian denominations—a brotherhood that finds no more eloquent proof than in the continued prosperity and growth in influence and power of the Young Men's Christian Association which dedicates this building to-day."

Secretary Taft said that he had not thought it especially appropriate for him to deliver an address on this occasion, as he had not been particularly identified, as an individual, with Y. M. C. A. work. "But when I remembered," said he, "the opportunties which I have had for observation of the usefulness of this association in the army of the United States in the Philippines, on the Isthmus of Panama, and in other foreign dependencies, I felt that I should be failing to render testimony which was due this occasion if I did not say something upon the subject of the scope of its operations within my official cognizance. I had to put myself seven thousand miles from home really to know the power for good this association exerts."

He said that army officers in the United States and in Porto Rico and the Philippines had been enjoined to facilitate the efforts of the association in every proper way and he testified that excellent results were being achieved.

"But nowhere," said the Secretary, "is the opportunity for usefulness of the Y. M. C. A. greater than among Americans in the Philippines, Porto Rico, Cuba, and on the Isthmus of Panama. It is inevitable that a great many of the Americans who go first to our tropical dependencies, a long distance from the United States, should be wandering and irresponsible.

"Nothing contributes more to the support of the views of opponents of our plans of progress than the presence in Manila and other cities and towns of dissolute Americans, whose example is anything but edifying, and who form an object lesson to enforce the claim made by our opponents that there is nothing of value in American civilization for them to follow. Their people are generally a temperate people, as most tropical peoples are, while Northern people in the tropics are not infrequently given to intemperance.

"Now, the way to avoid this is to furnish a place in which the leisure hours of Americans in these dependencies can be passed in rational, elevating, and moral pursuits and entertainments. The Young Men's Christian Association is one of the most effective instruments to this end that we have."

He said that on the Isthmus of Panama, in the American zone, the Canal Commission had constructed four club houses, one each at Culebra, Empire, Gorgona and Cristobal.

"Some question has been raised as to whether the expenditure of this money was within the authority of the commission," he continued. "I have not the slightest doubt about it. The authority of the President in the construction of the canal is to build the canal, and he has therefore the right to expend the money in any way necessary in the pursuance of that purpose."

Too Many Spirits at the Meeting of the Brooklyn Medium.

The Rev. Mary S. Pepper, the Spiritualist medium, celebrated her departure from the Church of Fraternity of Soul Communion, at Bedford Avenue and Madison Street, Brooklyn, last night by a service at which there was an occurrence taken at first by her hearers and followers as an unexpected exhibit of her prowess in the spirit world. It came between the recitation of a minor poet and the baptizing of a baby, "John Henry," royalty fees omitted.

Before it came the medium, who was indorsed by Dr. Isaac Funk, explained that she had not resigned from the church; that, on the contrary, she was only going to take a slight rest, and that in the Fall she and her followers would seek a new home.

The meeting, the last of the kind until Fall, began with the usual "lecture" by Mrs. Pepper. Christ and Mohammed had been scorned at first, she said. The populace wasn't ready for their spiritual truths. So were the latter-day pioneers, the Spiritualists, scorned. They were very much scorned, indeed. Yet they brought the spiritual world to the ken of the seeing much more adequately. In the end their truth would be apparent.

A Spiritualist Baptism.

Then Mrs. Pepper announced that Henry Stagner would occupy some time. He did. He recited a poem that told of a wonderful organ in a wonderful temple of music. And of how a little note had got lost out in the cold, cold world. Next the infant was produced. Howling, it was brought into the presence of the head of the church. Mrs. Pepper made a mystic sign above the helpless infant.

"By this sign," said she, "I receive you into the realm of spiritualism and the service of humanity."

She turned to the parents and told them that they were very luck indeed to have had a son who had been admitted into the realms of spiritualism and the service of humanity. They looked as though they thought so, too, but didn't just want to speak out in church.

Then Mrs. Pepper began to say spiteful things about Mohammed. While she was in the middle of a sentence which intimated that he was a person of small importance, there came a moan from the organ; a sighing from one of the pipes.

"Its another manifestation of her remarkable power," said a woman with a high brow, to her bespectacled husband.

Again came the sound—this time down in the bass register.

The whole audience by this time had forgotten the speaker who was bravely proceeding, and had itse attention focused upon the organist who did not appear to be doing anything that would cause the sounds. On the contrary he was some distance away from the organ.

Still the same slow, steady sound, followed by a sunburst of harmony.

"She is indeed wonderful,' whispered the woman with the high brow.

But she wasn't. She was only very much disturbed, and perplexed, too.

She continued, however, at her task of telling about crystal walls and evolving man separated from the real world of truth by the flesh with which he was unfortunate enough to be born.

Then as seemingly of themselves the pipes of the organ began a symphony that might have been labeled "Discord," and as such would have received the approbation of the Wagnerian world, the organist moved. He moved slowly. But still he moved. He moved to his seat and then he got down on his knees. Apparently he was groping about.

The symphony faded into an obligato, and then thundered into a world opera of creation—of beginnings.

The coat tails of the organist as he bent down stuck out like the tails of twin pointer dogs in a Pennsylvania wheatfield where the pheasants have been feeding. Intense—alive—anxious, they quivered.

Lost in a gaze of hypnotic intensity, the spiritual-minded audience watched those coat tails. The thing was beyond belief. Plainly the teacher and her spirits were playing pranks with the organist—and with the audience as well.

A Cat Symphony.

Of a sudden the organist straightened up. His back was still toward the front of the house. The organ notes ceased. There was dead silence in the house. All eyes were upon that back.

Slowly the organist turned about. The audience prepared itself for a shock. It got one. In his arms he held a cat. It was white. There was a moment of gasping astonishment. Then silence. Then a wave of laughter.

The laughter continued as, carefully, the cat was passed from hand to hand along the length of the choir loft. The last singer who received it vanished into the outer and rear darkness. Then the audience again became conscious of the voice of the leader, which, despite interruption, had not once faltered.

After the cat had been disposed of and Mrs. Pepper had talked for some time upon the wall of flesh between the mind of man and his true world, she treated her bearers to a seance. Before her was a pile of letters received from people in the house. Lightly she ran her fingers over them.

"A spirit is coming," she said; "he is traveling over that wall."

She pointed at the side wall, and the audience looked at the wall as though they were seeing things.

"It speaks to me a message," she went on. "Is there any one here who knows a man in Ireland by the name of Good?"

No one knew Good.

He did so.

"Now you across the aisle. Now touch the woman in the seat in front of you. Now you, woman, did you ever know Good?

"I might have done so," said the woman.

"Well his spirit tells me that you once had business dealings with his grandson and that you regretted having met the man."

The woman laughed. "You're right, I certainly regret having met that fellow. He cheated me," she said. After which there was more of the same kind.

STOPS COPPER WIRE THEFTS.

But Trenton Junk Dealers Will Fight Ordinance as Unconstitutional.

Special to The New York Times.

TRENTON, April 28.—The junk dealers of this city are to take into the courts the sweeping Swartz city ordinance passed to stop the thefts of copper wire and railroad copper and brass. During the last seven years many thousand dollars' worth of copper wire has been stolen from the telegraph and telephone companies, the wire thieves crippling service between New York and Philadelphia every few weeks.

Councilman Swartz, manager of the local office of the Western Union Company, was the author of the ordinance forbidding junk dealers to receive goods between 6 P. M. and 7 A. M. It was between these hours that the thefts were committed and the stuff sold. This ordinance, the junk dealers say, is unconstitutional, they having the right to regulate the hours of business, and not the Council. The City Solicitor says that because of the police power of the Council that body acted correctly. Another clause which the junk men will fight is that forbidding the issuance of a junk license to any one but a citizen of the United States and a resident of New Jersey.

Civil Service Reform Dinner.

The Civil Service Reform Association will have a dinner, in connection with its annual meeting, at the Hotel Astor, on Wednesday, May 8, at which Col. Silas W. Burt will preside, and the speakers will include James R. Garfield, Secretary of the Interior; Controller Herman A. Metz, Edward M. Shepard, John G. Milburn, ex-Mayor Osborne of Buffalo, and John Lord O'Brien of Buffalo.

DR. AKED'S SERMON ATTACKED BY RABBI

Dr. Schulman Says Rockefeller Pastor Expressed Views That Are Un-American.

SEES A SLUR ON HEBREWS

English Minister Denies He Intended Any In Saying Christianity Solved Immigrant Problem.

Rabbi Schulman at the Temple Beth-El, Fifth Avenue and Seventy-sixth street, attacked yesterday morning the first sermon preached hy the noted English clergyman, Rev. Dr. Aked, in his new charge, the Fifth Avenue Baptist Church.

In that sermon the English minister, who lately came to the church in which Mr. Rockefeller is a pewholder, spoke of the immigration problem and said:

"The deepest truth of all is this that the best Christian citizen is the best citizen, and the surest way, the quickest way, the most economical way, and the most permanent way of making these people good Americans and good patriots is to make them good Christians."

In this Dr. Schulman saw a slur on the Hebrew race, and yesterday eloquently defended the people of his own race as the equals of any in citizenship, and declared that the opinions of Dr. Aked were un-American.

Dr. Aked was asked last night after his evening service if he had any remarks to make upon the answer Rabbi Schulman had made to him. He said:

"Dr. Schulman is making a mistake. I did not think it necessary to differentiate between the good Christian and the spiritual man. What I said in that sermon I meant in a theistic sense, not a literal sense. I do not care what a man's creed it. A man is a good Christian if he is a moral and a spiritual man, and if the term Christian did not include all such men, I am perfectly willing to use another term.

Meant No Discrimination.

"The trouble is we are living in an age of controversy. That is why Dr. Schulman can take issue over the mere use of a word. My religious beliefs are broad enough to include every moral man under the name Christian. In the country I came from we have practically no race feeling and comparatively few Jews. Therefore it never occurred to me that I should have to discriminate so carefully in my choice of words.

"My meaning was certainly not to insult the Hebrews nor to infer that they do not make good citizens. Of course I had no such views. I am sure that if I could see Dr. Schulman and talk with him five minutes on the subject I would convince him that our views on the question are the same."

"Will you seek such an interview?" Dr. Aked was asked.

"No," he replied. "The fact is, I am very busy."

Rabbi Schulman in his sermon said in part: "Nothing is so elusive as a theological term. Usually it is used by each person to symbolize what is best for his own religion. When it is used loosely we have no quarrel with it, but when it is used to make 1,000,000 citizens uncomfortable and to misinterpret the hospitality of American institutions and to give them an ecclesiastical garb they were never meant to wear, we must protest.

Nation Not Founded on Christianity.

"It is proper for every religionist to identify with his own religion the best in character and citizenship. It is as natural for a Christian to say a good man is a good Christian as for us Jews to say a good man is faithful to the teachings of Judaism. Both will assert that a man cannot be a good Christian or Jew unless he is a good man, but the converse is not true. To be a good man you need not be a good Christian nor a good Jew."

The preacher went on to quote Washington's statement, when a treaty with a Mohammedan power was under consideration: "This Government is in no sense founded upon the Christian religion," and urged the necessity of the Jews, the minority in the land, protesting against any sort of religious monopoly which would exclude them from the national life. Then he quoted the fear expressed by Dr. Aked that the millions coming to America would vitiate the American stock, and declared:

Indignant at the Sermon.

"Remember, many of these immigrants are Russian Jews flying from the land where Christianity has assumed so peculiar an aspect, I read his sermon with moral indignation at such a message of reconciliation coming from a minister of the gospel of peace.

"This race which is accused of vitiating the American people gave to the world the man who by blood was a Jew and is by the preacher thought to be more than man. It gave to the world the Decalogue and the Old Testament, which have provided arsenals of texts to New England preachers on respect of parents, observance of the Sabbath, and sympathy with the poor.

"I was the more profoundly shocked because these words were preached in a Baptist church, which should maintain the glorious traditions of Roger Williams. He, as told by an honored member of our congregation, Oscar S. Straus, declared it his duty to break down the wall between Gentiles and Jews."

Quotes President Roosevelt.

Then Dr. Schulman contrasted what he termed the un-American words of Dr. Aked with the speech delivered at Jamestown by President Roosevelt, who declared that in each of the last three years more people had landed in America than during the whole colonial period, and yet they were completely assimilated.

"Who can better answer Dr. Aked," he asked, "than Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States? When we are asked, 'Must an immigrant become a Christian to become an American?' we emphatically answer 'No.' But do not misunderstand me. I regard Christianity as a great moral force, as I regard Judaism as a great moral force."

In conclusion Dr. Schulman asserted that the great danger of America of today was that class feeling might triumph over justice. He pointed out that if Dr. Aked would see the work of the Educational Alliance, and see how the Jewish immigrants lived on bread and water that they might send their children to the City College, he would learn how well they were learning to become good American citizens.

DIED OF MERCURY POISONING.

How Schoolship Cadet Came to Take Drug Unknown.

A cadet on the schoolship St. Mary's, John S. Flood of Elmira, died of mercurial poisoning yesterday in the Hotel Marlborough. The boy took the drug a week ago in Paterson, whether intending to kill himself or not is not known. The commander of the schoolship thinks Flood took the poison accidentally. His father, Dr. Henry Flood, says he knows of no reason why his son should have wished to kill himself. He went to Paterson a week ago to visit friends. The day after his arrival he was found ill in the streets and taken to a hospital. There the doctors found he was suffering from mercurial poisoning. He recovered rapidly and his father brought him to this city. He suffered a relapse, however, and sank steadily to his death.

TALE OF A PINKERTON PLOT.

A So-Called Exposure Being Rushed West Before Haywood Trial.

Announcement was made yesterday of the publication to-day of a book purporting to be an exposure of the methods of the Pinkerton Detective Agency, which got up the evidence for the prosecution in the Moyer-Haywood-Pettibone case. An edition of the book has already been hustled to the West, where the trial is to take place early in May.

The book is published by the Wilshire Book Company, the head of which is Gaylord Wilshire, the Socialist editor. Its title is "The Pinkerton Labor Spy," and it purports to be written by Morris Friedman, who says he was for three years the stenographer of James McParland, head of the Colorado division of the agency, who was in charge of the efforts that resulted in the accumulation of the evidence against Moyer, Haywood and Pettibone, officials of the Western Federation of Miners, who are accused of conspiracy to bring about the murder of ex-Gov. Steunenberg of Idaho.

The book itself is really a campaign document in which the Pinkerton Agency is accused of getting its men into unions for the purpose of fomenting labor troubles to provide the agency with work and declares that the "inner circle" of the Western Federation of Miners is a fiction of McParland's brain based solely upon the operations of the Pinkerton Agency itself.

Robert A. Pinkerton said at his home, 71 Eighth Avenue, Brooklyn, yesterday, that no such man as Friedman had ever been employed as a stenographer in the Denver office of the Pinkerton Agency, or if such a man was employed it was in a minor capacity, and he would not have had access to any of the papers of the agency. The book, he added, was evidently written to influence public opinion in the West, and was a mass of false statements from beginning to end.

BUSY WEEK AHEAD IN SPORT.

New York Teams In Both Leagues Showing Promising Form.

The opening of the college track season on Saturday means that practically all branches of sport, both amateur and professional, are now well launched in their Spring season. In major league baseball New York has reason to feel well satisfied with the start of both its teams. The race in the National appears on early form to narrow down naturally to the "Giants" and Chicago, with Pittsburg and Philadelphia running ahead of the others for first division positions. Boston is hitting a good pace, but whether Tenney's men can stand the pace remains to be seen. The other three clubs do not appear to be any better than last year.

In the American League the race is more open. The "Yankees" have shown an encouraging strength and good possibilities of developing. Chicago, Cleveland, and Philadelphia appear to be the contenders who will give most trouble. Detroit's present pace is hardly likely to be maintained, and Boston is likely to show a bit better form.

This week the "Giants" are at home all week, with Boston for four days and Brooklyn for two. The "Yankees" have four games in Boston and two in Philadelphia.

In amateur circles there is widespread interest in the developments of this week. Among the colleges there will be no less than ten sets of dual track games decided next Saturday, all having a direct bearing on the championships, which are only one month away. Yale will also hold her Spring games on that day. The two most important dual meets are the Columbia-Penn games in this city and the Princeton-Cornell meet at Ithaca. In baseball Cornell plays Columbia here on Wednesday, while on the water Yale rows Annapolis on Saturday. Columbia's crew will continue preparations for the opening race with Harvard on Saturday week.

The A. A. U. amateur boxing championships will be held in Boston to-night. While there will be no big amateur track meets in this city there will be considerable athletic activity among the schoolboys. Indoor tennis will continue at St. Nicholas Rink, while abroad the work of young Jay Gould in the court tennis championship in London will be watched with the keenest interest. There is a general impression that there is no chance of the defeat of Gould, that he is the strongest court tennis player in the world, and could probably defeat Eustace Miles if he were to play.

Golfers begin at Atlantic City on Thursday the annual open tournament, which will attract the best of the devotees of the game. It will be the first of the series of big tournaments to be played from now on.

OLD PLYMOUTH RINGS FOR A FREE RUSSIA

Cheers in Beecher's Church Greet Aladin's Plea for Justice.

READY FOR WAR, HE SAYS

E. M. Shepard Declares This Country Is Set Against Russian Tyranny and Oppression.

Last night in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, was like an anti-slavery night in Plymouth Church before the rebellion, when a large congregation repeatedly applauded the fervid denunciation of Russian misrule from the pulpit. The regular evening service was given over to a presentation of the cause of Russian freedom, and was the second meeting conducted by the Friends of Russian Freedom in this city. Alexis Aladin, the Russian revolutionist, was the chief speaker, and Edward M. Shepard, President of the Friends of Russian Freedom, presided.

After the meeting Mr. Aladin was interviewed about the cabled report published in THE TIMES yesterday morning that Count Tolstoy had written a pamphlet, in which he had announced his conversion to the revolutionary cause, and had renounced his doctrine of passive resistance.

"It seems hard to believe that the pamphlet could have been correctly translated," said Mr. Aladin, "In view of the consistent and sane writing of this great old man, in which he has declared in the face of the greatest odds that passive resistance should be the way for the Russian people. I can only think, if your correspondent is right, that the situation has been shown to him to be so intolerable that he now realizes as he never did before that the revolution can only be accomplished by force.

Tolstoy a Valuable Recruit.

"He must have seen the great and terrible condition in Russia. But it seems to me to be incredible, as I said before, that Count Tolstoy has changed his mind. His conversion could not but benefit the cause."

Mr. Aladin devoted most of his talk to the history of the organization of the first and second Russian Duma. He said that the oft-repeated statement that there was great illiteracy among the peasants of Russia was untrue, and called attention to the fact that when the Government of the American people was framed not all of the framers knew how to read and write.

"We cannot be told that we cannot organize a representative Government, for we have done so, and have shown our ability," he said. "Do not think that I am a boasting man, but to show you what we have already done, I propose to compare the first Duma with the House of Commons. We were 440 men, with no experience, assembled together for the first time in the history of my country. How long does it take the British Parliament to answer a speech from the Crown under ordinary conditions? It even takes a month sometimes.

"We, not in the piping times of peace, but when men were arrayed against each other, took just five days, and we had to ask for many things. First, we asked for the liberation of men and women who, because they had asked and fought for representative government, had been imprisoned. We were in the Duma because they had dared imprisonment. During one year 30,000 men and women had been taken from their homes and sent to Siberia and the northern colonies of Russia without trial, but on an official statement. This we sought to end.

"We ask for a responsible Ministry. We also asked for aid for the starving peasants. We are prepared to lose 1,500,000 people from starvation during the next Duma, and we were entitled to believe it to be a national necessity that the people be aided. We made no demand we believed to be irreconcilable, but our Government saw we were too radical and we were sent home.

"Those who handled the funds for the relief of famine sufferers had swindled the people out of everything, and we told them that they were swindlers, and said to them, 'If you are going to have other funds at your disposal, let us see the accounts,' but our requests were all unheeded. And while these men were robbing the starving peasants, I know that in some districts the young girls of families were sold for from $20 to $30 a head that the other part of the family might be saved.

People Ready to Fight.

"But, thank God, we are still a great people, and if our conciliatory attitude to the present Government bears no fruit, and we are pushed to the wall, we shall fight. We pray that it shall never come, but, if it does, I hope that the people of this country shall stand with us then."

When Mr. Aladin finished his address, he was vigorously applauded. Mr. Shepard had said, in introducing him:

"The future of Christian civilization is in a larger part dependent on the Russian and American people of the future. What their ideals are to be are to be the ideals of the world. But we are restrained by a sense of wisdom from meddling and from the effort to exercise our physical power in righting the wrongs of other peoples. But be they Czars, Emperors, Kings, or parliaments, they are governed by the sentiment of the world. We cannot speak but the cause of peoples all over the world is affected.

"We wish no ill to Grand Dukes, or aristocrats, or military oligarchy, but the face of the American people must be set rigorously against tyranny, and especially the tyranny we hear of to-night. In the liberty of the individual is the broad base of civilization."

The Rev. Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, pastor of the church, closed the meeting with an impassioned appeal for sympathy for the Russians.

WORK OF TINY HANDS PUT ON EXHIBITION

Collections from Kindergartens in This and Foreign Lands at American Museum.

CHILD NATURE ON VIEW

The childhood of large sections of this country and of some foreign countries as well has both its trained and untrained intelligence represented in the exhibit of kindergarten work that is now being put in place on the basement floor of the American Museum of Natural History for the convention of the International Kindergarten Union, which begins its sessions Tuesday at Teachers' College. At other annual meetings or conventions there have been exhibits, but this is the first time that foreign countries have been so well represented. There is also a valuable historical collection of the works of Froebel, the father of the kindergarten, as well as some of the original material used hy him.

The first impression made upon an observer upon viewing the mounted collections is expressed in the exclamation:

"What a paradise for children!"

For here is the world in the little. There are little houses complete in detail and furnishing, little chairs, little tables, little animals, little people, little carts, and little fire engines.

The modern kindergarten has a theory that the child should be taught first to observe his own environment and to express that observation in pictures or other mediums of expression. Then he should be taught to select and classify the impressions that come to him in accord with the dictates of some philosophy or set of principles. Thus, they say, the child will select the best in all that he sees about him, and will, when he arrives at the age of creative effort, show the results.

That part of the exhibition space that has to do with the children of New York City shows an instant appreciation on the part of the children of their surroundings. There are lamp posts with the surroundings of the tenement house districts suggested in the background, city houses, and the washing hanging on the roof. Lighted windows and lighthouses suggest that the children have been down the bay, while a boy flying a kite is mute evidence that some of them have gone on fresh air excursions to the country. When it is remembered that children are received in the kindergartens only between the ages of 3 and 6 it is seen that some of their performances are quite remarkable.

The New York City Exhibit.

In the New York City collection there is a note, too, of the commercial spirit of the city, of the will to utilize the existing for some practical purpose. Some of the boys have used match boxes to build what to some minds would be toys, but to the kindergarten experts are objects which have their place in the development of the youthful mind, and in the educational desire to utilize the playing instinct of children.

Then, too, the boxes of biscuit makers appear as carts, beds, cars, and even small houses. Cardboard has been used by the children of a mission church kindergarten as material out of which to build an entire miniature Brooklyn Bridge, with trolley cars and people grinning with the same smile that the slate picture of "teacher" wears.

A fair geographical idea of the nature of various sections of the country may be gained by a study of the exhibits, for in many is presented the objects which the children see every day. In the St. Louis exhibit there is still a suggestion of the city, but less urban than that of the local collection.

The children of New Haven reflect their nearness to the Sound, which must be an important factor in their lives, by pictures showing stretches of blue water. In Pittsburg apparently there is still smoke and dirt, for the skies of some of the childish drawings suggest that these things are not unknown to the small artists. About the work of some of the Philadelphia children there is a touch and a finish that well befit a community of its age and reputed tastes. Washington is quite cosmopolitan with Quakers and Teddy Bears in about equal proportions. The children of Charleston, S. C., have used the cotton in the fields in raw and refined states, while from Boston there are pictures of the Common, of battleships, and of cars that are typical of some of the New England railroads.

The Philippine exhibit expresses the state of the people. The forms of the articles sent are those taught by the American teachers, but the substances used are native bamboos and fibres. One exhibit that will attract attention when the collections are thrown open to the public next Wednesday is the work of Japanese children in Vancouver, British Columbia and by children who could not speak English. The subjects of a group of pictures resemble in a general way those of our east side children, but they are distinctly different in treatment. What the youthful artist might dub, "A Wash on a Line" is unmistakably a wash on a line, but it is not the wash of the average New York family. For on the line are Hikama and kimono. "A Boy Flying a Kite" looks like a boy allowing a strange beast to mount into the air at the end of a string.

Drawings which in many instances convey the real but rude humor of childhood are not by any means the sole materials in which the youthful pupils work. All sorts of bits of colored and plain woods, cut in various regular fashions, are utilized. After having mastered a few lessons in the elements of symmetry, the pupil begins to experiment for himself, devising various decorative figures that are really elementary designs. The same principles are worked out by means of needles and yarns. It is in the arrangement of these objects that the plan of Mrs. M. B. Langzettel, Chairman of the committee having the exhibition in charge, is best shown. In every case the starting figure or simple design is found in some natural object. Then follows in regular order the steps or gradations through which the more elaborate designs are reached. The same is true of the work with blocks. The various "gifts" of Froebel are first seen, then their natural development.

The Work of the Teachers.

But of quite as great interest to the kindergartners attending the convention as the work of the children will be the work of the teachers. For nearly every exhibit from a place where there is also a training school for teachers has space for the teacher's work. In some cases it is merely the work of students who are learning to become teachers in kindergartens, in others it is more advanced. The latter shows a great degree of attention to art work. Some of the teachers in little water colors and crayons show that their art has been strongly affected by the Japanese.

Clay has been utilized in some of the collections by the children, not only for small objects, but to make what would appear a decorative frieze. Upon the damp clay there has been made at irregular intervals the impression of some natural object, such as a sea shell. Then, too, there have been thus preserved the impressions of many kinds of leaves. An entire little circus, with animals of clay, is in one exhibit. In another there is shown in clay what seems to be an entire family, from the rather slab-sided father to the smallest baby out for a walk. Next to them is the drawing of a hearse.

Relics of the observance of the various holidays in the kindergarten appear in the exhibits. In one is a part of what was the Washington's Birthday display. Large American flags, made of paper, and small white tents, with tiny flags flying from their poles, are prominent. St. Valentine's Day is represented by any manner of tiny child-made valentines.

A Child Apostle of Whistler.

In the Buffalo collection there is what might be called a picture a la Whistler, on "The Joys of Painting Your Own Garden in the Spring," the creator of which work in crayon is a small boy. In it appears a man about whose whole figure there is motion and love of the soil. He is standing by a wheelbarrow, while he drives full deep his spade into the ground. Above him are trees—the artist didn't appear to note that shade is had for a garden—in which various gaily colored birds are singing. And as you turn away you feel that that man will succeed even in making things grow in the shade, for he can't fail. All of which is to the credit of the small artist.

Mrs. Langzettel says that children are not to be barred from visiting the exhibit in company with their parents. If any considerable number of them come there is one object that will have to be guarded carefully from possible injury, though happily it is too large to be carried away. This is from Washington, and is of cardboard. It is a complete house of the Washington White House style. In its rooms, through the windows, can be seen the appropriate furnishings of each room. In the library are pictures and books and a quiet corner piled high with sofa cushions, while in the kitchen are the proper utensils for cooking. Many a child's heart will ache when it sees this treasure, the work of Washington teachers.

The exhibition will be formally opened on Wednesday, and will remain in its present quarters three weeks.

LOWENSTEIN WILL CONTEST.

Petitioners Allege that the Testator Was of Unsound Mind.

Special to The New York Times.

MEMPHIS, April 28.—A contest of the will of Bernard Lowenstein, who died in New York last year, was begun in the Probate Court. The petitioners are Harman Lowenstein and Hortense and Ruth Michel, blood relatives of the deceased, and residents of this county.

Bernard Lowenstein died in the latter part of 1906, leaving an estate approximating, it is said, $1,500,000. On Dec. 24 last, a writing purporting to be his last will was admitted to probate at the instance of Louis Marshall, Isaac Untermyer, and Leon Lowenstein, all of New York City, who were named as executors. It is this instrument which is attacked. The petitioners allege that they are informed that Mr. Lowenstein was of unsound mind at the time the paper was executed.

"It is asserted by the petitioners that the deceased was unduly influenced by Leopold Gottschall, Leon Lowenstein, and Jack Born, who are the principal legatees under the will.

Mr. Lowenstein was the senior member of the firm of B. Lowenstein & Brother here. He had been knighted by King Oscar of Sweden.

SHOT FATHER WHILE DRUNK.

Yonkers Man Then Ran Against Detectives, and Was Wounded Mortally.

Special to The New York Times.

YONKERS, April 28.—Crazed by liquor, Patrick McAvoy, after shooting at several persons last night, finally succeeded in hitting his father, and was himself shot in the abdomen before he could be subdued.

McAvoy by 10 o'clock was fighting drunk. Armed with a big revolver he started out. He first went to Vineyard Avenue, where he fired at several persons. Then he went to the stable of James Derivan, by whom he was formerly employed, and fired four shots at Henry Opperman, the stableman. One shot grazed Opperman's head. McAvoy got away, and returned to his home at 47 Palisade Avenue about 1:30, and answered his father's salutation with a shot from the revolver. The elder McAvoy was hit in the shoulder. The bullet first passed through the night gown of McAvoy's infant sister, who was in the father's arms.

By this time a big force of police was searching for McAvoy, and as McAvoy ran out of the back door Detectives Cougle and Mance were coming in that way. As soon as he saw the detectives, McAvoy lifted his revolver, but before he could shoot the detectives fired at once, both bullets hitting him in the abdomen. He is in St. Joseph's Hospital, and will probably die.

AMERICAN PLANT IN CANADA.

The Chain Trust to Build a Branch Factory at Walkersville, Ont.

Another American trust is about to enter the Canadian manufacturing field so as to escape the Dominion tariff, the Standard Chain Company, known as the Chain Trust, having decided to build an extensive plant at Walkersville, Ont.

The Standard Chain Company, of Canada, Limited, will operate the new works, which are to be constructed at a cost of about $200,000. A full line of coil chain, as well as harness chain, will be manufactured. The Walkersville plant is expected to be in operation this Summer.

UNCONSCIOUS FROM GAS.

Col. Lord Supposed to Have Turned It on Accidentally.

Col. Joseph E. Lord, a lawyer, was found unconscious yesterday in his room at the St. Albans, a boarding house at 11 East Thirty-first Street. The gas was turned on. One of the windows was open. The Colonel is supposed to have turned out the gas just before retiring Saturday night and accidentally struck the stopcock as he withdrew his hand. He is now in Bellevue Hospital and will probably recover.

Col. Lord, who is 60 years old, recently returned from a trip abroad. He is a member of the Society of Colonial Wars, the Sons of the Revolution, New York Historical Society, Lawyers' Club and Church Club of New York. After arriving at the hospital yesterday he asked that the Rev. Karl Reiland, assistant rector of Grace Church, be sent for. Mr. Reiland went as requested, but says he did not recognize the Colonel.

Rev. E. E. Ferris Called to East Orange

It was announced yesterday that the Rev. Elmer E. Ferris, late pastor of the Tabernacle Baptist Church, Milwaukee, has been called to the pastorate of the Hawthorne Avenue Baptist Church, East Orange. If he accepts he will succeed the Rev. Donald Duncan Munro, who accepted a call to New Haven, Conn., last Fall. Mr. Ferris is 40 years old. He entered the ministry nine years ago, and before that he was a lawyer in Lincoln, Neb. His office adjoined that of William Jennings Bryan.

INDIANS IN WAR TOGS TAKE IN THE SIGHTS

Braves from Buffalo Bill's Band Visit Grant's Tomb and Inspect the Zoo.

THE HIPPOPOTAMI OBLIGED

With a Yawn and the Indians Were Impressed—White and Red Babies Ogle Each Other.

A hundred Indians of Buffalo Bill's band in war paint and feathers with a dozen squaws carrying their papooses suspended in brilliant Navajo blankets sat out from Madison Square Garden in three sight-seeing automobiles early yesterday afternoon for a ride along Riverside Drive to Grant's Tomb, and back through Central Park to the Zoo.

On the front seat of the first wagon was Billy McCune, who has guided the band through the streets of London and nearly every American city. Beside him were Jake Killer, the interpreter, and Chief Iron Tail, who repeated to his followers the directions of the guide. In the third wagon were three cowgirls in sombreros, short skirts and leggins, and several Cossack riders, with their bandoliers shining with cartridges.

Indians at Grant's Tomb.

The first halt was before Grant's Tomb. Most of the warriors seemed to know whose mausoleum they were visiting, and Jake explained it to the others. They entered and stood in a silent group, with their high head feathers bowed over the grave of the Great White Chief.

From the tomb they spun back along the drive, crossed Central Park, and then down Fifth Avenue to the Zoo entrance. Head Keeper Snyder was ready for the band. He led them in single file through the big cage houses. The coyotes, foxes, and prairie wolves were passed in silence, save for Jake's comment.

"Seen them heap West."

They looked longingly at the buffaloes of the plains, but pressed on to see the stranger sights of the lion house. There the animals seemed as much interested in the visitors as the visitors were in them. Dewey, the big lion nearest the entrance, sat back on his haunches at the approach of the first feathered headdress and gazed intently at the passing line. Leo, in the next cage, did the same. But the two young lion cubs were much alarmed. They backed away from the bars, snarling and lashing their tails nervously. The three little leopard kittens, born on St. Valentine's eve, jumped up against the bars, reaching out their paws for the waving feathers, like house kittens for a string.

Interested in the Hippopotami.

The hippopotami excited the Indians most. Miss Murphy snorted once and settled under the water, but big Caliph, the bull, stood up and opened his jaws in a tremendous yawn. A chorus of grunts showed the satisfaction of the Indians as they nudged each other and stretched out their arms to show how wide the yawn was.

At the cage of the grizzly bear the Indians stopped to see their old foe of the Rocky Mountains. Snyder entered the cage and drove the bear from his cave in the rear. As the enormous beast lumbered out and clambered up the face of the cliff the Indians gave their first sign of approval.

"Huh!" they cried; "Huh!"

In the monkey house were two white women holding their babies up to get a view when the Indians came by. Then the squaws came holding their papooses. As soon as babies and papooses saw each other they began leaning forward and laughing.

"Papoose, papoose," lisped a small Indian, attracting his mother's attention to the tiny paleface opposite. And "baby, baby" cooed the young American. The mothers, red and white, smiled.

The Indians then returned to the wagons. An army of small boys following the band supplied all war whoops until the Indians were seated in the wagons. But then, at a signal from Chief Iron Tail, the braves put their hands to their mouths and raised their quavering cry. The wagons then started down the avenue. Before the arrival of the Indians the Park and Zoo had been quiet places, as the cold weather kept many indoors. The benches along the walks were almost entirely deserted. Only here and there was an old man, carefully wrapped up, puffing at his pipe.

POLICEMAN SAVES FIVE LIVES.

Carries Helpless Out of Blazing House and Is Badly Burned Himself.

Policeman John Grogan of the East 104th Street Station rescued five persons from death by fire in a blaze in a five-story double tenement house at 343 East 105th tSreet, last night, before the firemen arrived.

Grogan first saved Salvatore Devasto, 50, a sick man, who was in bed, unable to move, on the second floor. The man's nephew, August Mirebella, 14, was also carried out. Mrs. Rose Poirose, with her two children, a son of 3 years, and a daughter, 18 months, were asleep when the fire was discovered. Grogan heard her scream and was obliged to break in the door to get into the apartment.

When water was turned on Grogan carried the woman and her two children through the blazing hallway, while the firemen poured water on the group. The fire did $1,000 damage.

Police Surgeon Donovan attended Grogan, who lost his hair, eyebrows, and eyelashes, and was badly burned about the head and body. He was sent home.

ALL UP TO THE DOG.

Justice Lynn Will Let Him Decide Question of His Ownership.

It is up to Justice Wauhope Lynn of the Fourth Municipal District Court this morning to decide to which of two families belongs a bulldog. He is to make his decision primarily in accordance with which family the dog follows most readily. What will happen if he doesn't follow either family is not now clear.

John Loide, proprietor of a German restaurant at 162 East Third Street, now has the dog. Leopold Resch, a tailor of 13 East Third Street, is suing for the possession of the dog on the ground that it is his, as will be amply proved in court when his daughter "Josephine shall call him by the name of Jakie, and he will follow her by the whole block."

Loide maintains that the bulldog will follow him when he shall the courtroom in say the name of Teddy. The east side is interested to witness this contest for a dog reputed to be worth $50.

Assemblyman Barber May Get Good Job.

TRENTON, April 28.—It became known to-day that the Secretary of the Railroad Commission will likely be Assemblyman Alfred N. Barber of Mercer, minority leader of the Assembly. Mr. Barber has been a power in the House for three years. He is a regular Republican, but with independent leanings, and is respected by the Democrats as well as the Colby forces. The job will pay $3,500 a year.

Elevator Man Crushed to Death.

John Stafford, an elevator man in the new Seligman Building, 1 William Street, was killed there yesterday. He was alone on the elevator when at the sixth floor his body was caught between the elevator car and flooring. The car shot up to the top floor and Stafford's body fell to the bottom of the shaft.

PEARY NEEDS MORE MONEY.

The Arctic Club Issues an Appeal for Public Subscriptions.

Lack of money—about $60,000—to finance the expedition, may mean the abandonment of the dash to the north pole which Commander Robert E. Peary has planned for this Summer.

Peary wants to start from New York toward the end of June. His ship, the Roosevelt, which did good service on the last expedition, is now being prepared for the next attack on the northern ice fields. But the greater part of the $40,000 already subscribed will be spent in repairing the ship, and $60,000 more will be needed for general expenses. The Peary Arctic Club, of which Morris K. Jesup is President, is caring largely for the refitting of the Roosevelt, and it has issued an appeal for contributions from the people of the United States so that a total of $100,000 may be raised. Subscriptions may be sent to Treasurer Henry Parish, New York Life and Trust Company, 52 Wall Street.

The appropriateness and feasibility of permitting the public school children of the country to take part in the movement is said to have appealed to Commander Peary.

"I am not complaining," he said, "but if I was certain about the material aspect of the expedition a great burden would be lifted. Did you ever think what the detail of preparation for the invasion of the north means? 'Infinite detail' are the words which describe it. If anything is left undone, or anything forgotten, after we have actually got away, then it is too late."

Peary said that if conditions are favorable the objects of the expedition might be accomplished in one season. But he might remain north as long as three years. He was preparing, he said, for a long and hard battle.

DEER TREES A LITTLE GIRL.

Another One Robs a Clothes Line in a Connecticut Town.

Special to The New York Times.

WATERBURY, Conn., April 28.—Mary Rossiter, the six-year-old daughter of Charles T. Rossiter of Winthrop, on Saturday did not return home by sundown, and her parents became alarmed. Mr. Rossiter started out to look for her on a path across the fields. When half way down this path he heard his daughter shouting. He located her up in a cedar tree, weeping.

The girl said that as she was coming down the path a big deer, evidently a buck, had come out of the underbrush and started threateningly toward her. She hastily clambered into the tree, and the deer remained under her place of refuge until he heard her father's voice.

The clothesline of Andrew Hodges of Cheshire, near Prospect, was robbed by a big buck Friday. Frightened by dogs, it was clearing walls and fences when it struck the line. The overalls of the farm tender, Abrahsm Michael, and a woolen blanket were taken away on the buck's horns.

EAGLE ROOSTS ON STEAMSHIP

It was not the fault of those on the Anchor liner Columbia, which got in yesterday from Glasgow, that they did not bring with them a bald-headed eagle. About noon on Saturday, when the Columbia was in the vicinity of Cape Race, and about 200 miles off shore, the eagle flew aboard and perched on the fore truck. The bird was almost exhausted, and had been driven out to sea by the westerly gale.

The passengers all became interested in the new arrival, and efforts were made to coax the bird down on deck, but he disdained all attentions, and after trying his wings by flying from one mast to the other, just at nightfall he flew off, heading toward shore.

Other incidents recorded on the trip were the sighting of a large iceberg and the passing of the lighted gas buoy which has been drifting about for some days in the path of incoming vessels.

MISS LIBERTY NEEDS CASH FOR REPAIRS

She Looks Content, but Uncle Sam Has Been a Trifle Mean to Her.

HER GARDEN WANTS FIXING

They Needn't Mind So Much About Lights on the Stairs, but the Money Will Be Useful.

May be Uncle Sam has not loved Miss Liberty of Bedloe's Island as much as his protestations have justly led the superficial to think. Otherwise he would not have waited so long to say that he was going to see that those little external necessities of neatness and grace which belong to women were in part given to her. But now he is really going to spend money on her.

Of course she isn't to get much. Hers has been a stingy portion since she came here, gift of the French, the lovers of things beautiful. But she is to get a little something, so that the rents in her garments and the worn, shiny places in her dress may be patched and covered up.

The dispatches from Washington say that $62,800 is to be spent on her. She needs it all—and more, though in the distance to the ships coming up the bay she hardly shows that she knows that she is not spick and span as when the French gave her to the United States. And she never looks down at herself. She seems still just as enthusiastic about welcoming to "these golden doors," "the tired, the poor, the huddled masses" from other lands as the poem in a corridor of the big pedestal on which she stands puts it.

Just now, however, Miss Liberty and her island home are particularly disreputable. The depressed yard in which her pedestal stands seems to be used as a sort of dumping ground for the rest of the island, on which are several Government buildings. Scattered about in it are old scraps of crockery ware, sections of rusty pipes, a pile of broken slate tiles that came from some house, pieces of old bricks, and a pile of greasy oil boxes.

The yard otherwise is unkempt and foul. Once a few huge red slabs of sandstone might have served as a pavement. Some of them are now broken, some are torn up, and others are sunk into the ground below the level. Ash piles are here and there. The sickly grass is in spots only, resembling patches of dog mange more than healthy growths.

The yard walls are motley crazy-quilt works of red brick and white stone. The brick has been worn in here and there, and at one or two places cross walls have been cut down, the stub ends being still rough and irregular projections.

At the foot of the pedestal a gasoline engine wheezes and emits odor not perfume. Around Miss Liberty are lying a lot of old cannon which have been torn from their carriages, though of course that particular condition is only temporary. The wooden bridge that leads up to the feet of the statue is of frail scantlings carelessly knocked together. The standard posts of this remarkable structure rest uneasily on dirty pieces of soft sandstone.

Somebody gave the clothing of Miss Liberty a green dye some time ago. Now her dress looks as if it was but a cheap affair at first and has recently come from a steam laundry which "does not guarantee the fastness of colors." The green is on her in splotches. Her dress at other places is shiny and black. In it are little rents, which, praise be, show only when one is close up.

The little iron stairs that lead up to the face of the statue on the inside are poorly lighted. Lanterns are placed here and there, but some of them are usually as unlit as the torch that Miss Liberty has held aloft since she came here. But, of course, that is not altogether disliked by the bay from over Miss Liberty's shoulder.

For it must be confessed that most of those who go now to see Miss Liberty are people born in other countries—principally French and Italian, and most of them are poor. Bedloe's Island and a tour of Miss Liberty has served as a honeymoon trip for many a young couple from the lowest end of Manhattan. The French go because Felix Bartholdi, a Frenchman, made Miss Liberty, and the French Republic gave her to Uncle Sam. The Italians go because they live so near.

In one of the little rest seats that are bolted to the side of the inner stairs yesterday afternoon sat a young couple. The seat was naturally where the lantern was unlit.

"You do not love me now, Jean," she said in a low voice, but not too low for the hearing of the fellow who sat in the next dark rest seat.

"I do, Natalie; you know I do. Why do you say that?"

"I haven't had a new dress since we married six months ago."

"To-morrow you shall pick out what you like, eh? No matter what the cost, eh? Anything! Now—"

But he was a young Frenchman.

Though it was intended that Miss Liberty should take her stand in the bay and hold up her torch in time to celebrate the one hundredth anniversary of American independence, it was ten years later before she got a footing in this country. And then voluntary contributions were collected—some say they had to be collected—to provide for her pedestal.

But now $62,800 has been set aside to complete the statue in accordance with the plans of Bartholdi—twenty years after the receipt of the gift. Part of the money will be spent in repairing the dress and environment of the Hostess Lady of the Bay. An elevator will be installed so that visitors may ride up to see her face. And for the first time the great torch in her hand will really blaze at night; eight arc lights are to be put in it.

Thus, after twenty years, the "golden doors," grandiloquently spoken of in the poem, at her feet, will open a bit wider for the crying needs—not luxuries—of Miss Liberty.

Columbia

MOTORING INFORMATION

THIS week our New York branch has one 1907 40-45 horse power Columbia which it can offer for immediate delivery at $4,500. You may not get another chance to secure a Mark XLIX this season for immediate delivery.

ASK our salesmen about the new Columbia multiple-jet carburetor. Through this very clever device, the big car is propelled at the rate of thirty miles an hour on no more gasolene than it takes for a tiny two-passenger runabout. When you come to the hills the same carburetor sends you past every machine you meet.

THERE are two carburetors for two purposes. The little one is to save fuel and enable you to run your engine slowly in the city, and the big one is for speeding and hill climbing. But it is impossible to explain all the features of our Mark XLIX here. You must see it for yourself at our New York branch, No. 134 West Thirty-ninth Street.

DESPITE the increased demand for our light Electric Victoria-Phaeton, which sells for $1,600, our New York house will be able to offer a few more this week for immediate delivery. When these are gone we cannot promise immediate delivery, because the season is now at its height and our agents and branch houses in all parts of the country are calling for "rush shipments."

JUST a few second-hand cars, which we have recently taken in exchange, are offered by the New York branch. There is a Columbia Electric Runabout for $450. Fresh from the painting department and is as good as new. There is also a 24-28 gasolene touring car for $2,200. This is also like new.

Other bargains are a 40-45 horse power gasolene touring car for $1,500 and a 45-horse power gasolene touring car for $2,500.

IF YOU want a 24-28 horse power car which will seat five persons comfortably don't fail to see the Columbia Mark LXVIII. This is another one of our cars which is selling itself. It was one of the hits of the Madison Square Garden show last January and it created such a sensation when we began demonstrating with it the result is our output is already nearly exhausted and in a very short time you will not be able to get one, even at a premium.

OUR 45 h. p. gasolene touring car with direct electric transmission is still attracting a great deal of interest among our most exclusive patrons. In this machine you get in reality a gasolene car which is controlled as easily as a little electric runabout. There is no noisy sliding-gear transmission. It is a charming car for city use, when fitted with a limousine body. Fitted with a touring body it is a fine car for long trips, and so simple that a child can drive it without a lesson.

WE have also for immediate delivery a Columbia Electric Landaulet, done in dark blue, for $4,000.

OUR New York branch, No. 134 West 39th Street, near Broadway, will be pleased to give demonstrations of any of our cars, either new or used. The telephone number is 4090—38th Street.

Detroit Nearly Shut Out.

CHICAGO, April 28.—Chicago won an exciting game from Detroit at American League Park here to-day. The visitors were saved a shut-out when Umpire O'Loughlin called Coughlin safe at home, although the latter run out of line to dodge Walsh, who was covering the plate after a short passed ball. Owen retired after the first two batsmen hit safely in the eighth. Score:

CENTURY ROAD CLUB RUN.

One Hundred and Twenty-five Cyclists in Spring "Century."

The annual Spring century run of the Eastern Division of the Century Road Club Association was held yesterday over the Merrick Road on Long Island.

Starting from Bedford Rest, the riders rode to Bellmore and return. Over 125 riders faced the starter, and they practically all finished. The riders were sent away in three divisions, two slow and one fast. The first division left at 6:30, with fifty riders, in charge of D. M. Adee, President of the National Cycling Association, as chief pacemaker, with J. W. Johnston and H. Heldman as assistants. The second division left at 7:30 A. M., with forty riders, with H. T. Mayo, Frederick Larsen, and C. B. Bush. The fast division was the last to get away, and it left at 8:30, with Frank and Joseph Epler and Frederick C. Graf, Jr., as pacemakers. H. G. and R. R. Starkweather both rode motor cycles, and were the first to finish. The fast division arrived about ten minutes later, and the rest all came in before 7 o'clock. The roads were in fair condition, although many punctured tires were reported. Herman Hinck, a boy of 16, had several punctures, but finished with the fast division.

Both Cameron Teams Won.

In an exciting contest the Cameron first team defeated the Astoria Independents at Astoria, L. I., yesterday by 3 goals to 0. Neither side was able to score in the first half, but in the second, with the wind in their favor, the Camerons tallied three times.

Many Candidates for N. Y. U. Crew.

A promising lot of candidates has come forward to take seats in the junior eight-oared shell, which is to represent the New York University in the Memorial Day regatta on the Speedway course. Among those who are trying for seats in the boat are Wilson, Ackerman, Flynn, Auffant, Hoult, Decker, Von Janishy, Hicks, Anderson, Reynolds, Bleven, and Daggett. There is a deal of enthusiasm among the students over the rowing game, and altogether there are about thirty candidates trying for aquatic honors. The candidates are training from the Union Boat Clubhouse. E. S. Connell former President of the Harlem Regatta Association, is coaching the candidates and H. A. Anderson is assisting him.

RUNAWAY UPSETS SPEEDWAY RACING

IDA HIGHWOOD IN FORM

Nathan Straus's Speedy Trotter Carries Off Speeding Honors—Horsemen Preparing for Parade.

The first runaway of the seasnn on the Speedway occurred yesterday, when Lemon Girl, driven by Philip Heipenhausen, bolted and threw the drivers on the Speedway into commotion for a short time. The runaway happened during the height of the usual Sunday morning brushing and for a time threatened serious consequences. It was only due to the promptness of Mounted Policeman Frank G. Lewis that an accident was averted. About four thousand spectators lined both sides of the Speedway drive watching the brushes, when Lemon Girl suddenly swerved midway in the half-mile stretch. Before Mr. Heipenhausen could gather the reins and get his horse under control, the latter was racing down the drive at headlong speed. Policeman Lewis, at once began a pursuit, which lasted a quarter of a mile. The struggle between the runaway horse and the mounted policeman was a short, sharp one, but the latter finally brought the horse under control opposite the finishing post of the brushes. As the horse struggled to get her head free, she swerved all over the track, scattering the spectators and suspending the sport.

Despite the chilly weather there was a good attendance of the light-harness horsemen. With the annual parade and Horse Show of the Road Drivers' Association next Saturday, the horsemen are anxious to have their entries in the best possible shape, and as a result much fast work was shown. Ida Highwood, 2:09¼, driven by Nathan Straus, was very much in evidence, but Mr. Straus was unable to find many horsemen willing to race the Queen of the Speedway. After winning a couple of impromptu heats, Mr. Straus engaged in a lively three-cornered bout with Surprise, driven by M. Javoriski, and Dick M., with J. J. Mooney in the wagon. Ida Highwood found no difficulty in finishing two lengths ahead of the other two horses. As there was no other driver willing to tackle the fast mare, Mr. Straus sent her to the stable and drove his old favorite, Ted, 2:15¾, in several warming-up brushes.

E. J. La Place was behind his recent purchase, Frank Wilson, 2:08¼, which made a splendid showing. Ragland had a busy morning. In a three-cornered brush with Ambler, 2:14¼, and Mezzerone, driven respectively by A. T. Mickel and Thomas McGuire, Ragland came home first. Dr. Joseph Semon, driving Poco Estrella, threw down the gauntlet to Ragland, but the latter had all his speed, and won by a short length.

Thomas B. Leahy was kept busy with his new black mare, Who Knows, 2:11¾. His old favorite, Princess Pique, was driven by a friend, but was no match for her stable companion.

One of the best brushes of the morning brought together Bessie Pandit, driven by George H. Huber; Norrie, with Andrew Phillips driving, and First Demand, handled by Dr. H. D. Gill. Mr. Huber's speedy little pacer finished far ahead of the other two. Norrie dropped out of the second heat, which also went to Bessie Pandit.

W. H. Clark showed a nice burst of speed with Banker, first defeating Norrie and then taking the measure of Bessie G., driven by Joseph F. Gibbons. Among those who exercised their horses on the Speedway were: Charles S. Rice, with Lady Golden, 2:10¾; Andrew Cmc, driving his new pacer John Wegman, who made an excellent appearance with his team, David Muscovite and Tar Tartar; James H. Campbell driving Susie G., 2:14½; President Andrew Crawford behind Invader, and many others.

SCHOOLBOYS ON THE RIVER.

Eight-Oared Crews for Memorial Day Regatta Doing Good Work.

Only four crews remain in the eight-oared schoolboy race at the Harlem River Memorial Day Regatta. The withdrawal of the crew from the schoolship St. Mary is due to the fact that the ship is due to start on a long trip and the members of the crew will be compelled to sail. There is general regret owing to this withdrawal, but the race is not likely to lose any of its interest, as the Stuyvesant crew will be substituted. There had been some objection to the St. Mary crew, owing to its not being technically a High School crew, but with the Stuyvesant School eight substituted the objection is removed.

Capt. J. J. F. Mulcahy of the Atalanta Boat Club has consented to coach the new schoolboy candidates. He says with a month before him he will turn out a good fast crew. Capt. Mulcahy has instructed the boys on the machine and will boat them in one of the old Atalanta barges about Wednesday next.

The work with the other crews is progressing satisfactorily. Capt. J. E. Nagle of the Harlem Rowing Club, is working hard with the boys from De Witt Clinton and High School of Commerce, and the daily practice is showing itself in the improvement in the work of the boys on the water. The Morris High School boys at Travers' Island are taking kindly to the instruction of Coach E. J. Gianinni of the New York Athletic Club, while H. W. Peckwell is coaching a promising crew from the Townsend-Harris School at the Lone Star Boat Club.

Harlem River Rowing Notes.

Local oarsmen have settled down to real training and the Harlem River yesterday represented a busy scene. Nearly all the clubs had out one or more crews despite the chilly weather, and the practice was in every way satisfactory to the coaches. The cold wind prevented any lagging while the crews were on the water, and the men did not remain out long. Capt. John E. Nagle of the Harlem Rowing Club was out twice with his octuple sculls crew, which will be entered in the Memorial Day Regatta of the Harlem Regatta Association. In addition, a junior four, two doubles, and three singles started training.

Coach William Cody had a lively day with his junior eight and junior four, which has coaching from the Crescent Boat Club. He expects to have two of the best crews on the river.

Capt. J. J. F. Mulcahy of the Atalanta Boat Club is making good progress with his junior eight, which is one of the most promising crews on the river. The illness of two of the members of the crew somewhat retarded its work, but all the men are now back in the boat. William Doscher, a veteran member of the Atalantas, has built a special launch for coaching purposes and will have it completely fitted out within two weeks. In the afternoon Mulcahy and his rowing partner, Varley, spent half an hour on the river. They will row double again this year, and expect to compete in all the leading regattas.

Callaghan and Hyer were out from the Metropolitan Clubhouse training for the senior double event. A junior double crew was also out, and there was an intermediate four-oar crew made up of Harbenstein, bow; Rickert, Hartell, and Walsh. Putnam, who is rowing for the double, was out in a single shell.

Considerable interest is evinced in the junior eight-oared shell race, which will be one of the features of the Harlem Regatta Association regatta. It is expected that at least six crews will take part in the event. The certain entries in the event are First Bohemian Boat Club, New York University, Atalanta Boat Club, and Nonpareil Rowing Club. Much friendly rivalry already exists between the different clubs and the work of each crew will be watched with interest.

A meeting of the Regatta Committee of the Harlem Regatta Association will be held to-night at the Harlem Casino, when several important matters relating to the Memorial Day Regatta will be discussed.

The Metropolitan colors were carried in several singles, doubles, and fours. The Nassau Boat Club senior eight showed excellent form in the morning, and a four and a double left the club float in the afternoon. Coach Roach of the Bohemians took his junior eight out in a barge and afterward coached the intermediate four. The Union Boat Club sent out four crews, and the eight youngsters in the Nonpareil Rowing Club junior shell give promise of showing fast time in the Memorial Day Regatta.

All arrangements have been made for the annual regatta of the Long Island Rowing Association

"WATERED" FARMS AND RAILWAYS.

The Pittsburg Dispatch, much to our surprise, doubts that the railways run through vast areas of farm lands whose unearned increment gives their owners profits greater than any railway ever enjoyed. Competition, says The Dispatch, keeps down the price of farms and their products, and the railways are able to combine and defeat competition as the farmers cannot.

Senator ELKINS is good authority regarding the railways. In his report upon the Rate bill enacted last year he put into exact figures the extent to which the railways by combination had checked their powers to prey upon the public. He found that the cost of transportation in 1904 was $2,000,000,000 less than it would have been at the rates of 1870. The shocking extent to which the railways' capital is watered is shown sufficiently by the fact that their share value is 4.74 per cent. less than the commercial value, as estimated by the Census Bureau. It is because the railways have been such flagrant offenders in the past that reform is so easy for them in these later years. Since 1900, in the words of the official report, "the relatively insignificant increase of 5.31 per cent. in capitalization shows a decided tendency toward more careful methods of financing these properties."

There is an embarrassment of riches of proof regarding the amazing increase of value of farm lands without any additional expenditures by their owners. Secretary SHAW happens to have touched upon the topic the other day, and, as his words may not have reached Pittsburg, a paragraph will interest The Dispatch and anybody else in error regarding the relative criminality of the farmers and the railways:

> Indiana, Illinois, and most of Iowa were sold at $1.25 per acre. These three States stripped of all their improvements would now sell at auction at $100 per acre. Somebody has realized more than interest upon his improvements. Meantime others have built railroads across these States. The first three attempts to cross the State of Iowa resulted in absolute loss to the investor, notwithstanding a liberal subsidy of lands. I own a little land in my State which cost me approximately $10 per acre, the rent of which has paid an average of 20 per cent. dividends for fifty years, and the land to-day is worth $100 per acre. I venture that no man ever put his money into a railroad in Iowa and realized as large profits as I have from my lands.

It would be a pleasure to quote more largely, but space only suffices to say in brief that Secretary SHAW's argument was addressed to the point that when railways make such values for others they should be allowed to secure a reasonable profit in their own business. Our pleasantry in fancying that it would be a good idea to mark the farms back to their cost, and to enact that the price of foodstuffs should be proportioned to the capitalization of the farms, serves a useful purpose if it calls attention to the psychological basis of the anti-railway campaign. Facts are not wanted. Principles are offensive. Dreams and denunciations are the stock in trade of the wielders of the big stick. "Squeeze it when you find it," is The Dispatch's heading referring to the "water" in the farms. We leave "dry farming" to those who are pursuing the railways. We shall be content to begin to squeeze the water out of the farms after it is squeezed out of the railways. By that time, if we are not mistaken, we shall find the job already well begun, if not entirely finished.

NEW YORK'S "SHIFTED" LOANS.

London has now heard of the remarkable "shifting" of loans in our recent bank statements, and has an explanation which is all its own, "the idea being universally accepted that it represents a shifting of loans hitherto obtained on this side of the Atlantic to New York." Perhaps so, for it is never safe to affirm or deny anything incapable of proof. But it may be said with some assurance that the New York idea is otherwise. New York is incredulous about being so much in London's debt as London seems pleased to think, and is altogether positive that no considerable part of a $62,000,000 expansion of loans could be "shifted" between London and New York without more disturbance than was evidenced.

The New York idea is that these loans were not shifted in any money market sense at all. That is to say, there was no general calling of loans, volume of new loans. Speaking generally, the "shifting" consisted merely in book entries, the borrowers owing one creditor instead of another, possibly without being aware of the change. Everybody understands that when interior institutions become dissatisfied with the return upon loans made for them here by their New York correspondents they elect to take the interest on their deposits which our banks so obligingly and incomprehensibly allow to institutions which are their competitors in the loan market when business in that line is better.

This explains the increase in local deposits, but leaves the increase in loans unaccounted for. How did our banks succeed in putting out a line of $62,000,000 loans at a time so dull that domestic lenders were dissatisfied with the interest earned? The mystery is explained by the fact that the loans were simply allowed to stand, being in many cases transferred upon the books without disturbance of the securities or the borrower. How in the world London deceived itself into the idea that $62,000,000 of New York money was shifted to London in payment of its loans is something beyond discovery here.

THE UNCLEAN STREETS.

"The ways of the street cleaner are characterized by inexperience and shiftlessness," and "the delinquencies of the department are manifold," is the judgment of Mrs. A. L. MACDOUGALL, Executive Chairman of the Riverside Branch of the Woman's Municipal League, after receipt from its members of detailed replies to these questions: What time is garbage collected? What time are the ashes collected? What time is your street swept? How thoroughly is all this work done?

According to the report, some streets are left unvisited for weeks; the "white wing," untrained or ill-directed, is not only irregular but slovenly in his work, and in many cases employés of the Street Cleaning Department have to be "tipped" and privately hired to do their duty. Mr. MACDONOUGH CRAVEN, the Street Cleaning Commissioner, is charged with lack of capability and conscience for failing to establish system in his department, and he is held accountable for the ignorance of the public and the indifference of the police with respect to their duties of co-operating with the street cleaners.

Mr. CRAVEN will do well to avoid by good works the hostility of these energetic women. There is no denying that the street cleaning system can be vastly improved.

THE ROUMANIAN RISING.

The rising of the Roumanian peasants has been put down. Of course, there was nothing else for the Government to do when the agrarian revolt, beginning in the furthest corner of Moldavia and spreading into Wallachia, had come within a few miles of the capital itself, and its course had been marked by wanton devastation as well as by wanton bloodshed. The task of the Government has been fulfilled with drastic severity and entire completeness. The "embattled farmers" have been mowed down by trained troops and their villages have in some cases been laid as completely waste as the estates upon the owners or agents of which they had undertaken to execute vengeance. But the merits of the quarrel are where they were. The grievances of the peasant have not been redressed. And all students of the situation on the spot agree that these grievances are real.

The owners of the great estates are almost always absentees, deriving their income from the peasant cultivators through middlemen on the ground, who in many cases are not the mere agents of the owners, but are the lessees, and in turn sublet their holdings to the actual cultivators, or employ these as cultivators. Five lessees have constituted a "trust," which includes the larger part of the farms of all Moldavia. Their holdings are estimated at nearly 400,000 acres, for which they pay a rental of $600,000. This tract includes sixty-nine rural communities. There is a smaller trust, (the English word is again used to describe it,) holding about 75,000 acres, for which the trust pays about $100,000 rent. The land thus held furnishes the support of from 250,000 to 300,000 souls. Nearly or quite half the great estates in all Roumania are held by foreigners. The lessors include insurance societies, charitable corporations, and the State itself.

These lessees or middlemen cultivate on their own account only about twenty per cent. of their holdings. The rest they sublet to the actual cultivators, and whereas they pay from $1 to $1.50 an acre rent, they charge the peasant from $12 to $15 an acre, and succeed in exacting this rental from a peasantry which knows no other method of making a living but tilling the soil. Even before the trusts were organized and in operation, the lot of the Roumanian peasantry was recognized as wretched. Its wretchedness is now past endurance. Nothing has been done as yet by the Roumanian Government except the necessary suppression of armed disorder and rioting. But the attention of Parliament has been absorbed by the agricultural situation. Its deliberations have been aided by several public meetings in Bucharest, composed largely of students, with the approval and assistance of their professors. All these manifestations, says the Bucharest correspondent, marked by three common features—unanimity in recognising the reality of the grievances of the peasantry, a desire to deprive the moment of any anti-Semitic character, and a desire to keep the subject out of politics.

THE EXAMPLE OF NEW JERSEY.

The first brood of mosquitos is hatching. All of them are vicious, all more or less poisonous, and some are the undoubted bearers of infectious disease. They are an avoidable menace to the public welfare, and their extirmination is devoutly wished by every taxpayer.

The American Mosquito Extermination Society urges the members of the Senate Finance Committee to propose an appropriation of $10,000 for examination and report upon mosquito breeding places in this State by Dr. FELT, the State Entomologist, acting under the direction of the Department of Education. On this work local measures may be scientifically based for the extermination of the pest. Incidentally valuable marsh lands would be reclaimed, malaria would be eradicated, and Summer resort and residence districts would be benefited by the salutary changes which await upon this appropriation.

New Jersey has done what New York is asked to do. The New Jersey State Entomologist did his work so well that the Legislature is convinced, and is aiding with an appropriation of $350,000, given in the ratio of 50 per cent. of what will be expended by each community, to rid the State of its scourge and an evil fame that has spread throughout the Union. Dr. DOTY last year drained fourteen square miles of Staten Island swamp land under an appropriation of $17,000 from this city, with the immediate result of relieving Richmond Borough of objections to it as a residence and pleasure resort. The small appropriation asked of the State Legislature has again been stricken from the Supply bill at the last moment, as was the case in the three previous sessions. It should be restored.

COST AND CHARGES.

Only a day or two ago Mr. STICKNEY, fresh from the White House, assured all who read his interview that Mr. ROOSEVELT and his railway policy were all right. People and President, we were told, designed nothing worse than a square deal, and the railroads are to be allowed a "reasonable return upon a reasonable investment."

In that case we wonder what will happen to Mr. STICKNEY's railway, which last week was the subject of a report by the Sundberg Investigating Committee to the Minnesota Senate. The committee says this road, to wit, the Chicago Great Western, "was built by A. B. STICKNEY, who raised the funds by acquiring, organizing, reorganizing, and Harrimanizing divers and sundry corporations of Minnesota, Iowa, and Illinois." It is capitalized, we learn, at $143,668 a mile, and cost $28,000. The company itself figures "cost" at $98,011 a mile, but an entry of $6,313,101 in 1891 fifteen years later had become $50,594,344 for a line which had shrunk sixty miles.

Obviously Mr. STICKNEY's cost and capital are about what he chooses to reckon. It is clear that his diversion in such calculations in his leisure hours is something apart from the methods by which he reckons rates, for they are based upon what his competitor charges and what he can get. In a public aspect, therefore, we think it of little importance either what his road actually cost, or what he reckons it to have cost above or below this sum. What puzzles us is how Minnesota is going to squeeze the water out, and how Mr. STICKNEY's friend is going to see that he gets a reasonable return on a reasonable investment if rival carriers fix rates below the cost of the transportation to Mr. STICKNEY. After consultation with his friend Mr. STICKNEY was sure that what prejudiced the railways' credit was not the attacks upon them by scores of Legislatures, but the inflation of securities. The Minnesota committee's report and the price record of Mr. STICKNEY's securities would seem to lend support to his theory in some cases, at least.

THE IRISH CATHOLIC UNIVERSITY.

Later intelligence from England confirms our inference that the opposition to a Roman Catholic University for Ireland is based on fear of Nonconformist sentiment in the matter. STEPHEN GWYNN, one of the most enlightened of the Irish leaders, in a public statement supports Mr. BRYCE's proposal for a single federated university. But he does so with an important reservation. He says:

> I believe that scheme will pass into law, and I believe that the boon which it will confer upon Catholics is quite out of all proportion to the injury which it will undoubtedly (in my judgment) inflict upon Trinity College. For that reason I shall support it with conviction, but at the same time with a sense that only the prejudice (as I must hold) of English Protestants prevents us from having a scheme under which the Irish Catholic ideal of a university and the Irish Protestant ideal of a university—which differ in regard to many matters besides religion—would be left to develop side by side unhampered by each other. I would call attention to one fact. Ireland is predominantly Catholic, and if England insists that there is to be only one university for all Ireland, Irish Catholics will naturally and inevitably aim at securing the control of that university, and will ultimately impress upon it their own ideals. Holding as I do that Irish Catholics are no less fit to manage a university than Irish Protestants, I view this result without apprehension; but valuing the existence of the separate types, I think its free and full development.

The American method, which either leaves the support of higher education to voluntary subscription, or, in case of State foundations, adopts a secular basis, avoids these disputes and difficulties. But where the institution of one sect is supported by taxation, the claim of another and majority sect to an independent establishment is logically very strong.

A bill now before the Legislature provides that over $6,000,000 per annum, in addition to what is already paid the teachers, shall be devoted solely to increasing their salaries. I have always stood for liberal pay for teachers. I believe that the time has come when the salaries should be raised. If, however, this mandatory legislation is passed, it will inevitably mean that money for necessary improvements and necessary equipment will not be forthcoming, because the budget for salaries will be so large. The interests of the children demand that not all of the possible increase shall go into the pockets of the teachers.—Superintendent of Schools WILLIAM H. MAXWELL in The Evening Post of Saturday.

That is, the teachers may not effect their reform immediately, and they may not effect it at all by an attempt to coerce the Board of Education. The city is quite able to administer its own schools. The Legislature has passed the mandatory White bill. In vetoing it the Mayor will have an opportunity to read the teachers—and the Legislature—a lesson they have forgotten to learn.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

At Least Has Poetic Irritability.

Of all the queer and astonishing letters that have reached this office in recent years, certainly not the least, and we are tempted to say the most, queer and astonishing is one that came in on Saturday from a big New Jersey town much less than a hundred miles away. It read—the conventional stately phrases of address and signature aside—as follows:

> The author of the verses entitled "—— ——" sincerely regrets sending you anything unfit to print, and, were it possible, so as to evade a like offense in the future, would give much to know wherein he offended. Trusting you will pardon this second intrusion, he assures you that, although the incident has been painful and much to be regretted, it will in no sense lessen his conviction that THE TIMES is still by far the best newspaper printed on this continent. Enclosed please find postage for the returned MS.

And all this mingled rage and grief for no other reason in the world than that his poem, or verses, as he more modestly puts it, had not been the one chosen for publication, that day, from the twenty or thirty that reach us every morning! What the verses were about is not now remembered by the person who—for his many sins, no doubt—has to winnow from the diurnal crop the single specimen of rhythmic wit or wisdom which is all that THE TIMES wants, but he vaguely recalls that they were of either the highly moral or the highly moralizing type, and that, whatever else they may have lacked, it was not propriety. Hence was it that they were sent back, with a score or more of equally unfortunate companions, with no other comment or criticism than that implied by the inclosure with them of our long formulated and much used printed expression of thanks for the privilege of reading the manuscript and of regrets at our inability to use it.

Evidently this particular poet is not as wonted as are most other manufacturers of "copy" to the receipt of these little announcements. He does not know, apparently, that practically all the best writers of prose and verse in this and other countries have—or could have had if they cared to preserve the things—rather large collections of them, and that to take umbrage at their coming is to evidence an inexperience in the author's trade which is, to the veteran, even more amusing than it is pathetic. Our friend in the big Jersey town is a good judge of newspapers, but he should get his pretty little sensibilities under better control if he doesn't want to have a lot of wholly needless unhappiness all his life.

A Grievance and Its Explanations.

Having evidently been deeply moved by several recent incidents indicative of a rather widespread inclination to bar wearers of Uncle Sam's clothing from places of amusement, Major Gen. ADELBERT AMES, late U. S. Vols., has offered through The Military Service Institute a prize of $50 for the best essay on the following subject: "How may public opinion concerning the army and navy be so educated as to secure for the soldier and sailor in uniform the consideration ordinarily accorded to the civilian." The competition is open to persons eligible to membership in the institute and will close on Oct. 1, and the award will be made by a board composed of Gen. T. H. HUBBARD, Capt. C. H. ARNOLD, and Gen. H. C. KING.

From the wording of what may be called the question it is obvious that Gen. AMES thinks the public inappreciative of our National defenders and in need of instruction as to the respect due to the uniform. It is an old, old grievance, by no means confined to this country. And it does indeed seem hard that a well-behaved soldier or sailor should be excluded because of his certainly honorable uniform from any gathering accessible to anybody not so garbed who has "the price." And yet everybody knows that the army and navy, as such, are not inappreciated, and that if there is a general inclination to discriminate against the uniform there must be some reason for it.

And as a matter of fact there are several reasons. The soldier or sailor on leave may be, and often is, the pink of propriety, in behavior as in dress, but then, again, he rather oftener isn't—rather oftener his ideas of enjoying himself strike the gentler brands of civilians as overstrenuous, and particularly as overalcoholic. And it is easier to keep them all out of a place where the naughty ones are not wanted than it is to decide on which of them are, and especially which of them will remain, exemplars of the graces and of the virtues, and to let those in while excluding the others. That is all there is to it, and if the good soldiers and sailors suffer for the sins of the reckless roysterers, it is somewhat far from this only instance in which such injustice seems to be a natural and inevitable result of the way the world is built and run. And army and navy officers should hardly be the first to condemn discrimination against the uniform, as they do it themselves with a severity far beyond that of any civilian.

Pleading for the Forests.

One cannot help wishing that the United States Forest Commission, in warning us that we are annually using up three or four times as much wood as a year can produce, were saying something as startling as it is true. Of course it ought to be startling, but we have heard it so often talking about to prevent the coming famine, that a repetition of the cry falls mostly on deaf ears. The trouble is that there is a lot of immediate profit in cutting down the forests as rapidly as we can, and immediate profit shuts off the view of future losses vastly greater.

However, the case is not quite hopeless. Here and there all over the country there are men who for one reason or another are either willing or eager to protect the few forests that are left and to start new ones to replace those that have been so recklessly destroyed. And these men really are making a little headway in meeting the immediate profit argument by demonstrating that even the immediate profits, or at any rate those of next week, might be largely increased by intelligent management and renewal of the woods. The lumbermen are probably beyond the reach of reason, and are dogs too old to learn new tricks, but the railways and other great consumers of timber are beginning to be frightened by the prices they are already paying for a material that has no substitute, and not only are they favoring forest reserve bills, but they are planting seedling trees on many a denuded tract. They are not yet doing enough really to count, but it is a start along the long road toward safety.

SUPERFLUOUS WATER METERS.

A Suspicious Citizen Speaks of "Graft" and the "City Plumber."

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I want to protest against the injustice which the Water Department inflicts on taxpayers by means of water meters. The law gives the Commissioner power to install meters in stores and other business property. It was intended to apply to laundries, barber shops, and similar places which use a great deal of water. In the last year, however, property owners have been driven to install these patented machines in stores of all sorts, even those which use almost no water. A store for the sale of shoes or hardware or fancy articles or coal uses much less water than a flat with a toilet, sink, and tubs, and it is absurd to meter the one and not the other. It has been asserted at the department that the law requires meters in all business property; this is not correct. The Commissioner has full discretion in the matter, and until within a year this discretion has always been exercised to order meters where they are really needed; never until recently have they been required in stores where the consumption is normal.

Furthermore, the circumstances connected with the installation are most suspicious. A copy of the order is left at the premises. If the owner fails within thirty days to install the meter a permit is issued to a "city plumber." This functionary is not a responsible official, but merely a private employe of the Water Commissioner. If he did his work as cheaply as a private plumber, or nearly so, this system would be tolerable. But the job done by a city plumber costs anywhere from three to five times as much as when done by private contract. The bill is paid by the department and the amount becomes a lien on the land.

Furthermore, the writer is strongly of the opinion (though it cannot be proved) that means are taken by collusion with janitors to prevent the copy of the order which is left at the house from coming to the owner's attention. In three cases he found that the order left at the house had been "mislaid," and the first thing the owner knew of it was when the thirty days had expired and a permit been issued to the city plumber.

In each of the cases the name and address of the owner was on record and the order could have been mailed to him.

The entire meter system as applied to ordinary buildings is vicious and oppressive. The meters are patented articles, sold at an enormous profit. It costs anywhere from $30 to $250 to install one; they are constantly out of order and are kept in repair at considerable expense. Where there is a large and irregular consumption of water a meter is a necessary evil, but as applied to ordinary tenements it is an unjustifiable and indirect way of extorting excessive charges for water and of enriching city plumbers and meter patentees at the expense of the taxpayers.

A Word for Dime Novels.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In your issue of to-day I notice with interest a communication from a "Writer of Dime Novels," who questions whether the recent suicide of a youth was caused by the reading of dime novels or of a United States history. As a writer only of magazine stories, who has not yet risen to the height of dime novel composition, (which I understand is a somewhat difficult art, granted by the muses only to a favored few,) I may be considered fairly unprejudiced. It seems to me that the raising of this question should emphasize that the great and popular class of dime literature has been much and long maligned.

As a boy I read dime novels, and I fail to remember one that was immoral. The more delicate social questions were never discussed, and when it came to the plain question of right and wrong, the triumph of the good and the downfall of the villain always occurred punctually on Page 32. But the quick action of the dime novel, the impatience of circumlocution, the tendency toward "something doing" in every paragraph, in short, the general "strenuousness," may have had a stronger influence than we realize in forming the character of the present generation of Americans. We are certainly displaying all these tendencies in our National life and work.

From a literary standpoint I must admit that the dime novel has its defects, but even here it may be only a trifle more advanced than our other literature in its tendency toward the use of English as she is employed by the man in the street. And if it had not been for the discriminating literary taste formed in our great population by youthful perusal of dime novels, how many of our "best sellers" of the last few years would ever have been known as such?

As to United States histories, there is more than one which raises in the reader a desire to hang even the historian!

Reasons for Non-Churchgoing.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

If a layman's views on this deplorable state of affairs mentioned in your edition of to-day under the title of "Non-Churchgoing" is of any value, I would submit most humbly that "arsenals of statistics" laid before the President are as futile as the "concealment of facts" by the officers of the Federation of Churches.

As an Englishman resident in this country for some years, it has been obvious to me that there is an absence of "parochial division" of the City of New York. London is divided into thousands of parishes and the clergyman appointed to each come closely into personal touch with the residents of their parish, and thus their personality and influence do much to interest their parishioners in general church work and in keeping their congregations together and infusing that life and spirit which seem in a great degree to be absent in the churches of this city.

There are thousands of "religious vagrants" who go miles to hear a sensational preacher or an attractive musical service, and it is this vagrancy which seems to destroy or minimize the support they might give to their "parish church" were such in existence.

"The appearance of religion on Sundays only" proves that it is only an "appearance." "When religion is made a science, there is nothing more intricate—when it is made a duty, nothing more easy."

PAY OF POLICE SERGEANTS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

By the passage of a bill now pending in the Legislature, introduced by Mr. Prentice of New York, and intended to equalize salaries in the Police Department, giving to the Roundsmen, or, as they are now termed, Sergeants, a rate of pay midway between that of a patrolman and a Lieutenant, in accordance with their rank, there will be done more to increase the efficiency of the Police Department than has been accomplished for many a day. The Bingham bill, by which all the Detective Sergeants were made Lieutenants, virtually shuts out for some time to come promotions from the rank of Sergeant to Lieutenant. Commissioner Bingham, it is said, realized that an injustice was being done the Roundsmen, but could see no other way to reorganize the Detective Bureau, which reorganization he deemed absolutely necessary, and is heartily in favor of the Roundsmen receiving the salary provided for in this bill. Whatever may be said of the individual policeman, the department as a whole is the finest body of men in any police force to-day in existence, and the passage of this bill, in addition to giving these Sergeants justice, will give encouragement to every patrolman in the department to so perform his duty as to merit promotion to the rank of Sergeant, a desirable increase in salary, as well as the present inducement to take a step up the ladder of promotion. The salary paid a Sergeant at the present time was fixed by statute in 1894, since which time the salaries of nearly all employes of the National and State Governments, as well as those of the employes of all large corporations, have been increased in accordance with the increased cost of living and the very marked increase in rents in this city. The salary paid a Sergeant of Police is but $100 a year more than that paid a patrolman, which is barely sufficient to pay for the additional uniforms in order that they may at all times appear examples of cleanliness and neatness to their subordinates, a very important factor in the maintenance of discipline. The patrolmen at present receive $1,400 per annum, the Sergeants $1,500, and the Lieutenants $2,000, and it is with a view to a fair equalization of pay between the patrolmen and Lieutenants that Mr. Prentice has introduced this bill giving the Sergeants $1,700 per annum. JUSTITIA.

POWERS OF CONDEMNATION.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

My attention has been called to an article in THE TIMES of April 1 relating to the question of conferring on the city larger powers of condemnation. I note that some stress has been placed by those not favoring such plan on the possibility that it might involve the city in "real estate speculation." It does not, however, necessarily follow that if given the power of larger condemnation the city need itself be involved in "real estate speculation." The power can be utilized through contractors in such a way that the city, while realizing the benefit, will assume no risk. For instance, if given the power, the city might, after notice and bids, let a contract for a specific improvement—say, a new avenue, for example—the contract providing as part of the bargain that the city should acquire by condemnation a certain area of land abutting on the improvement and turn it over to the contractor at cost. The profit the contractor would expect to realize from a resale of such abutting property at an enhanced price would naturally be taken into account in fixing the amount of his bid for doing the work. The city would thus get the benefit in the reduced cost of the improvement.

It is not unreasonable to anticipate that men experienced in the development of real estate would see and be able to realize a profit in a venture of this kind, and competition between them would result in giving to the city the improvement at a low cost.

A somewhat similar arrangement was made in the bids for the building of the rapid transit underground road, where the terms of the contract provided that the necessary land for stations, &c., should be condemned by the city and turned over to the contractor at cost.

In the discussion I have seen in the press, the possibility of using the power of larger condemnation in the way above indicated has not, it seems to me, received sufficient attention.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

I have received a postal card notice, dated 20th inst., from the American Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, that the dog license for 1906 will expire on 30th inst., 'and must be renewed on or before that date,' and requesting the remittance of $1 renewal fee and 10 cents additional to cover postage on renewal certificate and tag.

I paid $2 last year to this society for the privilege of keeping my dog.

Will you kindly inform myself and hundreds of others of your readers whether this is a legal fee collectible by this society? Their agent comes around yearly scaring women about this fee, which, I understand, they are not entitled by law to collect, a case having recently been litigated in the courts, and the latter not sustaining their claim to collect.

What is the law and status of this—what many consider—imposition on the public by this society, and can they legally collect same?

Awaiting a reply through your columns,

Blocking Passage on Broadway.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Is there no remedy for the crowding of pedestrians off the platform over the sidewalk in front of the new Singer Building, now in course of construction?

There is always a number of idle men hanging over the railing, who have apparently no business there. These, together with the workmen moving girders, wheelbarrows, and numerous other things, make a passage way extremely difficult for those who must use this platform, or else he crowded off into the street, where it is as much as your life is worth to venture, as any one who has ever tried it will realize.

It seems to me that these idle men might be told to move on.

London's Bishop Coming.

From The London P. T. C.

The Bishop of London, who is to visit the United States during the coming Summer, is on the borderland of the fifties, and still a bachelor. He has proved himself an ideal ruler of the see, for which his thirteen years' acquaintance and sympathy with the ills of the people of London, and particularly of the East End, admirably fitted him. He won the real affection of the people "Down East" by his free and easy manners with them and by acting up to his motto, "Don't be afraid to be human." He would often salute an irreclaimable ruffian with a genial, "Hello, old boy!" On one occasion he lent a seedy individual his great-coat, and it never returned. He has been censured by a Parochial Relief Committee for indiscriminately giving half-crowns away. One lad, who played football with him, says, "Ingram is pretty firm on his pins!"

PEOPLE VS. PARSONS.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

It is a regrettable fact that the article on "People vs. Parsons" in your issue of April 27 was written by a lady and a poetess of no mean ability, inasmuch as that fact curtails the ability of the reader of average intelligence from expressing as fully as he might desire his contempt for the arguments, or rather, excuses, therein put forth as an explanation why the so-called common people of to-day in the majority of cases stay away from the churches of our city.

The writer of that article must of necessity have been in real earnest when in the ode to common sense on the same page, her muse cries "Give me that attribute, divinely fair"; for no one in full possession of "that saving grace" can attribute the absence of the majority of people from church to their increased thoughtfulness and conception of facts. Neither is it fair to suggest such an absurdity as the cause for non-attendance being the inability of the pulpit to supply reasonable doctrines or rational theories, nor is it anything but a fallacy to believe that the average plebeian aids his conscience by gaining spiritual guidance through the voice which speaks from library shelves. Although I am no theological student, if you will pardon an expressive slang phrase, it makes me feel sick to see the statements in the cleanest and best daily paper that I have ever read that the sincere minister of to-day who believes what he says is an uneducated man; that the student who chooses preaching as his vocation is necessarily a hypocrite, and does so for financial gain, or that the orthodox preacher of to-day would be in a hopeless muddle if, his sermon over, his congregation was permitted to "talk back to the minister."

Briefly, the reason for the lack of the attendance of the average mortal at the churches of our city to-day is their fear of a truth which they are afraid to fully comprehend, and the fact that they are not fully gifted with that gift of common sense. The intelligence of the majority is shown to be of a low order by the commonest papers of largest circulation in a bridge-crush crowd, and the wisdom of church-goers is shown by their lives, their preparation for the future, and their influence for good in their own community.

NEWSPAPERS VS. BILLBOARDS.

A Test of the Advertising Value of Each Furnished by Butte.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

It has been proved in Butte, Mon., that it pays to advertise in newspapers rather than on dead walls and billboards and by dodgers.

For the past two months, owing to a strike, Butte has been without newspapers. Because of this the city has not only been deprived of newspapers, but almost every business interest has suffered. The brunt of the burden of the newspapor shutdown has been borne by the advertiser. It is a fact vouched for by the highest authorities that in many instances the mercantile business has fallen off 20 per cent., and cases are not rare where the decline in volume has been as high as 50 per cent. The merchants ascribe this unsatisfactory state of affairs solely to the fact that there were no newspapers in which to advertise.

Every possible makeshift has been adopted by Butte merchants. Billboards and dead-wall advertising has been invoked to the limit, but has failed to stimulate business, which has practically been at a standstill ever since the shut-down. Even the theatres, which depend largely on billboard posters and dodgers circulated from house to house, report that their business has been decreased fully 50 per cent.

Bad Features of Wooden Pavements.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Your editorial in THE TIMES recently entitled "Bad Pavements," calling attention to the bad condition of the pavements of this city is right to the point. They are in a bad condition, and always will be while there is a street in the city paved with asphalt. It is slippery when wet, it is dusty when dry. It is not the pavement for a busy city. But of all the pavements ever laid down in this city the wooden pavement in the lower part of the city is the worst. After it was down I had to try to stop the sprinkling of the street. No horse could keep his footing, when at all wet, in front of my place of business. At least a dozen horses a day fell this Winter. One of my men counted fifty horses down in one day.

There is now a policeman stationed in the block between Church and Greenwich Streets to help the horses. There is no question that part of the trouble is due to overloading, but whether overloaded or not, no horse can get a foothold on that pavement. Some action must be taken to have it removed, and the best pavement we ever had—granite block—put down again. I am of opinion that the city could be held liable for any damage sustained by horse or man in traveling on the pavement when it is slippery. The wooden pavement is a curse.

Bridge Crush and Borough Boundaries.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

As an engineer I read with great interest the letter of that good American, Bird S. Coler, President of the Borough of Brooklyn, in this morning's Times, on the "Poulson Plan" to relieve the bridge crush at the Brooklyn Bridge.

But still it strikes me as strange that the imaginary red-tape boundaries of the two former cities of New York and Brooklyn should act as an obstruction to the immense flow of travel between them. If you erect a dam across a river you obstruct its flow. Now the tide of travel from Brooklyn is simply "dammed" at the bridge terminal. Why not remove the dam and let the trolley cars run to their proper destinations, north and south and west; also let the elevated in New York be joined to the elevated in Brooklyn, and form one continuous flow. As well might be, form a tunnel with elaborate loops on the Subway at South Ferry, where it will cross to Brooklyn under the East River.

Why not remove the red tape at the Bridge Terminal? From an engineering point of view it seems so easy, simple, logical, and, withal, so practical.

THOMAS R. YBARRA.

OVATION TO HUGHES AT COOPER UNION

Governor Speaks for Utilities and Recount Bills at People's Institute.

THE LAWS ARE FOR ALL

He Says, and Corporations That Are Not Fair Should Be Compelled to be So.

Gov. Hughes told an audience that filled Cooper Union last night that he was not the Governor of those who voted for him, but of all the people of New York State; that he was strongly in favor of a recount bill, and that he believed that it was necessary for the proper government of this State that the Public Utilities bill, now before the Legislature, should be made a law. Not since the days preceding the election last November has Cooper Union held an audience as large, or half so demonstrative, as the one that greeted Gov. Hughes last night.

The occasion was the closing exercises of the ninth season of the Cooper Institute. Charles Sprague Smith made a speech in which he told of the work accomplished in the season just ended, after which he introduced Gov. Hughes "as the man who had lived up to the pledges he made to the people in his campaign for Governor last Fall."

When Gov. Hughes stood up to speak the audience went wild. Everybody cheered or clapped their hands, and it was fully ten minutes before the Governor got a chance to be heard. All through his speech the vast audience paid rapt attention, and his every remark that had to do with plans for the betterment of present conditions was the signal for outbursts of applause.

Gov. Hughes's Speech.

"I have long appreciated the important work that is being done by the People's Institute," said Gov. Hughes, "and I have regretted that I have been prevented from accepting the invitations to join with you that have been so courteously extended to me by your Director. More than a year ago I promised to be with you to-night, and I am here to fulfill that promise.

"I do not know how many in this great audience voted for me in the last election, nor does that fact concern me, for while I appreciate the confidence that was reposed in me, I wish to state that I am not the Governor of those who voted for me alone, but of all the people of this State With regard to the public questions that come before me, I wish to say that I have no desire to force my personal views on the Legislature, but it is my duty as the Governor of the State to contribute my best judgment as to the measures which will remedy existing abuses and to endeavor to have the State Government administered in all its departments honestly and efficiently for the benefit of the people.

"When these measures are proposed it is the duty of every citizen who believes that those measures are just to exert his influence in their support. I do not object to opposition, provided always that the opposition is in defense of the interests of the people, and not for the furtherance of selfish and private interests. I have been greatly impressed as I have become more intimately acquainted with the extent of the interests of this State and with the necessity for a steady increase in the activities of Government.

"Yesterday I was present at the dedication of a great school of agriculture, and I have no doubt that many of you fail to realize the vast importance of the agricultural interests of this State, which is still, in many respects, and should be in all, the most important agricultural State to this Union.

"Then let us remember that we have our asylums, our hospitals, and our prisons, the needs of which grow with our population. We also have our labor and educational and departments for the regulation of important enterprises, such as banking, insurance, [applause,] and gas companies, and necessarily there will be increasing demands for the exercise of the powers of the State in supervising and regulating them.

"You do not make a man better by putting him in the employ of the State. The employer who oppresses his employes will oppress the people of the State if he gets the chance. The employe who will cheat his employer or the union man who will betray his union for his own advantage will cheat the public if he gets the chance, and the man who thinks that the American ideal is 'every man for himself and the devil take the hindmost' will never prove a faithful servant of the people.

True Rights of the Public.

"So it is in the schools and the settlements and other organizations where men and women, and boys and girls, are taught to be square, and that there are limits which personal honor and the sense of right will not permit to be exceeded, and that there are public rights which are above all mere individual considerations, that we find the security for good government and the prosperity of the people.

"And I make no apology for adding before this audience that I believe most strongly to the cultivation of a strong religious principle, and of the faith in the supremacy of power that makes for righteousness, upon which all else that I have spoken of is based.

"Let us now consider the machinery of government, and we will realize that first of all we must have an honest election under a proper ballot law. I have recommended to the Legislature, and advocate the passage of a Recount bill. Such a bill I favor without any reference to persons or personal considerations, and without regard to the result, but upon the ground that it is right and fair. I hope that no American community will ever have occasion to be in doubt as to whether the man who is elected gets the office.

"I also favor a form of ballot by which every voter shall be able to express his preference with reference to each candidate. It is urged by some that the people are familiar with the present ballot and that they know how to split ballots and exercise their right without inconvenience.

"It is also urged that such a ballot would work against party organization, but these fears are the fears of inexperience on the part of those who think themselves practical men. I am assured by a Republican Governor of one State and by a Democratic Governor of another State, where actual experience has been had with the law, that it is favored by the intelligent voters of all parties,

"My friends, the surest way for a party to be successful is to convince the people that it is disinterested in its services to the people and that it appeals to the intelligent sentiment of the State and desires its candidates weighed according to their merits. I likewise believe in improving our Primary law so that those who are nominated for office shall be selected in a democratic manner, and not as a result of dictation or corrupt bargaining.

"We need a more responsible Government. The heads of departments and the members of commissions should be more directly accountable to the people. You elect a Governor charged with the duty of administration, and he should have an opportunity to discharge that duty, and he should be held responsible by the people for the manner in which he discharges it.

The Governor's Responsibility.

"The attention of the people is centred upon the election of a Governor more than upon any other officer. The Governor is elected for only two years, and the people should tell him that 'we put you in office because we trust you with the responsibility, and will hold you responsible.' That is the way it should be done.

"It is especially essential that we should have a law regulating our public service institutions, and at the present time it is a matter of particular importance because of the bill now in the Legislature creating a Public Utilities Commission, with provisions giving the Governor the power of removal.

"I do not believe that under such a bill the power of removal would be used in an arbitrary manner. For example, I have no objection to the provision that no officer shall be removed until he has been given a list of the charges against him, a hearing, and a chance to meet them. That is American and fair. A Governor never should attempt to remove a man unless he has a good reason, and can get the public indorsement. So far as I am concerned, I would not object to this provision.

"But, on the other hand, I would have it clearly understood that a man must not necessarily be a criminal before he can be removed. We want men who are efficient and capable, know the duties of their offices and perform them in the interests of the public. We do not desire men who proceed along the line of least resistance, men who leave as much undone as they can without infuriating the public. So I say, let a man be removable for inefficiency or incompetence.

"It is not necessary for me to talk to you in New York about the regulation of public corporations. You have seen public franchises made the subject of stock jobbing and manipulation, which no one has ever had the audacity to defend. Some railroads may say, 'We have done no wrong; why should we suffer for the sins of others?' The laws are for all, and those railroads that treat the public fairly will receive fair treatment from that public, while those railroads that do not treat the public fairly must be compelled to do so.

"With reference to this Public Utilities bill some say that it is essential that there should be a provision for a court review, yet it is well known that any interference with constitutional rights will be immediately challenged by any corporation affected. Take the eighty-cent gas law, for instance.

"In that act there was no provision for a revision, but a Constitutional right has been invoked, and it is in the courts at the present time, and the same will be true of this bill now before the Legislature should it be passed."

HEBREW ASYLUM TO MOVE.

Orphans' Home in Upper Manhattan Needs More Room—Annual Meeting.

At the annual meeting of the Board of Trustees of the Hebrew Orphan Asylum, held yesterday morning, it was announced that the present valuable location of the institution is to be abandoned for more commodious quarters as soon as a desirable site can be found.

Supt. Solomon Lowenstein stated that a committee was appointed last Fall for the purpose of selecting a suitable parcel of land upon which to erect adequate buildings, and while they had been ever since casting about for a new home, no definite spot had been determined upon. It is thought most probable that Westchester County will be the nearest location available affording easy access to Manhattan.

The change in the character of the neighborhood in which the asylum is at present located from a semi-rural neighborhood of less than ten years ago to a compactly built up and densely inhabited city district is given as the chief cause of the desire for a better location.

The present valuable site occupies the area bounded by 136th and 138th Streets and Amsterdam Avenue and Hamilton Place.

President McGowan of the Board of Aldermen addressed the meeting briefly and praised the showing made by the cadets during a drill which had preceded the meeting.

"I was surprised and pleased," he said, "at the military bearing of the boys and at the military character of the intricate evolutions performed hy them. It was the best drill I ever witnassed by any public school or any institution in the city of New York."

Charities Commissioner Robert W. Hebberd told how he came to know the Jewish charity which knew no creed, their philanthropy extending to Jew and Christian alike, and also to know that the Jew never had need to go outside of his own co-religionists for help. Dr. D. C. Potter of the Department of Finance also spoke.

The feature of the cadets' parade was the drum corps of twenty tots between 5 and 9 years of age. They were led by nine-year-old Sammy Kapitoff, a diminutive drum major, not much longer than his baton, whose skillful conduct of his charge caused those on the reviewing stand to call the little fellow up to receive their especial praise.

It was announced that the following officers had been elected:

Louis Stern, President; Henry Rice, Vice President; Martin Beckhard, Treasurer, to serve for one year, and the following Trustees, to serve for three years: Sigmund Rosenwald, Joseph E. Newburger, Samuel Strasbourger, Moses Kahn, Ernest Thalmann, William Levy, and Philip Lehman.

SUES HOWARD GOULD.

W. C. Woodward Wants $250,000 for Services in Getting Testimony.

Suit has been begun against De Lancey Nicoll and Howard Gould by William Carroll Woodward for a large sum, set down at $250,000, for breach of contract. No particulars have been given out as to the nature of the services which Woodward alleges he rendered the defendants, but it is understood that he asserts he undertook to give evidence and procure other testimony for Mr. Gould in a delicate matter.

For some months Mr. Gould and his wife, who before her marriage was Miss Katherine Clemmons, the actress, have been apart. When they returned to the city last September from a cruise on their yacht Niagara Mrs. Gould went to the St. Regis and Mr. Gould to the Waldorf. Reports have been circulated that they disagreed about the employment of servants. There has also been a great deal of trouble about Castle Gould, the enlarged replica of Castle Kilkenny, which Mrs. Gould wished put up on Long Island. So much difficulty arose over the plans that the architect, Abner J. Haydel, threw up the job and sued for his fee He obtained an award of $80,000, but the case is still under appeal.

The attorneys of record in the Woodward suit are Sheldon & Gates of 170 Broadway. Neither of the partners has been long in the city. James C. Sheldon was at one time a member of the Legislature. Mr. Gates is also from the northern part of New York.

The plaintiff, Woodward, is supposed to be in New Jersey somewhere. De Lancey Nicoll's associates profess no fear whatever of the outcome of the suit and declare that it will be impossible to prove that he had ever any sort of contract with Mr. Nicoll or Mr. Gould, or ever rendered them any service.

CONEY LINES KEPT RUNNING.

B. R. T. Gets Steamship Stokers to Fill Striking Firemen's Places.

The threat of the striking firemen employed in the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company's power house to tie up the elevated lines of the system yesterday and make the Coney Island going crowds take to the surface cars, was not carried out. None of the motormen appeared yesterday to know anything about striking. They were all running their trains as usual.

Officials of the company declared that the threat to tie up the lines was all "bluff." The strikers gained several recruits, however, from the South Brooklyn power houses, and last night twenty-five of the 100 men employed in the Kent Avenue power plant quit. Representatives of the company said their places would be taken by steamship stokers from Manhattan.

It was announced by President Timothy Healey of the International Brotherhood of Stationary Firemen that the strike of the firemen would be extended to-day. Healey said that the men will be brought on strike in sections in the power houses. He said this procedure would be kept up until a general wage increase had been obtained for the firemen, though it was not the intention of the brotherhood to cause a tie-up in the Brooklyn Rapid Transit system.

LIGHT LIKE DAY IN NEW THEATRE

ELEVATOR IN STAGE FLOOR

Belasco's Genius Taxed to Provide Novelties in the Building Plans.

The work of building the new Stuyvesant Theatre, in Forty-fourth Street, has made such rapid progress under the direction of Myer E. Bimberg within the last month that the plasterers will be able to begin work within the next ten days, and the structure will be ready for the decorators by June 15. The structure is now all roofed in with the exception of some little space above the stage, and the fireproofing has been completed.

David Belasco, sole manager of the Stuyvesant, has himself taken an active hand with George Keister, the architect, in planning innovations for the new playhouse. Mr. Belasco's reputation as a stage director, his ability at obtaining unusual effects, and his willingness to spend money on perfecting his productions are well known. It has been his ambition to have his new playhouse equipped with every possible improvement, and it has some decidedly novel features.

In the first place, the new Stuyvesant is the first New York theatre to be built in an inclosed rectangular court, with an open passageway ten feet wide extending around the entire structure. This passageway affords protection in case of fire and permits the arrangement of an unusual number of side exits. There are exits equivalent to nineteen of the regulation widths on the ground floor alone, which means that there is one exit for every twenty persons to be accommodated in the orchestra. The number of persons to an exit from the balconies is even less. The managers declare that the entire theatre, with every seat occupied, could be cleared in three minutes.

Perhaps the most remarkable novelty in the new playhouse, however, is the system of electric lighting invented by Mr. Belasco and carried into effect by Nimis & Nimis, theatrical electrical experts. Mr. Belasco's idea has been to do away with the ordinary glare of theatrical lighting, so tiresome and injurious to the eyes, and to furnish a soft and gentle light like real daylight. No chandeliers or brackets will be visible in the theatre. Instead, the clusters of electric lights will be inclosed in the space between the fireproof roof of the building and a ground-glass ceiling of the auditorium.

This ceiling will be of glass, supported by ribs, and thus presenting a paneled appearance. The effect of the lights shining through the glass will be mild and all-pervading. The lights beneath the balconies are to be similarly contrived. Behind the scenes for stage effects there are to be no less than 4,000 lights, with all manner of new contrivances for obtaining all degrees of brilliancy.

The distance from the floor of the stage to the roof above is ninety-two feet. Above the stage are to be two large fly galleries on both sides. All the "drops," as well as the curtain, are to be raised and lowered by electric motors. The centre of the stage is occupied by the platform of a large elevator, and below the staga are two separate floors. The purpose of this arrangement is to change the stage settings between acts more rapidly. One stage setting need merely be pushed on to the elevator and lowered to either of the floors below, where it can be stowed away.

This electric elevator is controlled by two buttons. If one of these buttons is pushed the elevator descends to the first story below the stage, and if the other button is pushed it descends to the second.

The dressing rooms are in a separate building on the west side of the structure, divided from the main building by a thick fira wall. They are arranged in six stories, and are all open to daylight and fresh air, with windows on the ten-foot court already described. Besides all the customary modern improvements, there is a shower bath on each floor.

On the west side of the building in front are the four floors of offices to be occupied by the members of Mr. Belasco's staff, which is to be removed from the old Belasco Theatre. A mezzanine floor is provided, where Mr. Belasco will have a private reception room.

The general interior appearance of the new theatre is broad and shallow. Opera glasses will scarcely be necessary, even from the rear of the second balcony, and the front of the first balcony is unusually close to the apron of the stage. Mr. Belasco believes that plays cannot be presented to their best advantage in overlarge playhouses, and so has limited the seating capacity of his new theatre to 1,100 persons. The orchestra pit is to have a concrete floor, covered with glass. It is expected that this will be a benefit in disseminating the music.

Myer Bimberg, builder of the theatre, says that the building is ready for the plasterers long before the specified time, in spite of the inclement weather of March.

A MINIATURE MELODRAMA.

"The Master of Arms" Wins Applause at the Fifth Avenue.

"The Master of Arms," a new sketch by George Foster Platt, general stage director for Walter N. Lawrence, was presented for the first time yesterday afternoon at the Fifth Avenue Theatre. The title rôle was played by Richard Malchien, who was assisted by Mr. Dellon and Katherine Augus. The sketch, which is described as a "miniature melodrama," was liberally applauded, and the leading actor received half a dozen curtain calls.

"The Master of Arms" tells the story of a fencing master who is losing his eyesight. The physician has told him that this is due to a clot of blood and holds out little hope of relief. When he confides in his pupil, who has now become his assistent, this man turns out to be of the basest metal. Having no gratitude, he not only seeks to obtain a three-quarters interest in the business, but even makes violent love to the fiancée of his disabled master.

The master returns at the wrong moment, and, though half blind, fights with his assistant and disarms him. In the heat of conflict he regains his sight and his confidence in the woman he loves. The women has known nothing of the approaching blindness.

Big Crowd at Green Room Clubs' Show

The Fourth Annual Dress Rehearsal of the Green Room Club took place last night at the Liberty Theatre. The theatre was crowded with an enthusiastic audience, mainly of theatrical people. The proceeds are to be devoted to the dramatic library of the club. Among the leading performers were Richard Carle, Eddie Foy, Alexander Carr, Alice Lloyd, Frank Moulan, George Cohan, Emma Carus, Trixie Friganza, Cressy and Dayne, and Walter Jones and Madge Vincent.

ANDERSON QUITS SHUBERT.

Theatrical Merger Causes New Deal in Shubert-Anderson Company.

As a result of the theatrical merger announced on Saturday, by which the Majestic Theatre in New York, the Shubert Theatre in Brooklyn, and a number of out-of-town theatres formerly belonging to the independent circuit will hereafter be devoted to vaudeville, Max Anderson of the Hippodrome has resigned as Vice President and Director of the Shubert Theatrical Company. Mr. Anderson is heavily interested in vaudeville theatres of his own, and these theatres book through the United Booking Agency, which is to be opposed by the new Klaw & Erlanger circuit of "advanced vaudeville." Mr. Anderson will retain his interest in the Hippodrome, which is managed by the Shubert-Anderson Company, and will continue active in directing the policy of that playhouse.

Mr. Anderson made this statement last night:

"I have withdrawn from the Shubert Theatrical Company because of previous obligations to other vaudeville managers with whom I am associated in other cities, East and West. Now that many of the Shubert theatres are to be devoted to vaudeville, I would be in the position of opposing my own theatres if I continued to retain my interest in the Shubert Theatrical Company. In conjunction with Henry Ziegler, who is my partner in many vaudeville enterprises, I have been a heavy stockholder in the Shubert Theatrical Company since its organization, and have devoted considerable time to its enterprises.

"Mr. Ziegler and I could not see our way clear to continue under the new arrangement. I wish to say, however, that my withdrawal does not in any way affect my harmonious relations with Lee Shubert, who continues as my partner in the management of the Hippodrome, which this season has been a very profitable venture. The Hippodrome is controlled by the Shubert-Anderson Company, which is an entirely separate corporation from the Shubert Theatrical Company. We have a ten years' lease upon the Hippodrome, and are now making active preparations for our new production next season."

The new merger was much discussed at the performance of the Green Room Club last night. On all sides it was pointed out that the Shuberts had relieved themselves of a heavy burden by giving up to vaudeville many of their recently acquired out-of-town houses conducted by the Shubert Theatrical Company, while still retaining control of their main houses in such leading cities as New York, Boston, Philadelphia, Chicago, Washington, and other points. At the same time it was generally admitted that the acquisition of the new theatres will be of vast assistance to Klaw & Erlanger in their new enterprise. Several years have elapsed since the questions of syndicate and anti-syndicate have been so amicably discussed.

PARADISE PARK FREE TO ALL.

No Charge Either for Peanuts and "Red Hots" at Resort Yesterday.

In all the cold and chill of a day which had somehow lost its proper place in the calendar, Paradise Park, the Fort George Summer resort, was thrown open to the public yesterday morning. The manager, who had hoped for a balmy Spring opening, did his best to make things cheerful by giving orders that no admission should be charged those courageous enough to visit him. Incidentally, he ordered the popcorn and "Red Hot" men to lay in an extra supply and serve their wares free at his expense.

Right hero came the joke on the manager. The early comers telephoned to their Harlem friends that things were doing out at Fort George, and all 125th Street began a pilgrimage to Paradise, in spite of the weather. Manager Schenck was game. As long as the "Red Hots" held out everything was free—and he had a free view of the crowd for consolation.

Turning 'Em Away at Wild West Show

Buffalo Bill and his Wild West Show appear to have returned to New York after five years abroad, greater favorites than ever. The attendance at the Madison Square Garden since the opening has established a new record. The Garden is packed every afternoon and a crowd is turned away on most evenings.

Svedropsky for Harlem Casino.

Michael Svedropsky, with an orchestra of musicians from the Metropolitan Opera House orchestra, of which he was concert master, will open a season of nightly concerts at the Harlem Casino, beginning on next Saturday evening.

Mr. Svedropsky has been solo violinist with the Royal Orchestra in Dresden, and soloist and concert master of the Philadelphia Symphony Orchestra. An additional attraction throughout the Summer will be Alta Yolo, the contralto, formerly vocal soloist with Duss's Orchestra and with Sousa's Band.

FIND OF THREE BABIES.

Two in Manhattan Held to be Twins—Some Fear of Triplets.

Matron Maggie Kelly found a live package in a corner of the Grand Central Station yesterday afternoon at 4 o'clock. The package was a girl baby, and the experts at the East Fifty-first Street Station, whither she was first taken, declared that she was a week old. Lieut. Casey sent out for a bottle of milk for her. She drank, and cried for more. She was immediately shipped to Bellevue Hospital, Lieut. Casey saying that he was an honest but a poor man.

Later: At 4:30 o'clock Matron Lamb of Bryant Park, Sixth Avenue and Forty-second Street, found a live, blue-wrapped package on one of the benches. This was a girl baby, also about a week old. She was shipped immediately to Bellevue Hospital, where the resemblance sharks said that she must be a twin sister of the Grand Central foundling.

Worse: At 6 o'clock an eagle-eyed Brooklyn citizen saw a "stoutly built man" enter the vestibule of the house at 132 Third Avenue, Brooklyn.

"He came out and rushed away as if he were in a hurry," said the Brooklyn citizen. "I went over to investigate. It was a baby, about a week old, and a boy. He had on blue. On him was pinned a card that read: 'Kapp—1,645.'"

The Brooklyn boy was sent to the Bergen Street Police Station, and then to the City Matron. The experts of the two boroughs have not compared notes, but it is feared that the Third Avenue find may be a strong brother of the Manhattan girls. The Brooklyn man couldn't have been mistaken about the baby's age; he knows. And the Manhattan Matrons ought to know about the age of this borough's girls.

TRYING TO SAVE SEVEN MEN.

Little Progress Made by Pumps in a Pennsylvania Mine.

JOHNSTOWN, Penn., April 28.—Despite the fact that twelve large pumps have been in operation for two days at Mine No. 28 of the Berwind-White Company at Foustwell, where seven men have been imprisoned since Friday by a flood of water from abandoned workings, so little progress has been made that the miners may not be reached in time to save their lives.

All day to-day the tapping on the compressed-air pipes continued. The rescuing party is greatly puzzled over the manner in which these taps are given. Invariably the number is seven. Whether the miners on the other side of the flooded headings mean that they are in Number 7 Heading or whether they mean that seven men are living is merely a matter of conjecture.

SNOWSCAPES AND MOONLIT MERES

WINTER'S WARM COLORS

Variations on Favorite Themes Played with Gusto by a Lover of Nature.

Mr. Birge Harrison is showing until May 2 some half a hundred landscapes in the gallery of the Century Club, most of them in oils, a few in pastels. While his pictures appear now and then at the regular exhibitions, it is some years since he has made a comprehensive showing of work New York.

"Bearsville in the Catskills" has worked its charms upon him to such a degree that the city rarely turns him back from his ten-acre farm, but the present collection has at least two of those city pictures he used to paint.

There's a view south from Madison Square after rain which is a loan from the St. Louis Museum. But as the years go by he falls more and more under the spell of Winter, finding the warmest colors in the browns of Autumn woods relieved against a carpet of snow and loving to paint the endless variations of pink and red and pale blue and violet which result from sunlight slanting over snowbound roofs and slopes of cliff. Usually, but not always, he includes habitations in his snowscapes; but they are so burrowed in the snow that they suggest snug harbors, where man and beast wait in comfort for the change of the year.

Exceptional is "The Sentinel," a wintry landscape, which takes its name from a cedar tree of superb growth to the right of the road. Deep tracks of sleighs are the only traces of human beings; the shadows of these tracks are pale blue. The sky has clouds with golden edges; the distance is delightfully painted; the composition suggests a wide land of hills and woods. "Midwinter Moonlight," "Snow in the Catskills," "Christmas Eve," "Rosy Afterglow in Winter (cut by Mr. W. W. Boring) tell of his delight in studying the various tones the white carpet of Winter takes under the sun or moon.

"Our Lady of Snows," that name which Canadians have resented with little understanding of its complimentary force, has found a devotee in Mr. Harrison during that season when the term is most applicable. Here is a fine snowscape, "Ancient House Near Quebec," in which the blue waves of the St. Lawrence are set against the deep covering of white, and the red brick house glows richly in the white environment. Certain mooring posts on the embankment, painted a dull red, form pleasing spots in the snow, which repeat the color of the old house. "Night Scene in Quebec," with the sheer cliff to right and the river full of ice floes beyond; "The St. Lawrence from Quebec," "Quebec from the River," "Sunset in Canada," "The Lights of Quebec," and "Evening Light," which shows the slope of the plateau on which Quebec stands (cut by the Pennsylvania Academy of Fine Arts), prove that Mr. Harrison is as faithful to the old fortress of the French in Canada as Horatio Walker himself.

Nocturnes are not wanting. "The Hillside Farm" has a smoky violet horizon and a few stars above, while the farmhouse to the right on the country road gleams through the dusk. "Moonlight at Woodstock" has a blurred moon and trees that define themselves spectrally in the darkened distance. "Night" has clouds that show almost brilliant against a dark sky, while the white farmhouse has dull golden panes that pierce the shadows. In "The Hidden Moon" a fantastic cloud has snuffed out that luminary and rich red rays struggle with the white reflections on the edges of the cloud. "Roadside Inn by Moonlight" is a landscape muffled in snow. "Moonrise on Long Island," exceptionally not a snowy scene, has marsh and creek and reflections in the water.

MAUD HARRISON DEAD.

Maud Harrison, a noted actress in years gone by, was picked up on the floor of her apartment, at the Hotel Willard, in West Seventy-sixth Street, yesterday morning, in a comatose condition. She died at 3 o'clock in the afternoon without regaining consciousness. She was discovered by a maid shortly before 10 o'clock, stretched out on the floor near the telephone, in night attire, as though she had attempted some time in the night to communicate with the office of the hotel.

Dr. W. C. Cramp of 340 West End Avenue, whose office is near the hotel, was summoned and made a futile effort to revive the actress. The immediate cause of death, according to the physician, was paralysis.

Miss Harrison had been living at the hotel alone for six months, with the expectation of again taking up her theatrical work, which she had dropped five years ago. She left the stage to care for her mother, who was ill, and who died but a short time ago. A sister of Miss Harrison, Mrs. Joseph Hurd, who lives in Mount Vernon, could not be reached in time to arrive at the hotel before Miss Harrison expired.

Miss Harrison was a Christian Scientist, and though it was known at the hotel that she had not been feeling well for several days her friends say she did not consult a physician.

Maud Harrison was about 51 years old, distinguished in appearance and young for her years. Her last rôle was in "Naughty Anthony," produced in 1900 at the Herald Square Theatre by David Belasco. She intended to enter the company supporting Grace George in "Clothes," but gave up the part after a few rehearsals.

Miss Harrison began her career at the Madison Square Theatre under the late A. M. Palmer, appearing as a boy in "The Lights o' London." She was the first Mrs. Brown in Bronson Howard's "The Banker's Daughter," and appeared as the Queen when Annie Russell starred in "Elaine." She played in some famous productions. She was the first actress to appear in this country as Rosa Guerin in "A Parisian Romance" with Mansfield.

PIN IN HER APPENDIX.

When the surgeons in Flower Hospital operated last night on Mrs. Jennie Altenhoff, 50 years old, of 424 East Fifty-first Street, for appendicitis, they found in her appendix an ordinary pin. The surgeons believe that the pin had been in her body more than ten years. The operation was successful and she will recover.

False Fire Alarm Rung in from New College of Agriculture.

ITHACA, N. Y., April 28.—Cornell University students and the citizens of Ithaca were greatly excited to-night by an alarm of fire from the new State College of Agriculture dedicated by Gov. Hughes yesterday.

The students thronged to the scene 3,000 strong, accompanied by hundreds of town people. The Fire Department had a hard two-mile climb before the alarm was discovered to be false. Fire Chief Stoddard announced a reward of $100 for the detection of the sender of the alarm.

His resignation was his retirement from all business.

He was at one time a member of the Essex County Board of Freeholders, School Trustee in Livingston township for forty years, and a Justice of the Peace for thirty years. He was appointed an Assistant Revenue Collector in 1870. He was a Freemason and one of the founders of Livingston Grange, Patrons of Husbandry. He was a leader in the Roseland Presbyterian Church.

For a time he was connected with St. John's College, in Fordham, and later, in 1847, he entered the Society of Jesus. During his stay in Canada he kept in touch with Irish affairs, and was an eager worker for home rule.

Under his direction the school was greatly developed. Kenyon Cox and other well-known artists studied under him. Two years ago he retired, and has since lived with his family at Bensonhurst, L. I.

BOARDING SCHOOL LOOTED.

Police Arrest Five Persons and Recover $800 Worth of Stolen Property.

More than $800 worth of jewelry, silverware, and clothing was stolen from the boarding school of Mrs. E. B. Shaw at 3 West Eighty-first Street on Saturday night. Detectives of the West Sixty-eighth Street Station last night found all of the stolen property and arrested five persons, three of whom were employes at the school.

The prisoners, Richard Field and his wife, Rebecca, of 516 West Fifty-fifth Street, and the employes of the school, Ella Morris, 27; Charles Hilton, a negro janitor, and Israel Washington, the negro butler, were locked up on the charge of grand larceny.

When Mrs. Shaw returned from a theatre on Saturday night she found that several of the young women's rooms had been ransacked and a diamond brooch valued at $300 and silverware and clothing worth about $500 taken. She informed the West Sixty-eighth Street Police Station, and Detectives Devanney, Gerry, and Cahill later took the two colored men and the Morris woman to the station house.

After questioning the latter she was allowed to go. Detectives followed her, and it is alleged by the police that she sent the following telegram addressed to Rebecca Field, 516 West Fifty-fifth Street: "Dear Rebecca: Please call at house at once. Important."

Then the detectives went to the address in West Fifty-

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION — THE MARKETS OF EUROPE

THE FINANCIAL SITUATION.

Easing Foreign Money Markets. Stocks Marking Time.

With the movement of prices upon the Stock Exchange devoid of significance, owing to the narrowness and professional character of the trading in stocks, the attention of the financial community last week was naturally fixed upon the interesting and important changes in money market conditions in Europe, with the object of discovering what influence, if any, the week's developments there might possess over financial markets here. So far as the stock market is concerned it is evident that, in spite of momentary dashes in one direction or the other, it has not as yet found any real impetus for a sustained movement of any kind, and the chances are that no broad advance or recession in securities will occur until more is known regarding the probable answers to various fundamental questions, such as the crop return and the future of money markets. The week was made notable abroad by reductions in the discount rates of three great Government banks—those of the New Netherlands, Germany, and England. The rate of the first-named bank was raised to 6 per cent. a month or more ago upon the occasion of our bankers securing $1,000,000 gold in Holland for import. This engagement was not followed up, and the movement of exchange has been so averse to further undertakings of this kind on the part of America that the Dutch Bank has found it feasible to lower its rate to the old 5 per cent. figure. Germany for a year or more back has been undergoing expansion in trade and speculation comparable to that witnessed in our own country, and the attendant strain upon capital led to the imposition of a bank rate as high as 7 per cent., this being, however, lower than the rates prevailing here at the same time under like provocation. The Directors of the German Bank are obviously proceeding with great caution, last week's reduction having been only one-half of 1 per cent. to a 5½ per cent. rate. This means, of course, that while the money markets are making progress in the right direction it is necessarily slow, and the danger signs have not been wholly removed from the path. The Bank of England lowered its rate to 4 per cent., which compares with the high figure of 6 per cent. in force earlier in the year, and this is, from the American point of view, the most important of all the bank reductions. In the first place, it was made in spite of the fact that the Bank of France had expressed its intention of recalling all the gold advanced to London during the period of stringency in that city, and up to this time only some $2,000,000 of a total of $15,000,000 so advanced has been recalled. Again, the action of the Directors indicates that for the first time in many months they are satisfied that the threat of an American demand for gold has been removed. It is worth noting in passing that our bankers have had it within their power for some time past to take gold from London, and have indulged in a self-restraint for which we may expect to find no parallel when conditions are reversed. This is so in spite of the fact that the growing ease in money abroad, both in England and on the Continent, is due almost wholly to the benevolent offices of the United States Treasury.

The reduction of the English Bank rate in the face of a probable further demand for gold by Paris raises the interesting question, if the management of the bank does not hope, at least, that this French demand may be shifted to American shoulders. It is a fact, at any rate, that, with Paris exchange on London at its low point last week, and with demand sterling here at its high point, and exchange on Paris at the prevailing rate, the foreign exchange market was in such shape that one-quarter of 1 per cent. measured the ability of Paris to take gold in arbitration of exchange, presuming the Bank of France to have been willing to pay interest on the gold in transit, which it has almost always done. It will be seen, therefore, that exports of gold are by no means out of the question, and it might be added that several of our best informed bankers expect to see such a movement. Whether it would exceed the $12,000,000 or so which the Bank of France is apparently desirous of regaining, is, of course, a question, but, once started, an outflow of gold might be checked only by a sharp rise in money rates here. Rates for call money have been so low and so disproportionate to those for time funds as to create a suspicion that beneath the surface conditions are not so easy as they appear. As has already been pointed out, banking reserves all over the country are unusually low, two central reserve cities, St. Louis and Chicago, being a little below legal requirement in this respect. It is also a fact that, while quotations for nine and twelve months' money last week were reported as 5¼ @5½ per cent., banks were making loans of the best character for these periods at from 6@6½ per cent. A further indication of this anomaly is to be found in the much higher rates which railroads are compelled to pay upon equipment, trust, and ordinary notes.

Of developments outside of those concerning money markets, the week was rather barren, but sufficiently important to attract some attention, at least, was the report of the Minnesota committee conveyed to the Legislature, containing an estimate of the value per mile of railroads doing business in that State; the address of President Roosevelt at Jamestown, in which he again set forth his adherence to the "square deal" principle in the Administration's dealings with corporations; the dissolution of the Lake Shore 4 per cent. debenture syndicate through the return of practically all of the securities underwritten to syndicate members, and the offering of Westinghouse Electric stock to stockholders at a price above the market. The report of the Minnesota Commission contained estimates very much below those generally accepted of the value per mile of the roads of the State, and dwelt particularly upon the alleged gross overcapitalization of the Chicago Great Western. What bearing this report will have upon railroads and their rates is not yet clear, but it suggests, certainly, hasty and ill-advised legislation. The chief point of interest in Mr. Roosevelt's Jamestown speech from the point of view of the financial community was the direct assertion that the ashes of past corporation transactions will not be raked over. With this, however, goes a promise of extreme watchfulness for the future. The winding up of the Lake Shore syndicate called attention again to the poor results attending such transactions, even when, as in this case, excellent securities are involved. The apathy of the investing public is still too great for syndicate managers. In the offering of Westinghouse stock there is to be found, perhaps, an intimation of the future of the capital increases. Where formerly issues in new securities were offered to stockholders at prices giving to them handsome stock dividends, it now appears that from this time on such offerings will be so near market prices as to afford no such opportunities. The difficulty which the Great Northern met in increasing its capital, as well as the obvious dislike of State Legislatures and Railroad Commissions for bonuses of stock, suggest that the investor, as well as the speculator, may have to readjust his appraisals of any given security to the dividend or interest return thereon, excluding from the calculation the possibility of rights or bonuses of any kind.

LONDON CALM AGAIN.

New York Played Chief Role in Remarkable Financial Revolution.

LONDON TIMES—NEW YORK TIMES.
Special Cablegram.

Copyright, 1907, by THE NEW YORK TIMES CO.

LONDON, April 28.—The financial supplement of The Times to-morrow will say:

"On the surface, the aspect of monetary affairs is now as calm and unruffled as it was stormy and agitated a month ago. The completeness of the change is puzzling many observers, who point out that a remarkable monetary revolution of this kind ought to be reasonably explicable, and no reasonable explanation has yet been given.

"But, after all, during the late stringency it was obvious enough that New York's position and fear of its further developments were the most important causes of the general disquietude. Since then New York has improved its position by the simple but drastic process of knocking about one-third off the market value of the mass of securities it was carrying at home and abroad. The losses and readjustment have been met somehow, or smothered up, and this lightening of the financial burden has had an immediate effect, all the more marked because of the pause in financial business which resulted from the contemplation of the Wall Street avalanche.

"Money became abundant in New York, while in London the vast mass of American securities that had been carried was suddenly found to be enormously decreased, and a rise in United States exchange no longer made it necessary to fear gold withdrawals. Paris, which had had to take measures owing to the fear of what might happen in London and New York, was similarly reassured, and Berlin was enabled to take advantage of the relaxation in other centres by lowering the official rate.

"New York caused all the bother, and New York has disposed of it as far as it can be said to have been disposed of, whether finally or only by way of temporary relief remains doubtful."

RESERVE IN BERLIN.

The Reduction in the Bank Rate Made with Reluctance.

LONDON TIMES—NEW YORK TIMES.
Special Cablegram.

Copyright, 1907, by THE NEW YORK TIMES CO.

BERLIN, April 28.—There has been no material change in the Boerse during the past week. Reserve has continued on all sides. The general quiescence, combined with the recurrence of political alarms now and again has exercised a certain pressure.

Business in American railway shares has been restricted to very narrow limits. A slight relaxation in the strain on the money market which found expression in a reduction of the Bank rate to 5½ per cent. failed to exercise a lasting influence on the Boerse.

The Bank authorities appear to have consented to a reduction with the greatest reluctance. It is probable that the reduction is merely an experiment and does not proceed from a real conviction of its justification. The chief consideration probably is a desire to facilitate the placing of a new issue of Treasury bonds.

PARIS MARKETS DULL.

Foreign Monetary Improvement Fails to Stimulate Transactions.

LONDON TIMES—NEW YORK TIMES.
Special Cablegram.

PARIS, April 28.—Dullness and irregularity characterized the markets last week. The continued improvement in the monetary situation abroad failed to stimulate transactions, although it imparted steadiness to investment securities.

French rentes were quiet, but heavy, the disturbed condition of internal affairs causing many people to sell, and thus offset the support given by Government institutions, which have bought rentes largely for months.

Russians were strong. Spanish, Turkish, and South Americans were practically unchanged. Copper shares were firm under the lead of Rio Tintos. South Africans gained in activity and generally advanced in price.

BOSTON COPPER GOSSIP.

Interest in Tri-Mountain Suit—Bad Weather Curtails Lake Production.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, April 27.—The Street has been intensely interested in the quarrels of the copper magnates, Paine, Burrage, and Lawson in one group, and Bigelow and the Calumet & Hecla people in the other, and the litigation which has been in progress has drawn scores from ticker to courtroom. The sudden termination of Paine's suit against Burrage and Lawson arising out of the Tri-Mountain deal of 1903 has caused astonishment. The parties in interest have agreed to make no statement regarding the terms of settlement, but Mr. Paine is reported saying that Mr. Burrage paid substantially the Tri-Mountain indebtedness, which was $840,000.

Mr. Bigelow's action as a shareholder in Calumet & Hecla to restrain that company from acquiring his Osceola mine has been supplemented by a personal notice served upon the Directors of the big company that he will hold them personally responsible for any injury to Calumet & Hecla which may result from their action.

Activity by the Cole-Ryan people has been renewed in the lake district. The control of the Phenix Consolidated Copper Company has been acquired by their Keweenaw Copper Company, and the mine, which has been idle two years, is already being explored anew. The same interests are reported to be buying Superior and Pittsburg and it is likely that that stock will be listed by the Stock Exchange within a fortnight.

Weather conditions have operated to curtail the production at the lake this month, and some estimates of the reduction from March figures are as high as 10 per cent. The lateness of navigation has not delayed shipments, for all companies are using the all-rail routes, and Calumet & Hecla is actually shipping hot ore from its refining furnaces. No accumulation is in sight, observers say, anywhere.

Great activity is predicted as soon as the snow has left the ground. The Copper Range Company has diamond drills ready to begin exploration work on its lands west of the Champion, Baltic, and Tri-Mountain mines. The Lake Company is also prepared to begin a new shaft on the lode recently discovered. Mass Consolidated will open ground with a view to tapping the same lode.

Lack of men is reported from Michigan, as well as Arizona.

The April output of the Shannon mine is estimated at about 1,400,000 pounds, which will result in net earnings of $150,000. With the completion of the third furnace next week the company's output will be increased to nearly 2,000,000 pounds per month.

Arizona Commercial is shipping from 175 to 200 tons of ore daily from its Copper Hill properties, and is said to be earning $50,000 net per month from these shipments.

A strike of sulphide ore is reported from the Bonanza Belt mines in Cochise County, Arizona. The vein is said to be from six to twelve feet in width, and to show 9 per cent. copper and four ounces of silver to the ton.

Utah Apex stockholders have received this week a letter from President Hastings telling them of new contracts and heavy ore bodies.

Operating expenses are said to be more than met by the ore shipments from the Boston and Corbin mines.

COUNTRY'S BANK LOANS.

National Institutions Show Expansion of $72,000,000 in First Quarter.

The report of the National banks of the country at the date or the last call, giving their condition as of March 22, showed that in the interval between this and the previous call there was a large expansion in loans with a substantial decrease in the amount of cash held by the banks. In some quarters the inference was drawn that this contrary movement of loans and cash holdings reflected conditions peculiar to the present banking position. Comparison with the record for previous years indicated, however, that this increase in loans with a decrease in cash is usual during the first quarter of the year.

On March 22 the National banks of the country showed total loans of $4,535,844,008, an increase of $72,576,468, compared with the report of Jan. 26, this year, while the cash holdings on March 22 amounted to $641,153,633, a decrease of $39,282,971. The cash and loan movements corresponded closely with those of the previous year, not only in the country at large, but also in the several groups of States. The New England and Eastern States showed this year, as last, a falling off in loans, partly offsetting the increases in other States.

In the following table are shown in detail the loans and cash holdings on Jan. 26 and on March 22, this year, the changes during this period and the changes during the corresponding period in 1905, for the several sections of the country, and also the total figures for the corresponding dates in 1905:

Since the spring of 1904 loans have increased almost a round $1,000,000,000, while the cash holdings during this period have increased about $39,000,000.

GOVERNMENT BOND TAX.

Considerable interest was taken in the decision in the Iowa Government bond case handed down last week by the Supreme Court of the United States. The case was one growing out of the efforts of the State of Iowa to levy a tax on the United States bonds held as part of the assets of the State banks of Iowa. The banks held that as Government bonds were exempt from taxation the State must deduct any holdings of Government bonds from the amount of State bank assets against which taxes could be levied. The State held the contrary, and the matter was brought to the Supreme Court, which last week decided the case against the State of Iowa. The decision, while sustaining the principle that a State cannot tax a bank on Government bonds included in the bank's assets, does not, in the opinion of Government bond authorities, call for any change in the method of taxation of State banks in this State. The State of Iowa lost its case apparently on a technicality.

The clause of the Iowa law that came before the Supreme Court for review provided that the tax should be levied against the banks, and not against the individual stockholders in the banks. The Supreme Court has held that the holders of stock in a corporation cannot claim any partial exemption from taxes even though the corporation may have Government bonds among its assets, and that in leaving taxes on banks no deduction need be made for Government bonds held by the bank if the tax is levied against the stockholders, and not against the bank itself. This principle applies even when the tax is paid, as in this State, by the banks as the agents of the stockholders. In Iowa an attempt was made to tax the banks themselves, and this technically fell under the prohibition of the Federal statutes. It is not thought, therefore, that Government bond circles in this city that last week's decision of the Supreme Court in the Iowa case is likely to have any bearing on the New York State law fixing the tax on banks in this State at 1 per cent. of the capital and surplus of the banks.

TOLD ROUND THE TICKER.

JAMES J. HILL'S well-known fondness for a game of solitaire as a diversion after a day's work struggling with railroad problems has not left him since, nominally at least, he gave up his duties as President of the Great Northern Railway. He may still be found at the game if one seeks out the great railroad President a little before the dinner hour, and he may even continue his game while turning again to a serious discussion of some important subject. But as his interest in the discussion grows the cards are forgotten and the game, not more than half won, perhaps, is forgotten. Mr. Hill is loath to make a task of something he regards as an amusement. Tenacious as he is of his purpose in the real affairs of life, he does not carry the same persistency into the things he takes up for amusement. He finds enough real work to do to keep him from wanting to make work out of play.

BANK OFFICERS as well as Stock Exchange members are beginning to feel the relaxation that has followed the long months of activity in Wall Street, which were interrupted by the collapse in the market in March, since which time the Street has realized a sort of quiet that had been foreign to it for a long time. "I have just come back from spending two hours at lunch," said the head of one of the big National banks the other day to a caller. "That is the first time I have done that in two years. That shows how little we have to do these days, and I think it is about the same with all the Street. Wall Street just now is taking the rest cure."

J. P. MORGAN is probably the only New Yorker, at least south of the Park, who can boast of fruit trees in his front yard. His stately old house at the corner of Thirty-sixth Street and Madison Avenue stands on a terrace, waist-high above the pavement, and surrounded both on the side street and the avenue by a few yards of green lawn. In fact, the three houses which make up the Madison Avenue block front are all set some feet back from the stoop line, and each has its narrow strip of green. Mr. Morgan's plot has the added distinction of a species of magnolia at the corner, covered at this season with bright pink blooms, and on the other flank of the house front stand a cerry and a Bartlett pear tree. Passers-by on Madison Avenue during the Spring season get their view of the splendid white stone private art gallery built to the east of Mr. Morgan's house through the blossom-laden branches of the cherry. Later the scraggly little pear tree will put on its Spring white.

MERCANTILE MARINE'S YEAR.

Increase in Profits Greater Than Foreign Rivals.

The preliminary estimates of the receipts and expenses for 1906 submitted by the International Mercantile Marine Company in its application for listing on the Stock Exchange make possible a rough comparison of the affairs of the American Shipping Trust with those of the big German companies whose annual reports have already been published. Like its foreign rivals, the International Mercantile Marine showed the benefits in its earnings last year of the better understanding on rates, which came too late in the season of 1905 to make itself appreciably felt in the annual report of a year ago. Moreover, the increase in gross profits from the Atlantic trade lost nothing in the case of the American concern by reason of poor business in other directions, which operated against the final showing of the German companies whose returns were reduced by adverse conditions in other waters.

The gross voyage earnings of the International Mercantile Marine increased during 1906 by $3,374,027, rising to $36,809,539, and miscellaneous receipts, including interest and dividends on outside investments and trade agreements, brought the total income up to $37,896,070, compared with $33,362,918 in 1905. Expenses increased from $27,456,174, to $29,786,134, leaving net earnings at $8,109,936, against $5,906,744 in 1905. Net profits were $5,125,637, against $2,890,848 in 1905.

The Leyland and National Lines, in which the Mercantile Marine is a large stockholder, show estimated working profits for 1906 of $684,550 and $84,385 respectively.

Because of the difference in bookkeeping and the meagreness of the information supplied in the preliminary figures of the International Mercantile Marine, a comparison with the figures of the two big German lines for 1906 is difficult except in the broadest way. From the figures in the following table, in which the gross and net profits of the three companies for 1905 and 1906 are compared, it will be seen that the improvement in the showing of the International Mercantile Marine during the year was vastly greater than in the case of the North German Lloyd, while the Hamburg-America Line actually fell away from the showing of the previous year.

THE REDUCTIONS IN BANK RATES ABROAD

STILL HIGH FOR SEASON

Comparison of Present Rates of English and German Banks Shows That Rates Are Above Normal.

No fewer then three of the European bank rates were reduced last week, the Bank of England's rate from 4½ per cent. to 4 per cent., the Imperial Bank of Germany's rate from 6 per cent. to 5½ per cent., and the Bank of the Netherlands' rate from 5½ per cent. to 5 per cent. Coincidently, time money rates here in New York declined from the previous week's maximum of 5½ per cent. for six months loans to about 4¾ per cent. These movements illustrate strikingly the present world-wide tendency toward lower interest rates.

The rates established last week represent a total reduction from the highest rates reached during the last quarter of 1906 of 2 per cent. by the Bank of England, 1½ per cent. by the Bank of Germany, and of 2¼ per cent. in the New York rate for six months' loans, while the reduction in the rate of the Bank of the Netherlands is a recession of 1 per cent. from the rate established this Spring following the engagement of gold in Holland for import to New York. The rate was then advanced to 6 per cent. after the bank had got through the last quarter of 1906, and the turn of the year without establishing a higher rate than 5 per cent. On April 15 the rate was reduced from 6 per cent. to 5½ per cent., and last week to 5 per cent.

To what extent the general position of the Bank of England has improved since the dates on which its recent maximum rate was established is indicated by a comparison of the chief items in last week's statement with those reported on Oct. 18, the day before the English rate was raised to 6 per cent. The Bank of England has so improved its position that, although loans during this period have increased by £5,760,801, the reserves have been strengthened by £7,042,040, so that the proportion of reserves to liabilities has increased from 37¾ per cent. in October to 45⅜ per cent. on April 25, 1907. The figures compare as follows:

BANK OF ENGLAND.

	Oct. 19, 1906.	Apr. 25, 1907.	Increase.

It is made clear, however, by a comparison of the present rates of the English and German banks with those that have prevailed at this season in other years that even after last week's reductions the rates are higher than in past years. The German rate is the highest at this season in any year, at least as far back as 1901, while the English rate has been as high as now only once in the past five years. How rates have stood in recent years at the close of April is shown by the following table:

ENGLISH BANK RATE AT END OF APRIL.

1906	3½	1901	4
1905	2½	1900	4
1904	3	1899	3
1903	4	1898	4

GERMAN BANK RATE AT END OF APRIL.

1907	5½	1904	4
1906	5	1903	3½
1905	3	1902	3

1907	4¾	1902	4 -4¾
1906	5½-6	1901	4½
1905	3½	1900	3½-4
1904	3½-3¾	1899	3¾-4
1903	4½-4¾

It will be seen that with the exception of last year, when the rate was about 1 per cent. higher than now, the present rate is higher than at the end of April in any recent year.

Planchetts, or small pieces of colored fibre, are interwoven in our new security paper, like the silk thread in bank notes.

Ordinarily these planchetts appear delicate in tone and color. Held to the light they look almost black. Consequently they cannot be imitated by drawing, painting, or any other method used to imitate the silk fibre.

This paper is made for our sole use by permission of the United States, at the Crane Mills, where paper for government bank notes is prepared.

STATE VALUATION OF RAILROADS

Minnesota Takes Initiative in Effort to Determine Their Actual Value.

GREAT WESTERN'S DECLINE

Follows Sundberg Committee's Estimate of Value of Stickney Line.

The report of the Sundberg Committee of the Minnesota State Senate, despite the apparent indifference with which its findings were viewed by the railroads, is likely to take a more or less prominent place in the record of the movement for State and National valuation of railroad property, and for that reason was received with considerable interest by the financial community. That the conclusions reached by the committee were not entirely ignored by the stock market seems the only conclusion that can be drawn from the sudden decline in the securities of the Chicago Great Western, which took place almost immediately upon the publication of the report, the preferred A stock dropping 8 points and the debentures 2 points.

President A. B. Stickney, the brief outline of the report which has reached this city would seem to indicate, was made to bear the brunt of the committee's criticism of railroad capitalization within the State of Minnesota. He was charged by the committee with having "Harrimanized" the Great Western, and while decreasing its mileage to have increased its capital obligations many fold. The committee set a value of about $28,000 a mile on the Great Western's line against a capitalization of $143,668 a mile, and estimated the net earnings of the road at 7 per cent. on the valuation as fixed by the committee, or of about 1½ per cent. on the road's total capitalization.

That the Sundberg Committee did not regard its work as definitely settling the question of the value of railroad property in Minnesota is indicated by the fact that its report recommended the appointment of a special committee of three to investigate generally the capitalization of the railroads of the State and the relations the stocks and bonds bear to the value of the roads, and suggest its method of determining the value of the railroads, the committee states, consisted in establishing the cost of reconstructing and equipping the railroads in Minnesota in their present condition. To establish this cost, the committee states that it considered "first the original cost of construction, second the cost of improvements, third the cost and character of the lines recently built," and in addition the expense of operating and the earnings under existing rates, the stocks and bonds and the value and water thereof, and the geography of the line and the judgment displayed in its location.

The conclusion which the committee reached in this way regarding the value of a half dozen of the lines in Minnesota is indicated by this summary of the committee's findings, which gives the capitalization per mile as stated by the committee, the value per mile allowed each road and the percentage which the committee estimates is being earned on the value fixed by the committee:

	Capitalization Per Mile.	Value Per Mile.	Earned on Committee's Valuation. Per Ct.
Chi. Great West.	$143,668	$28,000	7
St. Paul	32,674	29,000	16¼
Great Northern	89,000	83,000	16½
Northern Pacific	80,000	85,000	12½

Railroad men who discussed the report of the committee last week were practically unanimous in the assertion that if the cost of replacing the railroads were to be taken as the measure of their value it would be impossible to reconstruct and re-equip the lines at anything like the figures named by the Sundberg Committee. Moreover, the representatives of the railroads point out that quite apart from what may be the cost of reproducing the railroads, the lines, as they stand to-day, represent the expenditure of vast sums that have legitimately been added to the capitalization of the roads, even though these expenses would not necessarily have to be reincurred were the line to be rebuilt.

It is claimed by the railroads, however, that apart from all such considerations the railroads of the country as a whole as they stand to-day could not be duplicated for the par value of the stocks and bonds that are outstanding against them. The question has frequently been asked in this connection by railroad officials, What would it cost to replace the terminals in the large cities, not to count the real estate owned by the railroads in the smaller towns and elsewhere along their lines? If another railroad were to undertake to-day to gain entrance into New York City and to duplicate, say, the terminals of the New York Central and its line into the city, what would it cost? An indication of the cost of such an undertaking is found in the money which the Pennsylvania Railroad has devoted to the accomplishment of this very purpose which is costing that road an amount estimated at about $100,000,000, the equivalent of an expenditure of $20,000 a mile for the entire length of a line 5,000 miles long.

HOW BANKS GUARD AGAINST DOUGLASES

Funds and Securities of Banks and Trust Companies Are Frequently Examined.

NOT SO WITH TRUST FUNDS

Effort to Bring This Branch of Trust Company Business Under the Banking Department.

Bank and trust company officers owe some thanks to William O. Douglas, the dishonest bond clerk of the Trust Company of America, for timing the exposure of his thefts of the securities under his charge at just this period of the year. April and October are the two months when the State banking authorities require the institutions in their jurisdiction to make an actual physical checking up of all their funds and securities, and the Spring examination had already been made by a large proportion of the State banking institutions, in this city, at least. Every bank officer had no doubt, in reading of the Trust Company of America's trouble, supreme confidence that no such thing could have happened in his own concern under his watchful eyes, but since the abstraction of funds or securities by trusted men is the one hazard which admittedly cannot be absolutely eliminated, the April checking up has put officials in the comfortable position of certainty in regard to their funds and securities, without the expense and trouble of an additional examination. The law which requires State banks and trust companies to make physical examination of their cash and securities has been carefully framed to provide against any dishonesty in the checking up itself.

Neither the President nor any executive officer of the institution may be a member of the examining committee, and the work of checking up may be done, as it most often is, by properly accredited accountants. None of the employes are allowed to participate in the checking up of the particular funds or securities which it is their business to handle, and to prevent collusion, the securities themselves are handled, in making comparison with the card index on which in modern banks members of the committee.

In addition to these semi-annual examinations made by the bank officials, the State Bank Examiners twice a year make unheralded descent upon the banks and trust companies, seal up the vaults, and proceed to go over the cash and paper item by item.

There is a branch of the business of trust companies, however, which does not come under the supervision of the State Banking Department. That is the administration of trusts. The funds and securities deposited in trust are under the charge of the courts and can only be got at by a properly accredited agent armed with an order of the court. Examinations of these trusts are not made with periodical regularity, and the seal of the court is at present practically the only guarantee of their security. Superintendent Keep of the State Banking Department has taken cognizance of this state of affairs and has been at work for some time formulating a plan by which his department will be given authority to examine these trust securities, as well as the other paper of the trust companies. These trust securities mount up in the aggregate to enormous figures, and no consistent examination of them throughout the State has been made for the past eleven years.

With the National banks the situation is somewhat different. There is no examination required by the committee of the Directors, but the National Bank Examiners make periodical descent upon the National institutions in the same way that the State Examiners deal with the State banks and trust companies. This examination is an ardnous and lengthy process. In going through the affairs of a big National bank four or five Bank Examiners are kept busy from 9 o'clock in the morning until late at night. They arrive unexpectedly before the vaults open in the morning, and, after supervising the taking out of the cash and securities required in the day's work and checking these items up as they leave the vaults, they put the Government seat on the various strong boxes where the securities are kept and carefully check up the entire list without the aid of anybody connected with the bank.

The Douglas incident has brought up again the whole question of safeguarding collateral and funds, and it is promised that at the next meeting of the New York Chapter of the American Banking Association the question will be thoroughly gone into, with the idea of throwing further security around the strong boxes of the banks.

There is one solution of the problem which suggests itself every time a new peculation comes to light; that is, more frequent unofficial examinations by the bank officers, but this suggestion is not regarded as feasible by the majority of banking men, because of the immense amount of labor and inconvenience involved.

AUTOISTS IN DOUBT ABOUT CUP EVENT

Rumors Afloat That Touring Car Races May Be Only Big Contests This Year.

NO WORD FROM COMMITTEE

Constructive Work Abandoned on Several Prospective Entries—Difficulty in Framing Rules.

What effect will the big touring car races that have been proposed for the Long Island Motor Parkway have in the near future upon the Vanderbilt Cup race? This has been a question that has been asked and discussed with considerable interest within the last month, both by owners and dealers. In some cases the very radical view has been taken that, owing to the increasing demand for serviceable touring cars and the consequent attention paid to their manufacture, these events for stock cars will, in the near future, usurp the interest in the higher powered speed event to such an extent that the Vanderbilt Cup may, like the Gordon Bennett Cup in France, be placed upon the shelf.

This view of the future of motor racing in America is perhaps intensified at the present time on account of the lack of information that has been vouchsafed by the American Automobile Association Racing Board regarding even the ordinary facts of the coming race. The long-continued delay has naturally led to a sentiment in many quarters that the Vanderbilt Cup race may be abandoned this year, touring car events taking its place, but with the completion of the fifty or sixty mile speedway next year the big cup race may then be revived with customary enthusiasm.

To all inquiries made to Jefferson De Mont Thompson of the A. A. A. Racing Board and other officials who have talked with William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., on the subject since the latter's return from abroad, the reply has invariably been made that the cup race was sure to be held, and that within a few days everything would be known. The rules for the contest this year, it is admitted, have given the committee some difficulty, for with the old regulations entirely upset abroad in all of the big events, some alterations are absolutely needed here. Official copies of all the foreign racing rules have been in possession of the Racing Board for over a month. Granting that this difficulty on rules may have entailed some time to arrange satisfactorily, it has nevertheless caused no little surprise in motor circles that the A. A. A. has not, at least, made some public statement as to whether there would be a Vanderbilt cup race or not in 1907, and if so, fixing a tentative time for the closing of entries.

This delay to furnish some definite information has led in more than one case to the cessation of all work on projected racing cars that were to be entered by American manufacturers. The American Mors and the Lozier cars, which had been announced as probable entries, have been retired, and it was stated last week that no effort would probably be made to complete the new Oldsmobile racer that was said to be under construction early in the year for the big event. Work on the new Apperson racer was also stopped some time ago.

The prospects of the cup race will be discussed to-day at the meeting of the A. A. A. Executive Committee, and it is barely possible that some statement may be made regarding the prospects of the race this year.

Automobile Notes of Interest.

The Pittsburg Automobile Club will be represented in the American Automobile Association's tour for the Glidden Cup by Philip S. Flinn, Thomas P. Jonee, W. N. Murray, Glenn T. Brokaw, Joseph A. Moore, John Johnson, and E. D. Nevin.

Philip S. Flinn of the Pittsburg Automobile Club has resigned as a Director of the American Automobile Association, and his place will probably he filled by Paul Wolfe, Secretary of the Pennsylvania Motor Federation. Mr. Flinn will remain as a member of the Racing and Touring Boards.

Progress on the two Dragon racers which are being built for the Vanderbilt Cup race is being reported daily. It is expected that they will be ready on schedule time, May 15, which is the date set for the completion of the tests on the finished engines. July 1 is the date arranged when cars will be running on the road, and the company is now giving considerable thought to the matter of drivers for these cars, but as yet no selections have been made.

Statistics from abroad regarding the equipment of cars to compete in the Grand Prix in France show that every car except one will be equipped with shock absorbers, which are considered so essential to success in racing, just as they are conducive to safety and comfort in touring.

The Robert Bosch Company is about to move to its new quarters at 160 West Fifty-sixth Street, a step rendered necessary by the increasing business. Additional machinery is being installed for the manufacture of Boech magnetos in the United States. Ae every part of the magneto will be made here, it will conform to the rules of the Vanderbilt Cup Commission, and can therefore be used on cars entered by American manufacturers.

Work was started a short time ago on the new building for the E. R. Thomas Motor Company, at Buffalo. It will be 208 feet in length, 60 feet in width, four stories in height, with a total floor space of 49,840 feet, and will be built of concrete and steel. With this addition the total floor space used by the company will be 350,000 square feet. Last year two other buildings of steel and concrete were added to the factories.

Mohawk A. C. Roller Skating Race.

The Mohawk Athletic Club will hold a closed one-mile handicap roller skating race at the Clermont Rink, Brooklyn, to-morrow night. After the race J. J. Jordan will skate a three-mile exhibition against time, paced by three members of the club.

PREPARED AND QUICKERED LIME — PARACON For Finishing PEERLESS For Scratch, Browning and Cement Mortar.

No other Lime can be compared to this for
QUALITY, ECONOMY, and SPEED IN WORKING.
STRONGER than lump Lime, because all impurities are removed in the process of refining and hydrating.
MORE ECONOMICAL than lump lime, because it not only sells at a lower price, but makes more and better mortar, requires less calcined plaster, spreads over a greater surface, takes less trowelling, and effects an IMMENSE SAVING OF TIME, for it
REQUIRES NO SLAKING, but is ready, when mixed with water and sand, for immediate use, and
WORKING FREELY UNDER THE TROWEL, can be applied more quickly
GUARANTEED NOT TO PIT OR BLISTER on the walls.
Can be mixed on the upper floors of tall buildings and applied to the walls immediately.
GREATLY IMPROVES CEMENT MORTAR by making it denser and stronger, smoother, and very much easier to work, and waterproof.
GOES 20% FARTHER than any other hydrated lime.
WILL NOT AIR SLACK OR SPOIL, even though kept for years before using.
WILL NOT HEAT, SWELL, OR CAKE IF WET; water just limbers it up. Put up in barrels, cloth, and tough paper sacks.
PROMPT DELIVERIES. ATTRACTIVE PRICES.

The County Seat of Nassau

MINEOLA

Greatest Railroad Center In Nassau

At no time in the year does the country look so beautiful and so enchanting as in the Spring, and if you want to see a magic country where hundreds of houses are building and thousands of people are migrating, take a train on Saturday or Sunday at our expense and visit the territory of Mineola.

You Have Read Where and How Fortunes Were Made.

You believed these advertisements were simply dreams created in the minds of visionary real estate men. But evidence and facts have proved to you that the County of Queens has made fortunes for men during the year 1906.

There Are Greater Chances To-Day Than Last Year.

And if you will only shake off suspicion and get speculative and take advantage of an excursion and go and look the ground over you can readily see there is a lot of money waiting on every corner in Mineola for the investor.

WHY?

BECAUSE IT IS THE COUNTY SEAT.
BECAUSE IT IS A RAILROAD CENTER.
BECAUSE IT IS THE CENTER OF TROLLEYS.
BECAUSE IT IS THE AGRICULTURAL CENTER.
BECAUSE LAND IS CHEAPER THAN ELSEWHERE.

WHY?

YOU CAN'T MAKE A MISTAKE. IN 3 YEARS YOU WILL DOUBLE YOUR MONEY.

TEN MORE SUBWAYS NEEDED, RICE SAYS

All of the Four-Track Kind to Care for Traffic Increase of Next Decade

AND NOTHING NOW PLANNED

Portentous Figures of Serious Conditions Especially in Manhattan and the Bronx.

The report of Chief Engineer George S. Rice of the Rapid Transit Commission, which will soon be made public as part of the report of the commission, will contain figures regarding the daily carriage of passengers on all transit lines in this city and on the remarkable increase of population and traffic, which will strongly emphasize the seriousness of the transit situation due to the refusal of the Interborough to bid on the new subways and the failure of independent bidders to appear.

According to Mr. Rice's figures, the population of the Boroughs of Manhattan and the Bronx alone, in 1916, will be not less than 3,170,000, and the total number of passengers in the two boroughs which will have to be carried during that year will reach the enormous total of 1,626,000,000, or 4,454,800 a day! The total facilities, subway, elevated, and surface, of the city under the conditions that prevail to-day is 818,273,413.

Mr. Rice draws six important conclusions as the result of his investigation and statistics compiled from present ticket sales and population estimates. They are:

That the population of Greater New York has practically doubled itself every twenty-five years, and will probably double itself again by 1930.

That the total paid passenger traffic is increasing at such a rate that it will probably about double itself within the next decade.

That in order to bring about the discontinuance of the overcrowding and indecent conditions now prevailing on all transportation lines in Greater New York, it is imperative that the following additional subways be constructed and put in operation.

A Big Job Ahead.

Within the next five years, or by 1911, as follows: For Brooklyn, two four-track subways, in which ten-car trains can be operated, providing for eight additional tracks crossing the East River either in tunnels or on bridges, and traversing the borough. For Manhattan and the Bronx, three four-track subways, for operating ten-car trains, traversing the two boroughs.

With the second five years, or by 1916, as follows: For Brooklyn, two more four-track subways. For Manhattan and the Bronx, three more four-track subways.

Or, within the next decade altogether, for Manhattan, Bronx, and Brooklyn, ten four-track subways.

For four years, in the greater city, Mr. Rice, says, the increase in the passenger traffic has been about the same each year, except last year. The average had been about 63,000,000 passengers a year, but the increase last year jumped to 110,000,000, supposedly on account of an increase in the population invited by the opening of the subway. After thoroughly discussing the increase in population, Mr. Rice takes up each borough separately.

He finds that in Richmond, where 8,957,414 passengers were carried on the surface lines in 1906; and 6,614,457 on the steam roads, a daily average of 43,000, there should be in 1916 26,000,000 to be carried. The transportation problem there, however, can be taken care of by an extension of the tracks of the present lines.

Conditions in Queens are similar to those in Richmond, Mr. Rice finds. To handle the traffic increase, however, only an increase in car mileage is necessary, and to take care of the travel from Queens to Manhattan, about 60 per cent. of the total, there is the new Blackwell's Island Bridge and the Belmont Tunnel, which should prove ample.

Elevated lines	125,221,831
Surface lines	264,333,194
Total	389,555,025
Daily average	1,067,000

As showing the way in which the B. R. T. keeps pace with the increase, Mr. Rice's report can be quoted as saying that while the number of surface riders increased 27 per cent. between 1901 and 1906, the amount of single track operated has increased only 2 per cent. and the car mileage only 11 per cent. On the elevated, during the same time the traffic increase has been nearly 100 per cent.; the increased car mileage less than 60 per cent., and the trackage increase about 11 per cent. In 1916 the surface lines will have to carry 140,000 passengers an hour, and the total capacity of all roads now is 280,000,000 for a year, while 560,000,000 will have to be taken care of in 1911, while in 1916 the number will have increased to 800,000,000, judging from past increases. This leaves 280,000,000 to be provided for in five years, and 520,000,000 within ten years. These figures contemplate moderate crowding in rush hours and not "a seat for every one."

The Bronx had a population of 288,417 last year, an increase of 38 per cent. In five years. The increase in car mileage for the same period was less than 27 per cent. though the traffic had increased 39 per cent. Mr. Rice thinks that increased car mileage, or additional cars, or both, can take care of the increase in that borough. In 1911 42,000,000 passengers will have to be carried, and in 1916, 57,000,000.

The Problem in Manhattan.

It is to Manhattan that Mr. Rice gives by far the most attention. It had a population of 2,167,585 last year, an increase of 15 per cent. in five years, and the traffic, on all lines had increased 39 per cent. during the same period, though the latter increase had not been uniform in each year.

In the last five years the number of long distance passengers riding in Manhattan has increased 108 per cent. This increase, however, is not likely to be maintained. As the Bronx and Manhattan traffic are closely identified, Mr. Rice considers them together in closing his report. He says:

The population of Manhattan and the Bronx has been estimated at 2,436,002 for the fiscal year of 1909. It will probably be about 2,740,000 in 1911 and 3,170,000 in 1916. The total paid passenger traffic for the last five fiscal years has increased about 41 per cent., to 818,273,413 per year, or an average of about 2,242,000 per day.

At the 41 per cent. rate of increase for five-year periods, the total traffic in Manhattan and the Bronx will be about 1,153,000,000 in 1911 and 1,626,000,000 in 1916, daily averages of 3,131,000 and 4,454,000. Transportation must be provided for the rush-hour conditions, or maximum number carried in one hour in one direction. The capacity of the existing elevated and subway roads, based on such conditions, if all passengers are to have seats, is not far from 200,000,000 per year.

Enormous Growth of Traffic.

Deducting the estimated capacity of the existing elevated and subway lines from the total estimated traffic to be taken care of in 1911 and 1916, we have either, when seats are furnished, 492,000,000 and 921,000,000, or, with moderate crowding, 392,000,000 and 821,000,000 passengers, respectively, for whom transportation must be provided in new subways yet to be constructed.

Under moderate crowding, two additional subways must be completed within five years and six within ten years. If seats are to be provided, three additional four-track subways will have to be put in operation within the next five years and three more within a decade, in order that the inhabitants of Manhattan and the Bronx may be transported to and from their daily business in comfort and decency.

Approximately 39,000,000 persons passed through the Brooklyn Bridge station during the year, exclusive of those passing from one train to another. At this station, on the busiest day, December 8 76,887 tickets were sold.

BIG STANDARD OIL TRANSFER.

Companies Sued in Ohio Engage in a Tank Farms Deal.

LIMA, Ohio, April 28.—Following the adjournment of the Circuit Court last week without passing upon the ouster suits brought by Attorney General Ellis against the three subsidiery companies of the Standard Oil Company, there was recorded yesterday a transfer of important holdings by one of those companies to another.

Big tank farms owned by the Buckeye Pipe Line Company were turned over to the Ohio Oil Company, and, according to the transfer papers, a large consideration was involved.

POLICEMAN SHOT PURSUING ROWDY

Assailant a Little Man Who Used Revolvers and Brass Knuckles.

VICTIM LIKELY TO DIE

Mob with a Boy Leader Runs Down the Man Who Attacked Him on East Side.

A diminutive specimen of a man, perhaps four feet five inches tall and weighing less than 100 pounds, set forth yesterday afternoon, carrying a battery of two heavy revolvers and the additional armament of brass knuckles, and created a short "reign of terror" on the East Side at Seventy-eighth Street and Second Avenue. He first bore down upon and knocked out an Italian fruit vendor and his wife; then, when capture seemed imminent, drew his two revolvers and shot Patrolman Walter Thompson, probably mortally wounding him.

Leaving the policeman where he lay, stunned from the impact of the bullet, the little man turned, and, with a mob at his back, ran into the tenement house at 323 East Seventy-eighth Street, edged his way along the roofs of two houses, clambered down a fire escape and entered the cellar of No. 327, then fled through an alley into Second Avenue and started North.

At Eightieth Street he was captured after a hard fight by Policemen Short and Sheehan, who locked him up in the East Sixty-seventh street station.

On his way to the station a mob of 500 residents of the tenement district tried to take the prisoner from his captors. Had it not been for a dozen policemen he would have been roughly handled. The cries of the mob followed the prisoner and the police into the station.

Small Boy Leads the Chase.

It was August Matthias, a small boy, of 420 East Seventy-seventh Street, who led the chase after the little man with the arsenal, and who finally caused his capture. Incidentally the Matthias boy was nearly hit by one of the flying bullets.

The trouble started when four rough-looking men stopped at the northwest corner of Seventy-seventh Street and Second Avenue. On that corner is the fruit stand of Vilalo Bancho and Maria, his wife. Bancho says that the little man took a cocoanut and started to make off with it.

Bancho became angry and told the pilferer in broken English what he thought of his street manners. The latter is said to have promptly slipped his fingers through a pair of brass knuckles and landed on Bancho's face, splitting it from crown to chin, flooring the Italian. Other members of the quartet are said to have kicked the prostrate Bencho.

The fruit vendor's wife screamed and tried to interfere. The disturber, who by this time had taken off the brass knuckles, dealt her a blow in the face, knocking her down.

Pursuing Policeman Shot.

The four men started then to run. Policeman Thompson, a veteran of the East Sixty-seventh Street Station, and well known in the district, heard Mrs. Bancho's cries for help, and gave chase to the four roughs. The little man was nearest to him, and suddenly turned and drew his revolvers. As he aimed at Thompson the latter ducked his head. It was just in time to escape a bullet, which whizzed over him and flattened out against the wall of a house near by. Before Thompson could regain a standing posture, the little man fired again, the bullet entering the policeman's right shoulder and passing downward through his back.

As he fell Thompson stumbled against Freddie Newberg, a boy, of 240 East Seventy-eighth Street. August Matthias, who had followed at the heels of the policeman, felt the breeze and heard the hum of the first bullet as it grazed his head.

Lad Points the Trail.

"Come on. There goes the murderer!" cried the Matthias boy, and a dozen residents of the block followed the lad into No. 323. They went to the roof and saw where the fugitive had broken through a skylight. Through this Matthias crawled, but found no signs of the man. An open skylight on the top of the adjoining house at No. 327 then showed the route he had taken.

August Matthias and his followers descended, went through this skylight, and from a lodger in the house learned that the little man had crawled out upon the fire escape, had crept through a cellar door, but had again emerged and disappeared in the maze of alleys and back yards.

Matthias started throughout the alleys, reached Second Avenue, and turned north. Far up the street he saw the fugitive going at top speed. Policemen Short and Sheehan were within call. "There he is!" yelled Matthias. "He's just killed a policeman."

"Hush! Not so loud," whispered Sheehan. The little man had not heard the boy's alarm. The two policemen, running on their toes, began to close up the gap. As they neared him the quarry turned his head and saw them. His hand went to his pocket, but before he could draw a revolver they were upon him.

The Fugitive Captured.

There was a hard scuffle, but in another instant Sheehan was sitting on the chest of the prisoner, while Short slipped the handcuffs over his wrists.

A search disclosed the two revolvers and the brass knuckles, also a harmless harmonica. At the station house he gave his name as John Smith and his address as 348 East Seventy-eighth Street. Neither is believed to be correct, for inquiry at the Seventy-eighth Street house brought no information of such a man. The prisoner said he was 24 years old and a wagon driver.

While the chase over rooftops and through alleys was in progress, the wounded policeman was carried into a drug store at Second Avenue and Seventy-ninth Street by William Hermann of 823 Seventy-ninth Street. Thompson had become conscious then.

"Don't tell my wife," he said when Capt. Shire of the East Sixty-seventh Street Station arrived. "It would only worry her. I don't want her to know about this. If I'm not home she will think I have a case in court."

So Mrs. Thompson, whose home is at 182 East End Avenue, has not been notified.

Capt. Shire Shows His Emotion.

Thompson was taken to the Presbyterian Hospital, where Coroner Shrady took his ante-mortem statement late yesterday afternoon. The physicians there say that Thompson has a chance to recover, the greatest danger being that the bullet, in its downward course, struck some of the vital nerves of the spinal column.

Thompson had been looking forward to the police parade. He has not missed one since he went on the force eighteen years ago. Capt. Shire, who is very fond of Thompson, shed tears when the prisoner was arraigned before the station desk.

"This shooting of policemen must stop," said Capt. Shire when he was able to control his emotion. "It is getting entirely too frequent. An example should be made which will put a stop to this."

It was just two weeks ago yesterday afternoon that two other policemen were shot down in the performance of their duty on the west side and killed.

Two men who are supposed to have been with "John Smith" were arrested last night by Policemen Sheehan and Short. The prisoners said they were Joseph Larkin, 21 years old, a laborer, living at 1,414 Avenue A, and Frank Connelly, 38 years old, of 419 East Eighteenth Street. Bancho, the fruit vendor, identified both men. The police say that Larkin is an ex-convict.

AMERICAN SPEAKS NO ENGLISH

Guiseppe Hamilton Back to Birthplace After Sixty-four Years.

Gray bearded and grizzled with age, Giuseppe Hamilton stood on the deck of the new Italian liner Re d'Italia and looked upon his native land for the first time in sixty-four years. As the vessel swung past the Statue of Liberty the old man quietly took off his hat, a mute salute to the land in which he had been born and in which his father had lived and died.

When the vessel reached her pier in Jersey City, and the steerage passengers who were citizens of this country were called before the Immigration Inspectors to be allowed to land without the formality of passing through Ellis Island, the old man was among them. When it came his turn to prove his right to land the man was asked by the Inspector, "Where are your papers?" He shook his head and replied in Italian: "I do not understand English."

This was more than the inspector could understand, and through an interpreter the old fellow was questioned. He declared that he had been born here and had never become a subject of another country. In support of this he brought out a much worn and crumpled paper, which showed that Giuseppe Hamilton, the son of John Hamilton and Marie Fagnani, had been baptized in Ohio seventy-four years ago. He had also the marriage record of his parents.

Hamilton, a stranger in the land of his birth, comes here in order to visit, before he dies, the State where he was born and in which his father died. According to the story he told through an interpreter, his father, John Hamilton, a New Englander, married his mother, a newly arrived Italian woman, in Massachusetts, and together they traveled overland to Ohio, settling near where Alliance now stands.

The husband was a farmer, and he meant to make a home for his bride in what was then a wild country. They had been there but three years when Giuseppe was born, and so named after his mother's father.

For a number of years things prospered, and then the elder Hamilton sickened and died. After his death Mrs. Hamilton came East, and after a short stay in New York decided to take her son and go home to Italy to live with her relatives. So young Giuseppe, then nearly ten years old, went away from the country of his birth to grow up in Italy.

He worked in a vineyard after a brief stay in a village school. His mother died five years after she went home, and the lad grew up in the home of an uncle. In time he forgot the language of his native land and became an Italian in all save his last name and the sentiment which made him always declare proudly that he was an American and that some time he would go back to the land of his father. Fortune did not come to him swiftly in the wine business, and every year he would say to himself: "Within five years I will have enough money to return to America." But every year still saw him far from the goal of his ambition. Still he saved and waited. In middle age came a measure of success, but something was always in the way of his returning.

Last year the old man, now 74 years old, made up his mind that the time had come for his long-contemplated visit here.

"I said that in the Spring I would come," he said, "and now I am here. All is strange to me, but, after all, this is my country, and I feel proud of it. I am an American, though I cannot speak the language. My heart has always been here, and eagerly have I looked forward to this coming through all the years."

Hamilton succeeded in convincing the Inspectors that his rights to citizenship were good, and he was allowed to land. He left the pier, declaring that he would remain but a few hours in New York before taking a train for the West, and that he had more than enough funds for his contemplated journey.

DOUBLE SUICIDE AVERTED.

When Wife Wouldn't Agree to Die Dying Man Used Knife on Both.

Jacob Copperman and his wife sat facing each other in their bare, cheerless rooms at 270 Broome Street yesterday afternoon. The light of hope had long ago gone out of his eyes. The two-year-old baby in the next room was crying weakly for food which they were unable to give it. The last morsel had been eaten twenty-four hours before. Copperman was dying of consumption.

"Let us die together," said Copperman. "It was never so bad as this in Russia," sighed.

"No," the wife said. "The baby—we must live for the baby."

Copperman broke out into a torrent of his native tongue to convince his wife that they should both commit suicide.

There were no heroics in the wife's refusal. She fought back with the declaration that though everything seemed lost they should at least live for their child. "I don't die," she said.

Mrs. Copperman had indeed nothing to live for save the baby. She and her husband came from Odessa three years ago. He had been long out of work owing to his illness, but she had supported the three by working out. A month ago she, too, lost her place, and what money they had was soon spent, and on Saturday he ate last morsel. She went without. Rent day was only three days away.

Early yesterday morning the husband made the suicide proposal, but the wife refused to talk to him about it, but in the afternoon he became so persistent she sat down facing him in an effort to disabuse him of his mad plan to end it all.

When the wife persistently refused he drew a small knife from his pocket, and, grabbing his wife by the throat, cut her in the breast and neck.

Neighbors broke open the door and seized Copperman. He got away and jabbed himself several times in the neck, but was quickly disarmed. He was locked up in the Eldridge Street Station. Had he not been weakened by his illness it is believed he would have succeeded in his attempt. The hungry wife and child were cared for by the hospital surgeon and police.

MAY END LIGHTING STRIKE.

Men Expected to Reach an Agreement with the Welsbach Co. To-day.

The strike of the Lamplighters' Union which went into effect last week against the Welsbach Lighting Company for recognition of the union and higher wages, may be settled to-day. A brief conference took place yesterday between Supt. Prendergast of the company and Herman Robinson, one of the organizers of the union, which was followed by a longer conference last night. It was then arranged that a conference should take place to-day between representatives of the company and the strikers.

The lights were kept burning in the city yesterday all day as they have been since the strike started, and the naptha lamps in the parks were not lighted last night. The company believed last night that the strike would be settled in time to have the perks lighted to-night.

JUST A JOKE ON MRS. PEACH.

"Black Hand" Letter Said to Pay Over $100 at Democratic Club.

Jamse S. Regan, the Democratic leader of the Fifth Assembly District, Brooklyn, was etartled yesterday to learn that his clubhouse was being used by the "Black Hand." The house in question is occupied by the Jefferson Club and is at 756 Halsey Street. Mrs. Charles E. Peach of 148 Patchen Avenue called the club's attention to the matter.

On Saturday night Mrs. Peach, whose husband is a metal worker, received a letter telling her that if she did not leave $100 at 756 Halsey Street before May 1 her young daughter would be kidnapped. The letter was signed "Black Hand." Mrs. Peach, alarmed at first, later decided the affair was the work of some practical joker.

SOCIALISTS BITTER AGAINST ROOSEVELT

Angry Clash in Federated Union Over His Moyer-Haywood Letter.

SOME DEFEND PRESIDENT

Committee Ordered to See Him Couldn't Make Appointment—Again Ordered to Washington.

Many of the delegates at yesterday's meeting of the Central Federated Union, which was an uproarious one, came with the intention of condemning President Roosevelt and the expectation of hearing others condemn him on account of his letter to the Chairman of the Moyer-Haywood conference of Chicago confirming his statement that Moyer and Haywood were undesirable citizens. There were plenty of denunciations of President Roosevelt, but a number of unexpected defenders of the President appeared and rather more than evened up matters.

The committee of three appointed to go to Washington and ask the President to retract his statement that Moyer and Haywood were undesirable citizens, was censured for not obeying the instructions in spite of the fact that they could not obtain an appointment by telegraph to meet the President. The Socialists came in for some hot attacks by delegates, who held that the proposed parade and mass meeting on Saturday evening next is really more of a demonstration to boost the Socialist Party than a Moyer-Haywood demonstration.

Albert Abrahams, a Socialist, started the clash by making a report as to the arrangements for the parade and mass meeting in Grand Central Palace on Saturday night. He said that the parade would be a great success and continued:

Socialist Attacks Roosevelt.

"Senator Borah would be willing to give his services free in prosecuting the prisoners in order to break up the unions," he said. "The unions will therefore need to contribute for the defense. The letter of President Roosevelt has done the Moyer-Heywood cause good rather than harm. Every central body in nearly all the large cities has given judgment against him. I want to say that revelations will be made in a few days about the troubles in the West which will show a conspiracy against the three indicted men."

Morris Brown, a member of the committee of three who is also a Socialist, detailed the efforts of the committee to make an appointment with President Roosevelt, and his decision not to go to Washington after these efforts had failed and President Roosevelt's letter appeared.

Several of the delegates then declared that the committee had no right to decide not to go to Washington. Delegate Coakley of the Lithographers' Apprentices Union said that the letter of President Roosevelt was a letter to a member of a certain political party and a slap in the face of that party.

"It was the duty of the committee to go to Washington, anyway," he said. "President Roosevelt should be told that the unions wanted a square deal for the men, and did not demand that they should be set free without a trial. We demand a fair trial, not because they are members of trade unions, but because they are citizens. If they had as much money behind them as Harry Thaw, they would not have been so long in jail."

Coakley's speech was followed by furious applause, and several delegates attacked President Roosevelt. Hermen Robinson, the Financial Secretary, who is general organizer for the American Federation of Labor, objected.

Robinson Defends President.

"Organized labor is now before the public at large," he said, "and is being led erroneously to believe that the demonstration on Saturday night is for the purpose of denouncing President Roosevelt. We should not be carried away by enthusiasm, but should act soberly and give the respect due to the Chief Magistrate of the Nation, who has as good a right to his opinion as we have. The letter in which he referred to Moyer and Haywood as undesirable citizens was a privileged communication and was stolen."

There were signs of disapprobation among the audience, and Robinson said that he knew the position he took was not popular with some of the delegates. A roar of dissent followed when he objected to any demonstration for the purpose of condemning President Roosevelt.

"You will only injure the Moyer-Haywood cause by trying to create the idea that labor is up in arms against President Roosevelt," he said. "President Roosevelt, in his letter to the Chicago organization, gave the legitimate organizations all credit. It is our duty to show respect to the President of the United States, and not make ourselves the laughing stock of the community. We can easily remain self-respecting citizens and show sympathy for Moyer and Haywood."

Delegate Entwistle of the Steam Fitters' Union said that the committee should go to Washington again even if its members should have to walk all the way. Delegate Cedar of the Mechinists defended President Roosevelt. A voice shouted, "How about Borah?"

"All I have to say is that there is a clique of politicians interested in this matter," Cedar said. "I do not know of any President who has done as much for labor as President Roosevelt. Before you condemn a man like President Roosevelt you have to be sure of your facts."

Delegate Forman of the Riggers' Union, who on the last Sunday said that, in his opinion, President Roosevelt could give Ananias cards and spades, said that President Roosevelt's action will be condemned at the next election, at which there was tremendous applause from the Socialists.

Brown, who made the report for the committee, denied that the mass meeting had been called to condemn President Roosevelt, but he said that President Roosevelt would be condemned all the same. Robinson, he said, did not know what he was talking about.

Other delegates took a hand and the speakers began to grow personal. Several of the delegates said that the parade would be really an exploitation of the Socialists. Abrahams said that when President Cleveland sent the militia to crush down the strikers during the Pullman car strike, Mr. Roosevelt applauded the act as one of the highest acts of patriotism, and said he would have done the same if he had been President.

"It was the Rough Rider Roosevelt embracing the smooth politican Cleveland, Oyster Bay at the side of Buzzard's Bay, two hearts beating as one, and one of them was that of a man who kills bears and tigers and wears glasses," he said.

Committee Ordered to Obey.

More personalities were exchanged and the delegates became angry. President Roosevelt found two more champions in former Assemblyman Thomas Rock, Ephraim Kaufman, of the Clothing Cutters' Union, and Timothy Healey, of the stationary firemen. It was finally decided that the committee must go to Washington this week.

WON'T CRITICISE ROOSEVELT.

St. Louis Labor Unions Respect Office of Chief Magistrate.

ST. LOUIS, April 28.—The Central Trades and Labor Union of St. Louis today refused to indorse a resolution by the Pattern Makers' organization attacking President Roosevelt for calling Moyer and Haywood undesirable citizens. Members of the central labor body declared:

"No matter what we may think of Mr. Roosevelt, we must, as good citizens, respect the office of the Chief Magistrate

SOLDIERS' CHURCH PARADE.

Dr. Shipman, in His Sermon, Warns Against Present-Day Materialism.

The annual church parade and service of Squadron A was held yesterday afternoon. The squadron, about 150 strong, under the command of Major Oliver B. Bridgman, came down from its armory in Madison Avenue cars to Fifty-seventh Street, the parade being to Fifth Avenue and thence to the Church of the Heavenly Rest, where the service was held.

The Rev. Dr. Herbert Shipman, the new Chaplain, preached the sermon. He said in part:

"Physical courage and the love of adventure are fine things, and we are right in honoring them; but isn't it time that we should put moral courage at least on the same level? Isn't it time that we should put a man who runs away from his moral duty and shelters his conscience behind some plausible excuse in the same category as the man who runs away from the bullets of the enemy?"

Gen. Charles F. Roe, the former commander of the squadron, was present, but in civilian attire. The parade on its return disbanded at Fifty-seventh Street.

CONCESSIONS MADE IN UTILITIES BILL

Court Review Provision Altered —Authority for Railroad Note Issues.

PIPE LINES ARE CUT OUT

Much Comment on This Action—Governor's Power Lessened — Bill Must Go to the Mayor.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, April 29.—When the full scope of the amendments to the Public Utilities bill made by the Assembly Railroad Committee became known late this evening it was found that the measure had been weakened in many respects.

One of the amendments that has given rise to much comment strikes out the provision giving to the proposed Public Service Commission power to regulate pipe lines in this State. This amendment, it is understood, was asked for by Assemblyman Charles M. Hamilton of Chautauqua, who is an oil producer and a very wealthy man. Mr. Hamilton won out only after a stubborn fight. The official explanation given for the amendment is that there are only a few miles of pipe lines in the State and these belong to the Standard Oil Companies, and are part of their general pipe line system, already under the control of the Inter-State Commerce Commission.

The Governor is deprived of power of absolute removal of Commissioners, but is authorized to remove any Commissioner for inefficiency, neglect of duty, or misconduct in office, after filing with him a copy of charges and giving him a right to defend himself, with the provision that should his removal follow, a copy of the charges and his defense must be filed with the Secretary of State.

Salaries of Commissioners are increased from $10,000 to $15,000. The salaries of Commissioners' counsel and Secretary of the commission for the first district are payable by the State, but salaries of the other employés must be paid by the city Where the first bill provided that all fees, fines, and forfeits collected by the City Commission should go into the State Treasury, the amended bill gives them to the city.

The clamor of the public service corporations against giving the commission power to approve or disapprove the issuance of notes has been recognized by such modification of this clause as would enable such corporations to issue notes or obligations running for less than a year for any purpose whatever, and then issue bonds or stock to discharge the debt.

The original provision as to the effect of an order of the commission read as follows:

"Every order of a commission shall take effect at a time therein specified and shall continue in force for a period therein designated unless earlier modified or abrogated by the commission or unless declared by a court of competent jurisdiction to be unauthorized by this or any other act or to be in violation of the Constitution of the State or of the United States."

It is amended by striking out the words "declared by a court of competent jurisdiction to," and the words "such order" are inserted in them. This is an exceedingly important change. It is asserted that the amendment will have the effect of not making the penalty effective until the courts shall finally have upheld an order, where, under the old bill, the penalty went into force when order was issued.

Another amendment would leave the way open for a railroad company to acquire control of another company, provided such a company did not operate a competing line. While this was a vital concession, Assemblyman Merritt explained that the bar against such transactions which appeared in the original measure was due to ambiguous wording. He declared that the provisions prohibiting mergers and holding companies remained as rigid as the original bill.

It is now practically certain that the bill will have to go to Mayor McClellan for his approval of such provisions as deal with the public service in New York City. The Governor's friends are not jubilant now that they are convinced that this course is necessary. Mayor McClellan has opposed a commission appointed by the Governor for New York City from the first. He may, therefore, veto tha bill. Now that peace has been patched up between the Mayor and Mr. Murphy it is likely that the New York members will make a united fight on this point.

Representatives of corporations opposed to a majority of the most vital provisions of tha Page-Merritt Public Utilities bill came to the Capitol to-day by invitation to confer with members of the Judiciary Committee of the Senate and the Assembly Railroad Committee with a view of having the measure modified to meet their views.

The hearing to the corporation agents to-day ended in a muddle largely because the bill, as amended by the Assembly Railroads Committee, had not been printed and the visitors had nothing definite before them on which to base their arguments.

A majority of the corporation agents are staying at the Capitol to-night for the purpose of holding conferences after the printer shall have completed the work on the amended bill. There is already talk of another extended hearing when the bill comes before the Senate. Members of the Senate Judiciary Committee are in favor of granting this request, despite the delay it would cause.

The commission is to have jurisdiction over conduits and ducts in the city, which it did not have.

The provisions as to immunity of witnesses are made to apply only to persons who heve testified under oath. There is added a provision that a witness who refuses to answer questions, instead of being guilty of a misdemeanor as in the first bill, may be taken before the Supreme Court, and if there ordered to produce books or testify before the commission may be punished for contempt for failing to comply.

In section 37 of the original bill it was provided that every common carrier should, upon reasonable notice, furnish to all persons and corporations who might apply therefor, suitable cars for the transportation of freight in carloads. This is changed to read: "Every railroad corporation shall, upon reasonable notice, furnish to all persons and corporations who may apply therefor and offer freight for transportation, sufficient and suitable cars for the transportation of freight in carloads."

The substitution of the word "railroad corporation" for "common carrier" would exclude car companies, express companies, freight line companies, and pipe lina companies, all of which are defined as common carriers elsewhere in the bill.

The provision holding common carriers liable for delays in transit due to negligence is modified by omitting a clause holding them responsible for special damages which may result from such delay.

ROBERT REID WEDS MODEL.

New York Artist and Miss Elizabeth Reeves Quietly Married.

Special to The New York Times.

LONG MEADOW, Mass., April 29.—Robert Reid of New York was married to Miss Elizabeth Reeves of New York here to-day, in the home of the bridegroom's brother, Charles D. Reid. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Dr. Philip S. Moxom, pastor of the South Congregational Church of Springfield.

Every effort was made to keep the wedding a secret, and only the barest facts were given to the newspapers. The couple were married in Long Meadow as they wished to avoid tha publicity of a New York wedding.

Robert Reid is a well-known New York artist and clubman, who has a studio in the Gibson Building, 142 East Thirty-third Street. Miss Reeves was his model.

When the annual exhibition of the "Society of Ten," of which Mr. Reid is a member, was held in the Montross Gallery, 372 Fifth Avenue, two pictures by the artist attracted considerable attention. They were "A Portrait Sketch" and "Violets." Miss Reeves posed for both.

Miss Reeves's friends say that she possesses a charming personality. She is fair and of a bionda typa and her life hes been quita remote from the artists' life of New York.

Mr. Reid is one of the best known of the younger group of American artists. He was born in Stockbridge, Mass., in 1863, and after studying at the Boston Museum of Fine Arts and Art Students' League of New York, went to Paris, where he was a pupil of Boulanger and Lefebre at Julian's noted academy. He has exbibited in Paris annually and is noted for his mural painting. With eight other artists he executed frescoes on the domes of the Liberal Arts Building at the Chicago World's Fair, and also painted mural decorations for the Congressional Library, at Washigton, D. C. He is also an associate of the National Academy of Design, a member of the St. Botolph Club of Boston, and of the Players' and Fencers' Clubs of this city.

C. S. MELLEN'S SON WEDS.

Denied at Railroad President's House That It Is a Runaway Match.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., April 29.—The wedding was announced to-night of Graham Mellen of this city to Maude Longmeyer of Brooklyn, N. Y. The bridegroom is the eldest son of Charles Sanger Mellen, President of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad, and is 22 years old. He was graduated from Yale two years ago, and went into the railroad offices here, leaving them a year ago to start an independent coal business.

At the residence of President Mellen to-night it was denied that the wedding was a runaway match. It was stated that young Mr. Mellen had been engaged for a year. The wedding took place in New York City, and Mr. and Mrs. Mellen have gone South on their honeymoon.

SEATS FALL AT A CIRCUS.

Woman Badly Crushed and 50 Other Persons Hurt at White Plains.

Special to The New York Times.

WHITE PLAINS, April 29.—One women was seriously injured and fifty persons were slightly hurt when the reserved-seat section beneath the big tent of Hargraves's Circus collapsed during a performance here to-night and a panic followed.

While the trick elephants were performing there was beard the crunching of wood, and the whole reserved seat section seemed to move forward toward the arena and then collapsed. About 500 persons were thrown in a heap. Women screamed and men fought to escape, and the rest of the audience rushed into the ring and then out of the tent.

At first it was thought that several persons had been killed, hut after the circus hands had extricated the injured from beneath the wooden seats it was found that Mrs. Sydney Bare, tha wife of a White Plains policeman, was the only person seriously injured. Her right ankle was broken and it was believed that she was injured internally. The others injured were mostly women and children, who received bruises and contusions.

When the seats caved in the trick elephants trumpeted and the other animals joined in the chorus. The police believe the benches were improperly fastened together.

The performance was resumed later after half the audience had gone home.

REVOLT IN MONTENEGRO.

Armed Bands Are Reported to be Marching on the Capital.

VIENNA, April 29.—Dispatches received here to-night report the outbreak of a revolt snd a grave political crisis in Montenegro. A military government has been proclaimed and Premier Tomanovics has tendered tha resignation of the Cabinet, which Prince Nicholas has refused to accept.

Armed bands are reported to be marching on Cettinje.

Serious street fights have occurred at Podgoritza, which is thirty-eight miles north of Scutari snd has a population of about 7,000. Several persons are reported to have been killed or wounded. The militia hae been called out there and further conflicts are feared.

The trouble in Montenegro has arisen because of the campaign the Cabinet has inaugurated against the Radical Party. The Government is accused of instigating the destruction of the printing offices of two Radical newspapers, at Niksiec and Podgoritza, which had attacked the Government and Prince Nicholas. This alleged action of the Cabinet has aroused anger throughout the cauntry.

ANGRY CZAR MAY CLOSE DUMA TO-DAY

MINISTERS LEAVE CHAMBER

Premier Admits Serious Friction in the Cabinet—Pandemonium in the Lower House.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 29.—A savage attack made to-day on the army and the Government by a Socialist member, M. Zurahoff, in the first executive session of the lower House of Parliament, which was devoted to a debate on the bill fixing the number of recruits to be called to the colors, produced a rupture between the Ministers and the Duma which threatened to cause the dissolution of the House.

After M. Zuraboff's harangue, in which he declared that under an autocratic regime the army was worthless except against the people, and that it was beaten whenever it engaged in a foreign war, the Ministers withdrew from the House, and served an ultimatum on President Golovin that unless the offensive expressions were retracted by M. Zuraboff and the rula providing for temporary suspension was applied against him, they would sever all future relations with the Duma.

M. Golovin was unable to have the demand complied with, as the Radicals supported their colleague solidly and the Poles refused to vote. The suspension and formal rebuke of M. Zurahoff were pronounced by the President of the Chamber, but this failed to satisfy the Ministers, who subsequently ordered the Government experts to withdraw from the evening session of the Budget Commission.

Premier Stolypin, who hed not been present during the incident, summoned an extraordinary session of the Cabinet, which apparently brought matters to an issue between the Premier and the Reactionary members of his Ministry. What transpired is not known, but et midnight Premier Stolypin summoned M. Golovin and informed him that the incident had caused serious friction in the Cabinet. He hoped, however, that a way would be found to-morrow to arrange matters without fatal consequences to the Duma.

To the Constitutional Democratic Steering Committee, which held an agitated conference to-night, this news brought greet relief and no measures on its part will be omitted with a view to ending the incident when the executive session is resumed to-morrow.

The early discussion of the Army bill in the Duma to-day was stormy, but the culminetion came at 6:30 P. M., when M. Zuraboff made his speech. The scene was one of indescribable pandemonium. President Golovin, when he had restored things to a semblance of order, attempted to explain away Zuraboff's words as a criticism of the old army under the old régime, both of which had passed away. He then suspended the session for ten minutes in order to ellow the passions of the members to cool.

The recess was protracted for almost two hours, while a series of conferences wera being held and reports by telephone were made to Premier Stolypin and the Emperor. Finally Lieut. Gen. Rudiger, Minister of War, on behalf of his colleagues, announced the ministerial ultimatum, adding that the Emperor would never stand such insults to his faithful army.

When the House reassembled M. Golovin announced that owing to the tumult he had not clearly understood the purport of M. Zuraboff's remarks, and, after having read the stenographer's report, he found the reflections upon the army unparliamentary and inadmissible in debate. Therefore ha deprived Zuraboff of the right to tha floor and imposed upon him a formal rebuke.

I. G. Tzereteli, a Social Democrat from Kutais, immediately claimed recognition. Ha declared that Zuraboff had spoken on behalf of the entire Social Democratic faction, which sharsd his sentiments. Wild tumult again broke loose, and the members of the Right refused to permit M. Tzereteli to continue. President Golovin swung tha President's bell frantically and was heard to shout that unless tha uproar ceased he would resign; but order was not restored until the Social Democrats, the Social Revolutionists, and other members of the Opposition, with M. Tzereteli at their head, filed out of the hall.

M. Golovin requested the House to express approval of his course, and this was voted by the minority members remaining.

The Duma was then adjourned.

At a conference of the Social Democrats to-night, the advisability of M. Zuraboff immediately quitting St. Petersburg owing to the certainty of his being challenged to ducls and the danger of his being summarily dealt with in case he declines to fight was considered.

HIGH POST FOR SKALLON.

He Succeeds Grand Duke Nicholas as Commander at the Capital.

ST. PETERSBURG, Tuesday, April 30.—The Novoe Vremya this morning announces the appointment of the Governor General of Warsaw, Gen. Skallon, as commander in chief of the entire body of guard regiments and as commander of the St. Petersburg military district in place of the Grand Duke Nicholas Nicholaievitch, who is led to retire from this dangerous post owing to his approaching marriage to Princess Anastasia of Montenegro, divorced wife of Duke George of Leuchtenberg.

The position carries actual power scarcely second to that held by the Minister of War.

TO ABANDON JAMES SLIP.

Ferry Service Between There and Long Island City to be Discontinued.

The Long Island Railroad's ferry from James Slip to Long Island City is to he discontinued in the near future, and probably will be ebandoned permanently.

Tha change has been made necessary in order that the city may go ahead with its work of improving the East River waterfront by the construction of the masonry bulkhead and new piers. The Dock Department is new at work on the plans for that section of the work at James Slip, and prohably will be ready to heglin the tearing away of the old hulkhead and ferry slip within thirty days.

It is not believed thet the Long Island Railroad officials will make any effort to arrange a temporary terminal while the construction work is in progress, or to take up the operation of the ferry after the work has besn finished.

Tha city already has agreed to lease ths new piers to be erected at this point to the railroad, and this increase in its freight terminal facilities in lower Manhattan is said to be much more acceptable to the railroad than would be an opportunity to resume tha James Slip Ferry service. In fact, the operation of this ferry has possessed no great attractions financially, and it is believed that the railroad will not he an unwilling party to its enforced abandonment.

Tha tunnels now nearing completion promise to reduce still further any necessity for the James Slip Ferry. Even before the Pennsylvania tuhes are finished the Belmont tunnel will connect with the Subway at the Grand Central Station, while the Battery tunnel, connecting with the Long Island at the Flatbush Avenue Station in Brooklyn, will afford quicker transit to Long Island points from lower Manhattan than is now possible hy means of the long ferry trip up the East River.

The Long Island's Summer ferry service from the foot of Wall Street to Long Island City will not be discontinued.

SAID THE GOVERNOR OF N. C.

To the Governor of S. C.: "We're Both Prohibitionists."

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., April 29.—Gov. Rollin Woodruff of Connecticut returned here from Jamestown to-day, declaring that it is now a longsr time than ever between drinks for the Governor of North Carolina and the Governor of South Carolina. Gov. Woodruff stood talking with Gov. Heyward of South Carolina Saturday at the exposition, when Gov. Glenn of North Carolina came along. Learning that they had never met, Gov. Woodruff said:

"Gov. Heyward of South Carolina, let me introduce Gov. Glenn of North Carolina." Then he added, facetiously, "and I expect the usual salutation when the Governor of North Carolina meets the Governor of South Carolina."

Gov. Heyward moved restlessly, and responded:

"I beg your partdon, gentlemen, but I'm a teetotaler."

Gov. Glenn came to his rescue by saying:

"Don't apologize, Governor, for in that event we're both Prohibitionists. I, too, am opposed to drinking."

SHE "STOPPA DA CAR."

Italian Woman Pulled Revolver to Enforce Her Signal to Motorman.

A woman in Brooklyn yesterday adopted a plan to stop a car which landed her in the Flatbush Police Court.

Mrs. Maria Serento, 35 years old, of 144 Classon Avenue, was at Nostrand Avenue and Lincoln Road trying to board a car. Three of them passed her, the motormen paying no heed to her signals. Finally Maria lost her temper.

"I stoppa da next car or there be something doing, you kin betta," said she as she took up a position in the middle of the track.

Another car came along. As it approached, Maria took a hig revolver from the pocket of her skirt and pointed it at the motorman.

"Stoppa da car, you," she commanded.

The motorman applied the hrakes and ducked behind the dashhoard. Maria was about to hoard the car in triumph when she was arrested for carrying concealed weapons. She was held for examination.

CAPT. KAEMPFF'S DISCOVERY.

A Change in Propeller's Pitch Lessens the Deutschland's Vibration.

An important discovery has been made by Capt. Kaempff and Chief Engineer Leuttrann of the Hamhurg-American liner Deutschland, resulting in the reduction of vibration on the steamer. It consists in the slight alteration of the blades of the steamship's propellers.

Before departing from Hamburg on her last voyage to New York, the Deutschland's port propeller hlades were altered in accordance with Capt. Kaempff's theory. The result was closely observed during the voyage to New York, and the officials say the remarkable reduction of vibration observed closely approximated the highly satisfactory results of tests of the steam turbine. The alteration is described as changing the position of the hlades on the propeller to such an angla that each of the four hlades presents a greater surface of resistance to the water as the blades revolve.

CAR CRUSHES DOCTOR'S AUTO.

Chauffeur Injured in Broadway Collision—Motorman Arrested.

Dr. Charles H. Archihald, of 105 Madison Avenue, and his chauffeur were painfully injured last night when a south-hound Columbus Avenue car orashed into the automohile in which they were seated at Forty-sixth Street and Broadway. The ohauffeur, Chester Quick, 23 years old, of 268 West Forty-sixth Street, was taken to the Roosevolt Hospital suffering from a crushed arm. Dr. Archibald was thrown into the street.

As they approached Broadway Dr. Archihald said both he and his chauffeur saw the south-bound car, which some persons on the corner had signaled to stop. The automobile was just crossing the track, when the car, which had not even slowed up, the doctor says, crashed into it. The machine was badly damaged. Tha motorman, Thomas Finalty, was arrested on Dr. Archihald's complaint.

JUROR'S ERROR HALTS DE MASSY TRIAL

Guernsey Visited Scene of Shooting Without Consulting Court or Counsel.

MAY CAUSE A MISTRIAL

Court Puzzled What to Do Owing to Lack of Precedents—Juror Did It Innocently.

The trial of Mrs. Anisia Louise du Vernon De Massy before Justice Blanchard and a jury for the murder of Gustav Simon, the Broadway shirtwaist manufacturer, was brought to an ahrupt halt late yesterday afternoon by the statement made from the jury box by George W. Guernsey, Juror No. 8, that he had paid a visit to the premises at 604 Broadway, the scene of the shooting and had carefully examined the stairs down which it has been testified Mrs. De Massy hurried after the shooting.

This visit was made without the knowledge or sanction of the court or any of the attorneys in the case.

This statement was brought out in the examination of Policeman Gustav Pratt. Pratt had testified to finding the revolver on the stairway. Charles E. Le Barbier, counsel for Mrs. De Massy, had just asked a question when Juror Guernsey rose and announced that he would like to ask a few questions. This dialogue followed:

Mr. Guernsey—I am familiar with that stairway because I went there and looked it over and I want to have you locate it.

Mr. Ely—You had no business to do that.

Justice Blanchard—You had no business to go there.

Mr. Guernsey—I beg your pardon. I didn't know. I went past there.

Justice Blanchard—Go on with your questions.

After Mr. Guernsey had questioned the policeman as to the exact location of the revolver when he came upon it, Mr. Ely broke in:

"If your Honor please, of course the juror did not mean to do anything wrong. I think it would be as well to say that the jury must not go and look at the premises or inspect them without the permission of the court, and then they must go in a body. That is all."

Justice Blanchard admonished the jury that their information concerning the case must be obtained only in the court room and in the presence of the Judge.

"Shall I make a statement?" demanded Mr. Guernsey.

"No," retorted Justice Blanchard, "I do not want any statement. I do not know what effect it may have on this case."

Puzzled Court Halts the Trial.

At this point Justice Blanchard abruptly closed tha proceedings for the day, warning the jurors earnestly against discussing the case or forming or expressing any opinion of it.

Just what may result from Mr. Guernsey's remarkable disclosure was a subject of speculation in the Criminal Court Building. Justice Blanchard and Assistant District Attorney Ely held a conference after court had adjourned, but it is known that Justice Blanchard arrived at no decision. He will announce his conclusion this morning.

It is possible that ths trial may he termed a mistrial and the jury discharged. This was believed last night by many lawyers to be the only solution of the problem. On the other hand, Justice Blanchard may order that the jury be taken in a body to view the premises and then continue with the trial as though Juror Guernsey's admission had never been made. In such an event, however, several lawyers gave it as their opinion last night that Mr. Le Barbier would have good grounds upon which to demand a new triel should the jury find a verdict of guilty against Mrs. De Massy. Similar instances hava been so rare that Justice Blanchard did not feel ready to rule upon the casa last night without giving it more study.

Before Mr. Guernsey's statement interrupted the course of the trial, half a dozen witnesses had been called to the stand, who, in several instances, either contradicted themselvss or each other. Policeman Wersanzsky of the Mulberry Street Station testified that he had led Mrs. De Massy before Mr. Simon after the shooting.

"I asked him if he knew her," said Wersanzsky," and he replied that she had been in his employ. 'What did she do to you?' I then asked, and he answered that she had fird three shots at him, and that one of them had struck him. Then he placed his hand on the defendant's shoulder, and exclaimed: 'That is the woman who shot me.'"

Mrs. De Massy had simply smiled at this, Wersanzsky said, and, shrugging her shoulders, said: "I did not do it."

Some Conflicting Testimony.

Wersanzsky's testimony as to the statements of Simon was in direct contradiction to the testimony of Otto Sichel, Solomon Schiller, a hat manufacturer with rooms on the fourth floor of the building, and of Carl Kohler, the former's bookkeeper. These men testified that they had been present in Simon's office when Mrs. De Massy had been brought in, hut had heard no conversation betwcen Simon and the defendant. Kohler swore that he had been in the office for half an hour in company with Schiller. Both men had also heard the shots and had stepped into the hall on the fourth floor when Otto Sichel spoke to Mrs. De Massy as sha passed down the stairs, and both men had followed after her and Sichel. On cross-examination Schiller admitted a discrepancy between his testimony and that given hy him at the Coroner's inquest, but was unable to explain the difference.

Mrs. Annie Menzies, matron at the station, told of having found a strange bag when she searched Mrs. De Massy, which had been made fast about her waist and which dropped nearly to the hem of her skirt, between it and a petticoat.

Policeman Pratt testified as to the finding of the revolver, to which his attention was called by Otto Sichel. The pistol had been in a brown paper hag, which was open and was lying on the stairs on the first flight. Mr. Le Barbier laid considerable stress on whether the pistol was within three steps of the top or the bottom of this flight of stairs, and it was his questions which induced Mr. Guernsey's remark.

8 YEARS FOR CANAL—TAFT.

Would Not Be Astonished If It Were Completed in Less Time.

CINCINNATI, Ohio, April 29.—"If the Panama Canal is not completed within eight years from now I shall be greatly disappointed. If it is completed in less time than that I shall not he greatly surprised."

This statement, made to-night by Secretary of War Taft before the Business Men's Club, brought forth a great demonstration, the 600 members of the club who were gathered inside the banquet hall rising and cheering the statement and the speaker.

The banquet tendered to the Secretary by the Business Men's Club came as the climax to the last of tha three days of his present Western trip. The hall was packed, and more than 400 applications for tickets of admission to the banquet were declined, because there was no more room inside the hall.

NO REALTY FOR HARRIMAN.

"Dummies" Figure in His Deal for Valuable Fifth Avenue Corner.

E. H. Herriman apparently does not intend to hold title to the fine residence site at tha northeast corner of Fifth Avenue and Fifty-second Street, which he bought recently from Commodore F. G. Bourne for $650,000.

Commodore Bourne transferred the plot yesterday to John S. Montgomery, who immediately reconveyed it to the City Real Estate Company, a corporation which acts as "dummy" for clients of the Title Guarantee & Trust Company.

A SHOCK FOR BROOKLYN.

Comstock Says It Is One of the Best Markets for Improper Postal Cards.

Staid old Brooklyn, the "Borough of Churches," was shocked to learn yesterday that it was one of the best markets for obscene postal cards. Tha announcement was made by Anthony Comstock in the Brooklyn Court of Special Sessions. The vice crusader was in court to obtain the discharge of one of his assistants, who had been arrested by mistake for a dealer in offensive postal cards. The prisoner was released.

Mr. Comstock said that within a few weeks 84,000 improper postal cards had been seized in Brooklyn. Nearly all the cards had been printed hy one firm. Mr. Comstock said he was getting evidence on which to prosecute the firm.

WASHINGTON, April 29.—President Roosevelt had an extended conference to-day with W. C. Brown, Senior Vice President of the New York Central Railroad.

CHEYENNE, Wyo., April 29.—An explosion of dynamite at John Linn's sheep camp in Trapper Creek, Big Horn County, last night killed 700 sheep and destroyed the camp wagons and outfit.

A herder said to-day that a band of masked men raided the camp, and, after binding him, set off the dynamite.

It will be the problem of the applicants to show that thay can tell how many miles an hour an automobile is making, and how soon they can catch up with an offender of the speed law. A motor cycle that is guaranteed to go eighty miles an hour, will also be tried out.

Herman Robinson said last night that as the strike was against the discharge of men for helonging to the union, and these men were reinstated, the other demand for higher wages was not pressed.

MAYOR AT PEACE WITH TAMMANY

But That Doesn't Mean with Murphy, as He Promptly Makes Known.

ELLISON-SULLIVAN DEAL

Tammany Leader Says Congressman Had Power to Act for the Organization.

ANNOUNCEMENT A SURPRISE

Many Rumors Started of Hidden Meanings—Denial That National Pressure Was Exerted.

A harmonious working arrangement once more exists between Tammany Hall and Mayor George B. McClellan and his administration. It does not appear, however, that there has been any peace pact between Charles F. Murphy, Tammany leader, and the Mayor. Emphasis is laid on the organization in the negotiations.

Henceforth the organization need have nothing to fear from the Mayor either in politics or in the administration of the city's business, for, according to Corporation Counsel Ellison, no appointments inimicel to the organizetion will be made by the Mayor, and, according to the Mayor, factional politics will not be allowed to interfere with the administration. A compact has been entered into between Tammeny and the Mayor, through Congressmen "Big Tim" Sullivan and Corporation Counsel Ellison, which will end hostilities.

Behind the move of yesterday is said to lie the fear that the strained state of affairs in this city in the Democratic Party might have a most serious effect on the next National campaign. Pressure is said to hava been brought to bear by National Democratic leaders on both McClellan and Murphy to bring abont a cessation of hostilities. It has been pointed out that it was well enough to have factional fights as long as they were not allowed to interfere with the party plans outside the district affected. Such a split as seemed imminent here after the next primaries, it was declared, could not help but result in disaster if carried to the extreme, and the bare possibility of the city being lost to the party in a National campaign should bring together any factions, no matter what their differences.

Among the many stories that circulated about political centres after a long statement by Mr. Ellison yesterday, was one to the effect that an ultimatum had been issued by those high in the National organization. "Quit fighting, or we will take a hand ourselves," was declared to he its purport. Murphy had been told to give up any thought of reprisals, it was said, and McClellan was informed that the wisest thing he could do would be to run the city government and let politics alone, leaving Murphy to command the organization.

Another story was to the effect that "Big Tim" Sullivan wanted to name the next leader of Tammany, and had undertaken to bring about the deposing of Murphy, through his own power in the organization, which is acknowledged to be great. For thus carrying out what has long been thought to be McClellan's wish, Sullivan was to have the glory of patching up a peace between the administration and the organization, the members of which have been patronage hungry for a long time.

Not Peace with Murphy?

Corporation Counsel Ellison was asked last night whether it was true that peace had been brought about at the behest of the National heads of the party, who were desirous of the party in this city presenting an unbroken front at the next National campaign.

"No, I had not heard that," Mr. Ellison replied. "It was not discussed in connection with this matter at all."

Charles F. Murphy, leader of Tammany Hall, confirmed the report early yesterday that peace had been brought about between Tammeny and the Mayor. He said that Congressman Sullivan represented "the organization" and acted "with authority." Later, Mr. Ellison let it ha known that the Congressman represented "the orgsnization."

Still later, at the close of one of the busiest days in local politics that the city has seen for many months, the Mayor issued a statement, in which he declared that he had made no deal that altered his position in any way. He reiterated what he said some months ago about the organization, said he had not changed his opinion of the conduct of the organization, and asserted that he would go as far forward as any man to bring about political peace in the party in this city, but would not ge one step backward.

On the surface, previous to the issuance of the Mayor's statement, it appeared that the Mayor had given up his fight against Murphy and that the victory was with the Tammany leader. On the other hand, a careful perusal of the statements issued and of all the interviews granted shows that nowhere was Congressman Sullivan said to represent Mnrphy, and, in fact, nowhere was Murphy's name mentioned. "The organization" seemed to be the whole thing, and this gave rise to the rumor that the Mayor had been working through Mr. Ellison and Mr. Sullivan to bring about the dethroning of Murphy, and the latter part of the Mayor's statement, which reflected somewhat on Mr. Ellison, leads to the conclusion that the mine had heen sprung too soon and with too much noise.

The Official Statement.

"Big Tim" Sullivan walked into Mr. Ellison's office shortly before noon. Rumors of peace between the administration and Murphy had been flying thick and fast.

"What are you going to do toward bringing about peace in Tammany Hall?" Mr. Sullivan was aeked.

"I don't know. It's ahout time something was done, though. Isn't it?"

When he came out of Mr. Ellison's office, he said:

"Mr. Ellison is going to give out a statement. I stand by that."

Mr. Ellison's statement was as follows:

"I have just concluded a long and very satisfactory conference with ex-Congressman Sullivan regarding the relations existing and to exist between the administration and the Democratic organization in this city.

"The Congressman and I are very old friends. I believe that I have his confidence, and I know that he has mine. Under such circumstances there ought to be no difficulty whatever in agreeing upon some kind of action that may be found to be of interest to us all. He is broad and fair minded, and I have no personal prejudices. This condition should make an agreement an extremely easy one to make and keep.

"I started in with the fundamental proposition upon which the Mayor's administration rests, and that is, that he be left entirely free to name, as vacancies occur, the highest class men that he may be able to find. I mean by this that I should advise the appointment of men of the highest calibre. At the same time I shall advise against the appointment of men who may be inimical to the organization or its leaders. I have always been of the opinion that the administration will best serve the purposes of the organization by giving to the city the best government possible, and along those lines I hope to proceed.

"My understanding is that this will leave the Mayor entirely free to work out the problems now confronting him, and which we all know are among the most stupendous ever presented to a Municipal Government. He will be free from all disturbances at the hands of men who are simply seeking their own selfish ends and who have no real interest at heart in the administration or the Democratic organization.

Says Mayor Has No Candidate.

"I understand now, as I have understood for some time, that the Mayor has no candidate for the leadership of Tammany Hall, and will have none. All that he asks, if I understand him correctly, is that he be permitted to give his time and attention to the duties of his office.

"The Congressman and I are entirely harmonious upon the proposition that efficient men should surely be retained in office and that appointments of men hereafter and the retention of men in exempt places should be controlled solely by their efficiency. This applies to all places under the City Government.

"We hope to utterly eradicate the lines that have been darwn between the organization and the administration, and we hope to do this by the absolute non-interference with the affairs of the organization. The leaders of the Democratic organization of the City of New York are entitled to conduct the organization, and, so far as I am able, there will be no interference with that control. We do ask, however, that in our efforts to give the City of New York good government the Democratic organization give us its full assistance and aid us in every way that rests within its power.

"On the other hand, the burden will rest upon his Honor the Mayor to, so far as he can, strengthen the organization, and this, so far as I am able to do, will be a very pleasant duty to me.

"The conference between the Congressman and myself was based largely upon the general situation, as I have indicated. Time will have to deal with individual matters as they arise. The spirit of fairness between both of us will eliminate all trouble, and we will have a condition of political harmony in the city that must redound materially to the city's interests."

The Mayor Has His Say.

That such a statement from Mr. Ellison had not been expected by those closo to the Mayor, or even by the Mayor himself, was soon apparent. Copies of the evening papers containing it were carried into the Mayor's Office by the wholesale, and politicians of all stripes began to gather. Water Commissioner O'Brien, former chief political adviser of the Mayor, arrived and went to luncheon with him. The City Hall was busier than it had been for months. The Mayor maintained silence.

He had a talk with Mr. Ellison before going to luncheon with Mr. O'Brien, who came back to the Mayor's office and spent the better part of the afternoon there. At 5:30 o'clock the Mayor issued the following statement:

"Mr. Ellison, like a number of other representative Democrats, has been desirous of bringing about a harmonious condition in the Democratic organization of this County, and to that end he has, with my knowledge, discussed the situation with men of various affiliations.

"He is right in saying that I insist upon being left entirely free to fill the offices for which I am responsible with the highest class of men that I am able to find. He is right in saying that I have no candidate for the leadership of Tammany Hall, and will have none.

"I Have Made no Deal."

"I have made no deal, and I have authorized the making of no deal which alters my position in any way. It is, and shall be, my ambition to give to the city the best administration that it is possible for me to give it, and factional politics will not be permitted to interfere with that course.

"I take back nothing that I have said concerning the management of the Democratic organization, and I reiterate what I said on Jan. 2, in appointing a Commissioner of Elections, that I should like to have the support of the Democratic organization, but if I cannot have that support under conditions which favor clean and efficient government then I am content to do without it.

"If the elements that constitute Tammany Hall wish to harmonize on that plane, then I am for harmony. For a political peace which is so needful to my party in the city, the State and the Nation, I shall go as far forward as any man, but not one step backward.

"I have not changed my opinion in regard to the policies and the conduct of the organization. If the organization wants to meet me on that platform, then there can be no differences between us.

"Regarding a statement in one of the morning papers that Mr. Ellison had threatened to resign if certain conditions were not met, I have this to say—first, that no such suggestion came from Mr. Ellison, and, second, that any subordinate threatening to resign for any reason would find his resignation immediately accepted. The three gentlemen named as Police Magistrates were of my personal selection. The names were not shown to Mr. Ellison until the day on which the appointments were announced."

Mayor's Repudiation of Murphy.

At first glance it seemed that the Mayor, while patting Mr. Ellison on the back for being a good Democrat, was very much incensed at what was contained in the Corporation Counsel's statement, and was repudiating the whole story. It appears, however, that the Mayor does nothing of the kind. There is not one paragraph in the Mayor's statement that repudiates, either directly or indirectly, anything contained in Mr. Ellison's statement. The Mayor says he has made no deal "which alters my position in any way."

On September 28 last the Mayor defined his position in a statement on the nomination of Hearst for Governor. He said in part:

"I am a Democrat, and I accept the action of the Democratic Convention. I will be a Democrat while my party has a name, but as a Democrat and as Mayor of this town I am unalterably opposed to Charles F. Murphy and to everything that he stands for."

On the occasion of the appointment of John T. Dooling as Commissioner of Elections, the Mayor said:

"In appointing Mr. Dooling as the representative of the Democratic organization of New York County on the Board of Elections, I take the opportunity to say that, as far as I can, I shall recognize and strengthen genuine Democracy in this city and invite its support. But I cannot recognize the existing control in Tammany Hall or tolerate any relations with its present leader. * * *

"It's True," Says Murphy.

At Tammany Hall the reports of peace were shown to Mr. Murphy.

"Yes, it's true," he said.

"Have you seen Mr. Ellison's statement?"

"Yes. I know all about it."

"Have you seen Mayor McClellan?"

"No."

"Mr. Ellison?"

"No. Mr. Sullivan represented the organization in the conference. What he did he did with authority."

"Does this mean that there will be no more primary fights?"

"I can't say that. It means that there will be no friction in the organization."

"Does it mean that you are to remain leader?"

"I suppose I will remain leader until I am put out."

"Will this agreement restore conditions that prevailed before the split?"

"Yes."

"Will you support the administration?"

"We always support the administration."

That was the extent to which Mr. Murphy would discuss the matter.

"Where Do I Stand" Brigade.

The "where do I stand" brigade was very much in evidence at the City Hall all day long. Most of the members, Tammany leaders whose faces have long been missed, and McClellan supporters seldom seen, were looking for information, not giving it. Countless rumors resulted from their presence, nearly all based on the supposition that the Mayor had given in to Murphy.

It was freely said that the Ahearn investigation would cease forthwith, probably to-day at the court hearing on the order citing Mr. Ahearn to show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. This, however, is hardly likely to happen.

It was pretty generally agreed that Maurice Featherson, former Dock Commissioner, would get the worst of it, no matter in which direction the cat jumped. John O'Brien, too, was slated for a hard berth henceforth, and Fire Commissioner Lantry, it was freely prophesied, would be kept busy holding his job. One rumor was to the effect that the fight on Senator McCarren in Brooklyn would reopen with renewed vigor, but this was believed by scarcely anybody. The general opinion was that McCarren was in on whatever had happened.

Politicians had no trouble in tracing the incidents that led to the settlement. The friendship of Mr. Ellison for the Sullivans, it was agreed, was largely responsible at the outset. Then, it was thought, came a week of bickerings and dickerings, with the Police and Health Departments worrying the Murphy contracting company. The Recount bill, too, was said to be responsible in a very large degree, and it was freely said that McClellan feared the passage of this measure and had surrendered to gain the friendship of the Tammany State Senators, in order that the bill might be killed. On the other side, the Bingham Police bill, and the use of it that had been made by the Commissioner, was responsible for putting Murphy in a receptive frame of mind.

Not to Shut Off Bingham.

To those who advanced these theories the Mayor's statement was somewhat of a surprise, as it did not seem to bear out any of them. When the Mayor was asked after he had issued his statement whether the new arrangement would result in a cessation of activity on the part of Police Commissioner Bingham, he replied: "Certainly not." Asked if the organization would be allowed to make recommendations for vacancies that might occur, he said that any one could make recommendations, but the final choice would rest with him. As an answer to all other questions he referred to his statement.

When the Mayor's statement was shown to Mr. Ellison early in the evening, he refused to say anything at all, but the context appeared to surprise him, especially the latter part. Later in the evening he said that he had no intention of resigning on account of the statement and he declared that the attitude of the National heads of the party toward the fight in this city had not been discussed. To a question as to who had started the movement for peace, he declined an answer.

Probably the most significant utterance of the day, outside the two statements, was made by a politician close to the Mayor. He said:

"Ellison went off half cock."

The fact that the statemeat of the Corporation Counsel was not shown to the Mayor before heing issued, together with the evident surprise with which it was received by the Mayor and those with him, was taken to indicate that Mr. Ellison had either been over-enthusiastic or had acted prematurely.

DOUGLAS PLANNED MUCH LARGER HAUL

Had Number of Securities in Place to be Taken Away Easily.

OFFICIAL REPORT ON LOSS

Directors' Committee Fixes it at $140,000—Vote of Confidence in the Officers.

If William O. Douglas had not left the offices of the Trust Company of America as suddealy aa he did there would have been a still larger number of securities stolen from the company. It developed yesterday that, in addition to the bonds and shares actually taken, a number of other securities were discovered by the officials after the alarm had heen given, which had not actually left the physical possession of the trust company, hut bad been placed in such a position tbat they could he easily ohtained by Douglas.

These securities are not reckoned in the statement given out officially after a meeting of the Directors yesterday afternoon. It ran:

"Report of examining committee made to the Board of Directors of the Trust Company of America, April 29, 1907.

"Securities of the market value of $570,000 were abstracted by the assistant loan clerk of the company. All these securities, except those of the value of $63,000, have been recovered by the company. In making this recovery payments were made to the amount of $102,000 to various Stock Exchange brokerage firms, who held the securities as collateral. This reduced the loss to $165,000, from which must be deducted the surety bonds of the clerk, amounting to $25,000.

"This further reduced the maximum net loss of the company to $140,000, which loss has been charged off. This last amount may be still further reduced through actions that will be instituted against those with whom the securities were pledged as collateral."

The report is signed by the examining committee, John E. Borne, H. B. Hollins, and E. Clifford Potter.

The loss is officially calculated upon the market rate of the day, and it was learned from a Director last night that the face value of the securities was considerably higher, in some cases as much as a third. Of these a certain number stood in Douglas's name, but it was a mistake to say that there were millions of dollars' worth of these.

Directors' Vote of Confidence.

There was a very full meeting of Directors at the trust company's offices yesterday. Not only were the Directors of the trust company present, but also those of the Colonial Trust Company, with which the amalgamation is just being completed. They represented a number of the prominent financial institutions of Wall Street, and the situation was thoroughly canvassed.

A vote of confidence in Oakleigh Thorne, President of the trust company, was proposed by John D. Crimmins and was carried unanimously. It was recognized that such occurrences, however regrettable, cannot be prevented from time to time, and every confidence was expressed in the staff. It was known that the officials and the clerks of the trust company were taking the matter to heart as deeply as though they were themselves to blame.

The detective skill and energy of Mr. Thorne and his assistants immediately after the defalcation had been discovered were also praised. Some discussion arose about the reports of a "man higher up," and the fear was expressed that the reports might refer to some one in the service of the corporation. However, it was understood that if there is a bigger scamp than Douglas and Dennett he is probably from Boston

In accordance with the consolidation of the two trust companies, a meeting of the stockholders will be held in a fortnight to elect the new Board of Directors. Immediately after the election the board will choose officers. There is little doubt that Oakleigh Thorne will be re-elected.

The examining committee of Directors, who were appointed to inquire into the robbery, made to the board a very full statement of what had been discovered by Haskins & Sells, the accountants called in to examine the books and securities. The same report was given yesterday to Charles H. Keep, Superintendent of the State Banking Department.

More Strict State Supervision.

He went to the trust company to ascertain whether the defalcations had occurred through any fault of the State Examiners. He ascertained that it was not so, but that until about three weeks ago Douglas had helped himself only from the trust funds, over which the department has not as yet exercised any supervision. He estimated the total amount of the thefts at a little under $900,000, but said of the net loss of $140,000:

"As to such a company a mere flea bite as compared with its surplus."

"The State Department," he went on, "will begin at once an examination of all the securities of all trust companies in New York, not only their trust securities, but all. The practice has been growing for New York banks to borrow large sums of money for Western banks on securities sent on here. We have not in the past examiaed these, but shall do so in the future.

"The purpose of this will be to prevent substitution. For instance, a bank or trust company might take securities from its trust fund and put them among its securities for loans during the period of examination by the Banking Department. I don't, of course, know that this is done; but it could easily he practiced, and I have talked with the Presidents of several trust companies, all of whom would be glad to see the scope of our examination enlarged."

It was learned that so rapidly has the Western trade grown that one small bank in this city, with a capital of only $100,000, has as much as $10,000,000 of securities deposited with it by banks on the Pacific Slope. Under these conditions, there is a real desire in Wall Street for a complete restoration of confidence in the integrity of its financial institutions. A robbery of securities from one causes all to feel the effect upon the public confidence. So there will be no opposition made to a tightening up of the supervision exercised hy the Banking Department, and at least oae large trust company, which was examined only last February, has invited a further overhauling of its books.

Douglas Had to Have an Agent.

One of the Directors of the Trust Company of America was asked last night if it was thought that Douglas was the tool of Dennett.

"At the last perhaps he was," he replied. Then he explained that he thought perhaps Douglas began to speculate on his own account. Some timo ago, when there were a number of reorganizations in the air, the clerks in Wall Street did overhear conversations of high officials in their presence and picked up some good things.

But it is a rule among the brokerage houses of standing to have no dealings with men employed in minor positions in financial institutions, and so Douglas would, before he went very far, find the need of a man to do his marketing for him. This may have brought him into contact with Dennett, who, the Director believes, has been in low water financially for a good many years.

Assistant District Attorney Murphy was going through the confessions of Douglas and Dennett all day yesterday, hut refused to discuss them in any way. It was learned, however, from another source that they contain nothing more than an account of their association with each other and the amount of securities taken and the way they were manipulated.

By a curious coincidence Robertson Honey, counsel for Douglas, has just engaged a suite of offices in the new building of the Trust Company of America on Wall Street.

MAY DEFEAT RECOUNT BILL.

Tammany Men in Albany Discuss Effect of the Reconciliation.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, April 29.—As a result of the Tammany-McClellan peace pact the chances of the Recount bill, whose passage Gov. Hughes so earnestly urged in his speech at Cooper Union last night, being enacted have been materially reduced. This is conceded by prominent Tammany members of the Senate who, from being the earnest advocates of the bill, may now line up against it when it comes up on the floor. The bill has already passed the Assembly with a substantial majority.

The Tammany members here are jubilant. In talking to friends they assert emphatically that if peace came at this time it was because the Mayor, with the menace of a recount at hand, stepped down from the uncompromising attitude he had maintained for a year or more. While the general opinion expressed was that no hard and fast agreement binding the Tammany members in their action on the Recount bill was entered into, it is the general belief that concerted action on the part of the New York City Democrats in the Senate to defeat that measure was implied.

At any rate Tammany Leader Murphy has issued his orders and the orders will be obeyed. This will leave Hearst high and dry as far as recount by legislative act is concerned unless the Republicans in the Senate should make a party measure out of the bill, and of this there is little likelihood.

Jerome Hears Debate on Experts.

ALBANY, N. Y., April 29.—District Attorney Jerome listened in the Assembly to-night to a debate on the Moreland bill, which practically does away with expert testimony in capital cases. The bill was soon wrapped in a tangle of technical questions, and it was decided to put further discussion over to May 8.

CHAIRMAN BROWN FOR PEACE.

Wants No Taft-Foraker Contest Until After the November Elections.

TOLEDO, O., April 29.—Walter Brown, Chairman of the Republican State Central Committee, issued the following statement to-day regarding the Taft-Foraker contest:

"No request has been made to me as Chairman of the State Central Committee to call a meeting of that committee for the purpose of considering a State primary election to determine the choice of the Republicans of the State for a Presidential candidate. Until some such request is made, I have nothing to add to what I said when such a primary was first suggested, that in my opinion it would not be feasible to conduct a primary election upon a general election day, and that the sentiment of Republicans in Lucas County, as expressed throughout the newspapers and otherwise, is overwhelmingly opposed to engaging in any contests within the party, save such as relates wholly to municipal matters, until after the municipal elections in November."

Mr. Brown has said to his friends that the members of the State Committee are not tied to either Foraker or Taft to the extent that they would act arbitrarily on any one subject which might be of particular interest to either of them. That is to say, the committee would not let either dictate just what must be done.

C. E. BEDFORD ARRESTED.

Charles E. Bedford of 191 Clinton Avenue, Brooklyn, was arrested last night on the north roadway of the Williamsburg Bridge and taken to the Delancey Street Station, where charges of reckless driving, carrying no lights, and having no license number on his automobile were preferred against him by Policeman Maroney of the Gates Avenue Station, Brooklyn. Mr. Bedford is an oil merchant and a member of the Bedford family interested in Standard Oil.

According to Maroney, he was riding in an automobile. He said that when Bedford saw he was being followed, he stopped his car suddenly, and the policeman's auto struck the Bedford machine, and Maroney was thrown out, landing on his back.

Mrs. Pizowsky, who said her husband was a saloonkeeper at 108 Delancey Street, went on Bedford's bond, and he was released.

This was Bedford's version of the incident:

"I was operating my own car and had Arthur Lewis, a friend, with me. I was crossing the bridge on the upper roadway when I saw the automobile above me. I was anxious to pass them and blew my horn. Then I saw that one automobile was pulling the other.

"There was a policeman in the crippled machine. I managed finally to pass them, making not better than twelve miles an hour. I had not gone far when the first of the two automobiles whizzed by us at forty miles an hour, and the man operating the car cut in directly in front of me, evidently forgetting that there was a car tied on behind. The injured machine crashed into mine aad the policeman was tossed out.

"I was not violating the speed law, had both lights burning, and also the proper number on my automobile." The case will come up in the Essex Market Court this morning.

ARRESTS TO FOLLOW INSURANCE CHARGES

Jerome to Push Forgery Allegations Against New York and Mutual Life Agents.

AFTER REFORMERS, TOO

Irregularities Discovered in Their Ballots, it is Said—Agent Frank Already Summoned.

It was learned yesterday that the well-known insurance man who had beea requested to call oa District Attorney Jerome to discuss the charges of fraud and forgery which have been made by the International Policy Holders' Association in connection with the election of directors in both the New York and Mutual Life Insurance Companies, is Jacob Frank, a prominent agent of the New York Life Insurance Company. Mr. Frank is an agent who was especially active in the canvass for ballots. Among the charges that are under investigatioa by the District Attorney's Office is the one that a single agent of the New York Life personally turned in 250 forged ballots. Criminal proceedings agaiast certain individuals, it was said on high authority, are soon to be brought.

It was expected that Mr. Frank would appear at the District Attorney's Office yesterday. The agent bad seen fit to employ counsel, however, and his attorney kept the engagement with Assistant District Attorney Smyth, who was assigned to the work by Mr. Jerome. To him the lawyer explained that it would he more convenient for Mr. Frank to call upon the District Attorney this morning, and at last Mr. Smyth agreed to this delay.

It was said yesterday that the examination of Mr. Frank will only shortly precede the commencement of proceedings before a Magistrate, at which the charges of forgery as well as the entire conduct of the recent insurance elections, will be sifted to the bottom.

Warrants for Alleged Forgers.

Assistant District Attorney Smyth, who, with Assistant District Attorney Howe, has had charge of the investigation since the attention of the District Attorney's office was first called to the matter by the International Policy Holders' Association, had fully intended to present to the Grand Jury this week the facts which his investigation has unearthed. It has been decided that the Grand Jury will not sit through this week, however, and Mr. Smyth will endeavor to accomplish his purpose by a Magistrate's proceedings. Warrants will be served on several men, whose names Mr. Smyth declines to divulge at this time, and brought before a Magistrate for examination. In this event, should the facts in the possession of Mr. Smyth be deemed of sufficient weight, they can be held for the action of the next Grand Jury.

Mr. Smyth, accompanied by Mr. Howe, visited the offices of the New York Life Insurance Company yesterday, and there examined about 500 of the ballots which, it is charged, were forged. Upon his return the Assistant District Attorney refused to make any statement as to what he had learned. Mr. Smyth stated, however, that any investigation which is conducted through his office will concern itself with both sides of the question. No counter-charges have been brought against the International Policy Holders' Association by the insurance companies, but the investigations which the District Attorney has already conducted have brought to light certain irregularities in the hallots of the Policy Holders' Association, as well as in the "administration" ballots.

Scrugham at Jerome's Office.

George R. Scrugham, Chairman of the International Policy Holders' Association, called upon Assistant District Attorney Smyth twice yesterday, once in the morning and again in the afternoon. He was in conference with Mr. Smyth for nearly an hour, in that time making a long statement, which was taken down by a stenographer. Later, Charles Stirrup, who was the chief watcher for the International Policy Holders' Association at the Mutual election, called upon Mr. Smyth, together with C. F. Carrington, who filled a similar position at the election in the New York Life Insurance Company. These men also spent considerable time with Mr. Smyth, in the course of which both made statements, which, like that of Mr. Scrugham, were taken down by stenographers.

Mr. Scrugham last called on Mr. Smyth as recently as Friday of last week, at which time he handed to him additional affidavits of policy holders who swore that their signatures upon ballots had been forged. It is now understood, however, that tho large majority of these affidavits were in connection with the New York Life election. In the Mutual Life the "administration" ticket has already been declared elected, and only one or two affidavits charging forgery in connection with this election have been supplied to Mr. Smyth. The charges made in reference to both the insurance companies are identical, however, and it is felt that whatever decision may be reached in the investigation of the New York Life's election will apply equally to that of the Mutual.

McGarry Acquitted in Buffalo.

BUFFALO, April 29.—"Not guilty" was the verdict returned to-night by the jury in the case of Aloysius S. McGarry, who was charged with murdering Josiah Ross, the aged manufacturer. Ross was found dead in the office of his Niagara Street manufacturing establishment on Feb. 19 with a bullet in his head, under circumstances pointing to suicide. McGarry was a junior partner in the firm, but it was asserted that he had not paid for the stock which gave him an interest in the firm.

Robert Graham and Wife Were Unhappy When 15-Year-Old Ties Were Broken.

SOUGHT HOTEL CHAPLAIN

Dr. Warren Again Made Them One and They Promised Never to Quarrel Again.

The marriage on last Thursday of Robert Graham, an automobile manufacturer of Reading, Penn., to his divorced wife, Mrs. Mercy Bateson Graham, by Dr. Henry Marsh Warren, the hotel Chaplain, revealed a romance which commenced nearly twenty years ago, and which came dangerously near ending in last January, less than four months ago.

As children in Detroit, Robert Graham and Mercy Bateson were sweethearts. They played together, grew up together, and at last married. For a time they lived in their old home, and then with their two small children they moved to Reading.

There they had a happy home until, of a suddea, the little quarrels between them became more frequent. Two years ago there was a final spat, and when it finished, Mrs. Graham packed up her belongings, and, taking her children with her, moved to her childhood home. Soon Mr. Graham received a court legal notice that his wife had started suit for divorce.

The proceedings dragged along, but in January last the decree was granted, and Mrs. Graham found herself free. But then, as she confessed to Dr. Warren on Thursday, she suddenly discovered that she did not want to be free. Apparently Mr. Graham felt the same way. The children, who remained with their mother, begged daily for "Papa," and one day papa called at the house.

Mrs. Graham received him joyfully, and he called again the next day. The courtship of nearly fifteen years ago commenced all over again, and Mr. Graham courted his divorced wife with the ardor of youth. Once again he asked the question which he had asked her years before, and once again Mrs. Graham said yes. Then they started for New York.

Here they went to the Hotel Breslin, and from there Mr. Graham called up Dr. Warren on the telephone. Arrangements were quickly made, and a few moments later Mr. and Mrs. Graham drove up in a cab to the minister's home, at 98 West Ninety-fourth Street.

"We just found we couldn't get along without one another," explained the man, and Mrs. Graham nodded a blushing assent. "I guess we both of us made some mistakes," he added, when his bride interrupted him, exclaiming:

"But we won't any more."

"The two years that we were separated were bad enough," continued Mr. Graham, "but those days in the last three months before we discovered that we were each as much in love as ever, were the hardest I have ever had to bear."

Once the ceremony was performed, Mr. Graham and the woman who was once more his wife hurried from the minister's home. "We are going right back to Reading and take up our life just where we dropped it two years ago," they explained to Dr. Warren.

HUGHES KILLS BOXING BILL.

ALBANY, April 29.—Gov. Hughes to-night sent to the Senate his veto of the so-called Frawley Boxing bill. The measure passed both houses last year, but Gov. Higgins permitted it to die in the thirty-day period without comment. Gov. Hughes in his veto message said:

"It will be observed that the section as it now stands does not prohibit sparring exhibitions for the purpose of pure sport. It prohibits such exhibitions when an admission fee is charged or received. This restriction has been maintained in the public interest, as it does not interfere with the sport itself, but has been found to furnish a practicable means for preventing the abuses that creep in when such exhibitions are given for the purpose of gain.

"The present amendment allows such exhibitions when an admission fee is charged under the auspices of the Metropolitan Association of the Amateur Athletic Union. But however laudable the purposes of this association, it is still a private association, and it is not easy to sustain a distinction which would give it an exclusive privilege. Other associations, either now existing or hereafter formed, might well claim to be put upon the same footing.

"In my judgment, this is a step in the wrong direction. The bill is not necessary to support a wholesome interest in boxing as a sport. There is no reason why amateur athletic associations should not encourage it and why lovers of the sport should not engage in it under suitable conditions. This they can do without charging an admission fee for exhibitions.

"The wise policy of the State to prevent the excesses which are certain to result if the sport is artificially stimulated by permitting pay exhibitions should be adhered to. The act respecting the original proviso was approved by Gov. Roosevelt, and the act proposing a new proviso very similar to the one now proposed was vetoed by Gov. Higgins."

MAY DELAY BURNHAM TRIAL.

Justice Bischoff to Hear Motion for a Change of Venue.

Supreme Court Justice Bischoff signed an order yesterday directing the District Attorney to show cause why Frederick Burnham, President of the Mutual Reserve Fund Life Association, should not be tried in another county under the indictment for grand larceny found against him. Last week Justice O'Gorman set May 15 as the day for Burnham's trial in the Criminal Branch of the Supreme Court. Because of this, the attorney for Burnham asked Justice Bischoff to stay the trial until after the motion for a change of venue could be decided.

Justice Bischoff denied this motion, and it was renewed before Justice Gildersleeve, who is now sitting in the Appellate Term. He granted a stay until May 9, and for as long a time afterward as there shall be no decision entered on the motion. The affidavit in support of this motion declares that there exists a prejudice in the minds of New York County people against the defendant, and it will be impossible for him to obtain a fair and impartial trial unless the venue is changed.

CORONER PROBES WOMAN'S DEATH

Hears Mrs. McBride Asked Christian Scientists for a Doctor, but Was Refused.

MRS. CHISM ARRAIGNED

McBride Fails to Appear Against Sister-in-Law, Whom He Had Had Arrested.

Coroner Acritelli, who is investigating the circumstances surrounding the death, on Saturday afternoon, of Mrs. Robert McBride, wife of Robert McBride, a Christian Scientist, of 225 West Eightieth Stret, said last night that he was of the opinion that the Christian Scientists who had charge of Mrs. McBride in her last illness had neglected her in not calling in a licensed physician. If Mrs. McBride's physical condition was such that she was unable to determine for herself whether or not medical attention was needed, the neglect in not providing that necessary medical attendance, the Coroner said, might be construed as aiding and abetting a suicide. This is a crime under the laws of the State of New York.

Mrs. Chism, a sister of Mrs. McBride, who was arrested on a charge of disorderly conduct preferred by Mr. McBride, which grew out of Mrs. Chism's remonstrances over his failure to call in a licensed physician to attend her sister, had an interview with Coroner Acritelli yesterday, in which she told the Coroner the whole history of her sister's case, and of the scene at the McBride apartment on Sunday morning which resulted in her arrest. It was after this conference that Coroner Acritelli consented to talk of the criminal possibilities of the case.

"I have consulted with the District Attorney," said Coroner Acritelli, "and have also sought outside legal advice as to the case. I want to find out if the woman had proper medical attention. Her physical condition was such, perhaps, that she was unable to determine for herself whether or not medical attention was needed. Her mind might have been affected by pneumonia, and she might have been incapable of judging for herself.

"If the woman was neglected in not having the proper medical attention, and at the same time her sister insisted that a physician should be called, I am of the opinion that those who were in charge of her case neglected her, and perhaps were aiding and abetting a suicide.

"I am also investigating the case in the Coroners' Office in order to determine if Dr. Weston used due care when he signed the death certificate. I have asked Dr. Weston for a detailed report of the autopsy and the notes which he took.

Mrs. Chism said that before Mrs. McBride died her sister requested that physicians be called in, and that this was denied her. At the inquest, which will be held next week, I will call every witness possible, even if I have to call Mrs. Stetson and Mrs. Eddy."

Mrs. Chism was arraigned in the West Side Court yesterday morning, to answer the complaint of disorderly conduct which had been made against her by Mr. McBride. Magistrate Walsh, after hearing Mrs. Chism's story for a second time, paroled her until her examination next Friday.

When court was opened one of those present was the Rev. Dr. A. Lincoln Moore, pastor of the Riverside Baptist Church. Dr. Moore said that he had read the story of Mrs. Chism's arrest, and that he considered the affair an outrage. He was willing and ready, he added, to aid her in any way possible.

How the Case Reached the Coroner.

It was learned during the day that it was the arrest of Mrs. Chism for protesting against her brother-in-law's failure to provide proper medical attention for her sister that brought the case to the attention of the Coroner yesterday, although he would no doubt have learned the facts yesterday, when he received the report of Coroner's Physician Weston, who made an investigation of Mrs. McBride's death on Sunday, and allowed a death certificate to be made out. Under the law it is necessary, when a person dies without the attention of a licensed physician within twenty-four hours preceding death, that the Coroner's office shall be notified.

There is reason to believe that this was not done in the McBride case until many hours after Mrs. McBride's death. Dr. Weston explained that his failure to notify the Coroners' office on Sunday was due to the fact that he did not go to the Criminal Court Building on that day. Yesterday the Coroner had a long talk with Mrs. Chism, during which she is said to have given the Coroner the entire history of the illness and death of her sister, who, she said on Sunday, was a victim of the "false teachings of the Eddy cult."

When the case against Mrs. Chism was called yesterday Mr. McBride was not in court. When Mrs. Chism was arraigned she briefly related the story of her trouble. Before she left the court Magistrate Walsh asked her if she knew that he had telephoned to the prison Sunday night, authorizing the police to accept bail for her if it was offered.

"Yes," she answered, "I did hear of it, but I had suffered enough, and did not care then to telephone to any of my friends to go bail for me, as I could have done."

Dr. Moore, after Mrs. Chism left, said that he did not know her, but had read of her case in the newspapers, and had gone to the court to assist her.

According to Mr. McBride's complaint, Mrs. Chism's disorderly conduct when she came to his house and learned that her sister had died consisted in the use of violent and profane language. He added that she was intoxicated. These statements Mrs. Chism characterized as false.

A friend of Miss Margaret Duncan, the healer who attended Mrs. McBride, said that Miss Duncan had told him that when Mrs. Chism insisted that a doctor be called in she and Mr. McBride had gone to the sick room and asked the patient if she wanted a physician. Mrs. McBridge, she said, replied that she did not. Asked if she feared arrest as a result of the failure to call in a licensed physician to attend Mrs. McBride, Miss Duncan replied that she did not.

"God will protect me," she is reported to have answered.

V. O. Strickler, head of the Christian Science Publication Committee for New York State, made a statement yesterday afternoon with reference to the death of Mrs. McBride, in which he cited as a justification of Mr. McBride in his failure to call in a licensed physician the opinion of Dr. Willam Osler, Regus Professor of Medicine in Oxford University.

"With the arrest of Mrs. Chism," said Mr. Strickler, "and the unfortunate circumstancea connected therewith, Christian Science is not concerned. That is a matter of which the court had jurisdiction, and without doubt a perfectly proper decision will be made. Christian Scientists are interested in the discussion now going on about the case of Mrs. McBride only so far as it affects the right of persons to choose whatever method of treatment for sickness they prefer. This right happily is guaranteed no less by law than by public opinion. If one has more faith in prayer and another in drugs each has a right to his choice.

"The autopsy showed that Mrs. McBride died of pneumonia, and upon this question it will be interesting to hear what Dr. William Osler, commonly recognized as a great man in his profession, says in his "Textbook of the Theory and Practice of Medicine":

Quotes Dr. Osler.

"'Pneumonia is a self-limited disease, which can neither be aborted nor cut short by any known means at our command. The young practitioner may bear in mind that patients are more often damaged than helped by the promiscuous drugging which is still only too prevalent.'

"He also enumerates a startling number of diseases about which he makes the same statement. He is only one of many leading physicians who have placed themselves upon record to the same effect."

In this connection a physician said yesterday:

"Mr. Strickler's use of Dr. Osler's statement is entirely misleading, as a perusal of the distinguished physician's article on pneumonia will show. Dr. Osler never intended to convey the idea that pneumonia is of necessity a fatal disease. He meant that when the ailment invaded the lung a certain length of time must elapse before the resulting changes in the lung tissue could take place and the lung get back to its normal condition and resume its normal functions. In the article quoted Dr. Osler goes on to describe the treatmnt to be used to combat the disease and to sustain the patient until he may recover. About 75 per cent. of pneumonia patients recover."

EXPLAINS TEACHERS' ROW.

Interborough Association Tells of Mix-Up in Meetings.

The Interborough Association of Women Teachers, whose bill for "equal pay for equal work" has been passed by the Legislature and now is awaiting the approval of Gov. Hughes and Mayor McClellan, gave out an official statement yesterday about the clash among its members at the Normal College on Saturday. The members of the association, who were holding a meeting in the chapel of the college, learned that the Protective Association for Teachers Below Grade 4B, which asserts that the teachers' bill does not look after the interests of the teachers in the primary grades, was holding a session in another room. The Interboroughers then rushed into the primary grade teachers' meeting, causing it to come to a hurried close.

District Superintendent Grace C. Strachan, who has managed the campaign for the Interboroughers, issued the statement, which follows:

"We are in no way responsible for the misunderstanding or error that resulted in two different requests for the use of Normal College Chapel being granted for Saturday morning. At 11:10 o'clock we closed our meeting and vacated the platform. As all teachers below the 4B grade had been notified of the 11 o'clock meeting, and as I and others had received personal notice of said meeting, we felt justified in remaining for the second meeting. On learning that the second ing was in progress in another room some of us repaired to same. Notwithstanding the fact that I had received personal notice of the meeting, when I requested the privilege of correcting some misstatements about myself made by one of the speakers, I was not permitted to do so."

THE FIGHTING COUSINS SHEA.

Punch Motorman and Policemen, and Cause Street Car Blockade.

Two cousins Shea held up a long line of Madison Avenue cars yesterday morning while they first put to flight the conductor and motorman of a northbound car at 104th Street, and then battered up a couple of policemen who had appeared to straighten out matters.

The car had stopped at 104th Street, when Policeman Koster saw that the conductor was having a dispute with a tall passenger. As Koster stepped upon the platform the passenger punched his head. In an instant there was a fight on between passenger and policeman.

Policeman Hartmeyer, a block away, seeing the commotion, boarded the car, in turn to be met by another passenger bearing a certain resemblance to the first. This latter pair then indulged in similar exercises. The two sets of combatants fought through the car, and on and off the platform for twenty-five minutes, until the 104th Street Police Station, hearing that there was trouble, turned out the reserves.

Then the two passengers were taken to the station, while the policemen looked to their minor injuries and their torn uniforms. The prisoners said they were Charles Shea of 2291 Madison Avenue and Thomas Shea of Westchester.

Thomas Shea alone was able to go to the Harlem Court, where he was held for further examination. His cousin Charles was in Harlem Hospital.

FOG EMBARGO ON HARBOR.

Big Steamships Are Prevented from Coming In—Broadway Dismal.

Fog put an embargo on New York waters yesterday, and, though there was a fleet of incoming liners anchored outside port all day, they were unable to come to their piers. A few smaller craft got past Quarantine, and in the early afternoon it brightened up so that it was expected that there would be a general incoming of the big fellows.

The curtain of fog soon closed down, however, and by nightfall it was so thick that hardly a propeller was moving on the harbor waters. Ferry boats had been running slow all day, but with the thick fog of the night they began to have trouble. In some cases they were running from ten to twenty minutes behind schedule. Tugs and river craft moved cautiously from place to place with their whistles announcing to those on the water a warning to keep out of their course.

In the fog outside Sandy Hook are anchored the big White Star liner Celtic, from Southampton, with more than 2,000 passengers on board; the Atlantic Transport liner Minnetonka, from London; the Noordam, from Rotterdam, and perhaps half a dozen others. Those equipped with wireless are keeping up a conversation with each other and the shore station.

The result of all this uncertainty as to when the incoming vessels would reach their pier kept the Customs force waiting all day, and it was not until darkness came did the word pass: "Nothing doing to-night."

With the thinning of the fog in the afternoon the marine observer on shore made out the Minnetonka at the juncture of the Swash and Bayside Channels. A tug was standing by, and it was thought that she was aground. A wireless message was received from her skipper late last night saying that his command was anchored at the Southwest Spit, and that he would come into Quarantine with the lifting of the fog.

It was a dismal Great White Way last night. The fog was so thick that at a distance of but a few feet the electric lights appeared like dim blotches in a murky darkness. The cars bowled along at a slow pace, and even the all-night cabby seemed affected by the melancholy of the fog.

FAT WOMAN FOUND DEAD.

Mrs. Feinberg Was 4 Feet 7 Inches Tall and Weighed 300 Pounds.

Mrs. Minnie Feinberg, four feet seven inches in height, and weighing almost 300 pounds, was found dead in bed at her home, 1,464 Second Avenue, yesterday by her daughter, Sarah, who, although only 14, weighs 180 pounds. Morris, the father, is a little man. His son, Louis, 9 years old, is as large as boys of 17. Mrs. Feinberg's brother weighs more than 300 pounds.

Mrs. Feinberg was 42 years of age. Dr. Abraham Mayer informed the Coroners' Office of her death. It is believed that Mrs. Feinberg either smothered in her sleep, as she was afflicted with asthma, or died from an attack of heart disease.

SPRING FEVER LURES BOYS TO RUN AWAY

Son of the Rev. Dr. Wylie and Chum Took French Leave on Friday to Go Fishin'.

SOLD BIKES TO RAISE $25

Parents, Who Say They're Model Boys, Are Anxious—One Father Hurries from Chicago.

Regulation Spring fever—the boy brand—coupled with the irresistible memory of a fishing camp last Summer, are believed to have lured from their homes on last Friday John McWilliams Wylie, the 15-year-old son of the Rev. Dr. David G. Wylie, pastor of the Scotch Presbyterian Church, Central Park West, and Ninety-sixth Street, and Sylvester Gutilius, six months older, the third son of William G. Gutilius, a circulation agent of 855 Central Park West.

Yesterday Dr. Wylie and Mr. Gutilius, who had just come from Chicago in response to a letter from his wife, notified Police Headquarters, and a general alarm was sent out. Meanwhile the two families had been quietly investigating several clues.

Mrs. Gutilius told yesterday of the preparations the boys had made. Evidently, she said, they wanted to go fishing, and the excitement and mystery of running away only made a few weeks in the woods seem the more attractive.

The boys had known each other for four years, and since last September had lived just around the corner from each other. Their particular intimacy, however, only dates back two or three weeks, to the time when the grass over the wall in Central Park first began to show green. Their plan was evidently completed on last Wednesday.

They sold their bicycles that day. John got $8 for his and Sylvester, who, says his mother, is known as "Buster" for his awful power over furniture, got slightly less for his dusty machine. Small sums in their toy savings banks brought their total up to about $25.

"Surely Bus," she said, "you aren't going away without telling us?"

"That would be the inference," returned the boy.

"But I want the facts," said his mother. "Remember, you are the man of the house, now that your father and brothers are away. Has John packed his case, too?"

But Buster referred her to John for that, and as to his own plans would go no further than the "inference." That night he played over some hymns on the piano, among them "Yield Not to Temptation."

The boys left their homes the next morning—John, it was thought, for his high school and Sylvester for the City College, where he is a freshman. They did not return.

In the hurry of departure the boys seem to have left their baggage behind. At least, Buster's suit case, still packed, was found in his room, and a neighbor said later that he had seen the boys walking together, neither carrying anything.

In Buster's suit case was found a white marooner's outfit, and in one corner, said Mrs. Gutilius, "a book of recipes."

Inquiry at docks and ferries revealed that two boys answering to the description of the runaways had tried to get half-rate tickets to Scranton.

"The idea of big old Buster trying to go half rate!" laughed Mrs. Gutilius, a little tearfully.

Harry Wylie, John's brother, followed up the clue without success, and from Scranton he went to Newlin, Penn., where a fishing camp is located which John had read about in an advertisement. No trace of the boys was found, and the families are working on an idea which suggests that they boarded the Adirondack for Albany, expecting to strike out from there on foot. Last Summer Sylvester camped out on the shores of Lake Waubac, near the Connecticut line, and the boys are thought by their parents to be looking for a similar spot.

Dr. Wylie and Mr. Gutilius said yesterday that the boys were model young fellows and had nothing to complain of in their surroundings. The parents say they are only anxious to hear from their sons and that the lads need fear no punishment on their return.

John Wylie is 5 feet 4 inches in height, slim, and fair, with deep-set blue eyes and rather prominent teeth. He was wearing a dark gray suit with a Norfolk jacket and bloomer trousers when he left.

Sylvester Gutilius is 5 feet 6 inches in height, slim, and dark, and his teeth also are prominent. He is deliberate in speech and was wearing a blue cheviot suit, with a blue college cap.

JOURNEAY & BURNHAM IN RECEIVERSHIP

Brooklyn Dry Goods Firm to be Dissolved After Career of Fifty-nine Years.

HAD BEEN RUNNING AT LOSS

Directors Decide to Wind Up Company's Affairs for Benefit of the Stockholders.

There was surprise in Brooklyn business circles yesterday when it became known that the Journeay & Burnham Company, one of the oldest dry goods firms in the borough, had been put into the hands of a receiver. For several years the company has been doing business at a loss, and its affairs are to be closed up at the request of the Directors for the protection of the interests of the stockholders. Supreme Court Justice Thomas yesterday appointed William E. Phillips, President of the company, as receiver.

Frank Harvey Field, counsel for the company, applied for the appointment of the receiver, it having been decided that it would be for the best interests of the corporation to dissolve. In granting the application, Justice Thomas enjoined the creditors of the concern from taking any action until the matter comes up for a hearing on June 17. The amount of the bond to be given by the receiver was fixed at $100,000. The concern is capitalized at $400,000, and the stockholders number between 600 and 700. Against the firm there is $23,000 in unpaid notes and about $75,000 in unpaid bills.

Some of the larger creditors are the H. B. Claflin Company, M. D. Holwill & Co., Spellman & Co., and George H. Montrose of Manhattan; A. Stern of Philadelphia, and the Quaker City Shirt Manufacturing Company of Morristown, Penn. While there is a surplus of assets over liabilities, the corporation felt that it could not continue business without meeting a heavy loss. The Directors have decided that a larger sum will be realized by selling all the effects to one bidder rather than by disposing of them piecemeal.

The store of the Journeay & Burnham Company is on Flatbush Avenue, near Fulton Street. Henry P. Journeay and Lyman S. Burnham organized the business in 1848, establishing themselves in Atlantic Avenue, near Clinton Street. Theirs was one of the first department stores in Brooklyn. Although Hugh Boyd, John M. Conklin, and others were taken in as partners, the house continued to be known as Journeay & Burnham. In 1892 the firm was made a corporation, after the death of Mr. Journeay. At this time the centre of the dry goods trade in Brooklyn had shifted to Fulton Street, above the Borough Hall. Journeay & Burnham then left Atlantic Avenue and moved to their present large store in Flatbush Avenue. Shortly after the removal the common stock of the concern, which had been held in the treasury, was floated. The late Henry S. Ives, who became known as the "Young Napoleon of Finance," was active in the flotation of the stock. He held a large block of stock himself, but later disposed of it. The company was reorganized in 1901, but the business did not improve. Mr. Burnham, one of the original partners, died some years ago.

The present Directors of the corporation are William E. Phillips, Ethan Allan Doty, H. B. Boyd, Edward E. Jordan, Otto Wissner, Isaac Snedeker, and Frank Harvey Field.

Sources of Distinctiveness in Saks Clothes

Talk Number Four, Which Concerns Trimmings

Trimming, under the Saks System, is something more than the mere measuring off of linings and the doling out of buttons. We make it a study in harmony.

A building is only as strong as its foundation, and a suit can be only as good as its linings—basic principles, both.

Grant us that we use only the best of linings in common with others of our craft, perhaps. Yet—there is a further difference.

We carefully consider the texture, color and style of the linings to be used with each garment—even have linings woven to order, if necessary, to secure proper shades or contrasts. This applies particularly to garments with velvet collars.

We even design special buttons for many fabrics and styles—to such lengths do we go in these important details. All of which is another good reason to justify a preference.

THREE PARIS LABOR LEADERS ARRESTED

A Preliminary Measure Before May Day—Other Arrests May Follow.

CITY TO BE AN ARMED CAMP

Rioting Feared In Large Towns—Government to Act Against Public Servants Who Are Agitating.

Special Cablegram.

PARIS, April 29.—Three members of the General Confederation of Labor were arrested this morning by M. Hamard, Chief of the Paris detective force. The most prominent of them is Bousquet, chief leader of the bakers' strike.

When he was arrested Bousquet flew into a fury against M. Clemenceau, calling the Premier a renegade and saying that before he became a Minister he advocated exactly the same ideas as the Confederation of Labor.

Levy, another of the trio arrested, even more bitterly denounced the Premier. "Clemenceau arrests me," he cried. "Clemenceau and Briand and Viviani. But what have they done to arrive where they are now? They preached revolt, and now they have got what they wanted they become Reactionaries."

Levy continued to hold forth in this strain, his language becoming more vehement the more he talked. Finally, when his flood of vituperation had ended, Levy said:

"I am ill."

"All right," said M. Hamard. "Here is a doctor."

The physician made a scrupulous examination of Levy and found him in the enjoyment of perfect health.

These arrests were made as a preliminary May Day precaution. Others may follow. Paris will be an armed camp on Wednesday. The military measures that are being taken are in reality quite as extensive as last year, though the troops will be kept more in the background unless there is actual need of them.

PARIS, April 29.—Dispatches from the Provinces indicate that the Government's energetic measures to preserve order at all hazards have dampened the ardor of the labor organizations, and many of them have abandoned the idea of making demonstrations, believing that they would only lead to collisions with the police, in which the workmen would be the greatest sufferers.

Trouble is likely, however, in the larger seaports—Toulon, Lorient, and Cherbourg—and in the interior cities of Rouen, Lyons, and Limoges, which are revolutionary hotheds.

It was decided at the Cabinet meeting to-day that the time had arrived for energetic action against public servants engaged in agitating for the organization of unions and eventual affiliation with the Federation of Labor. The ringleaders among the postmen and teachers will be summarily discharged.

OLD PEDDLER DIES ALONE.

A Jewish match peddler, known only as "Pop," was found dead in a small, poorly lighted basement room at 1,515 Park Avenue last night. By the grayness of his beard and his manifest inability to get about the streets quickly he was judged to be about 70 years old. He had not been seen since Thursday last. When Policeman Lehane of the East 104th Street Station broke in the door of his room last night his body was lying across the little cot that had served for a bed. An army of rats scurried from the cot to the dark recesses of the room as Lehane entered.

"Pop" rented the room from Samuel Greenblatt, the janitor of the building, in February last, at 50 cents a week. He became a familiar figure in the neighborhood after that, although he sometimes went away so far that he stayed in a lodging house somewhere over night. During the very cold spell in the latter part of the Winter he froze his feet and had to go to Bellevue Hospital. When he returned he could hardly walk at all. Still, he tried it, crawling like a snail over the streets with his matches and shoestrings.

The nearest the old peddler ever got to telling anything about himself was in a conversation with Mrs. Greenblatt, the janitor's wife, about a month ago. He said that he was married and had a wife and daughter living in Passaic, N. J., but that he was estranged from them. He told Mrs. Greenblatt his name, too, but all she could remember about it last night was that it was an "unremembrable and unpronounceable name."

The Coroner and the police searched the dead peddler's effects in an effort to discover something that might lead to his identification, but their search was fruitless.

Notes of Foreign Affairs.

PRAGUE, April 29.—Emperor Francis Joseph left Prague for Vienna to-day after a fortnight's stay at the Bohemian capital. He signalized his departure by addressing a rescript to the Governor of the province, earnestly appealing for conciliation between the Czech and German nationalities. He pointed out that a start had been made in this direction by the introduction of universal suffrage, and concluded: "I would consider it the greatest happiness if I, who have shared all the sorrows and struggles, should now also be able to share the joys of national peace."

LONDON, April 29.—The Colonial Office has received a dispatch from the Governor of the Windward Isles, dated Castries, St. Lucia, saying that the situation has improved. The detachments of police and volunteers from Barbados and St. Vincent have arrived at Castries and no further assistance is required.

ST. THOMAS, D. W. I., April 29.—The squadron of warships which is to represent Brazil at the Jamestown Exposition, consisting of the battleship Riachuelo, the cruiser Barrosa, and the gunboat Tamoyo, arrived here to-day. The squadron will coal and leave on Thursday for Norfolk.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 29.—Ethelbert Watts, the retiring American Consul General here, is only awaiting the arrival of instructions from the State Department before departing to his new post at Brussels, where he will succeed the late George W. Roosevelt as Consul General. Nelson O'Shaughnessy, ex-Third Secretary of the American Embassy at Berlin and recently appointed Third Secretary of the Embassy here, has relinquished the latter appointment to accept a similar post at Vienna.

PANAMA, April 29.—On account of the projected absence of President Amador, who is going away on six months' leave, various changes will take place in the Cabinet. Secretary of State Arias will retire, private affairs urgently requiring his attention. Senor Espriella, Secretary of Finance, will be appointed Minister to Europe; Senor Quintero, Secretary of Public Works, will become Consul General at Hamburg, and Isidore Hazera, the Charge d'Affaires of Panama at Managua, will be appointed to one of the Secretaryships.

CETTINJE, April 29.—One person was killed and thirty persons were seriously injured last night by an explosion of dynamite at the harbor works at Antivari, on the Adriatic. The buildings surrounding the harbor works were badly damaged and the telegraph lines were wrecked.

THE HAGUE, April 29.—An official dispatch from the Celebes Islands says the Dutch troops to-day surprised a rebel band at Akassa, and that the chief of the tribesmen and fourteen of his followers were killed and thirteen surrendered. One Dutch and three native soldiers were killed.

TO EDUCATE CHINESE.

Missionary Conference Votes In Favor of Establishing Schools.

SHANGHAI, April 29.—At to-day's session of the Missionary Conference resolutions favoring the establishment of eighteen union normal schools for industrial education, several union colleges, and one union university, to meet the demand for Western learning, were adopted.

The general subject of evangelistic work was discussed, and it was shown that the educated Chinese are themselves becoming the leaders of the Christian cause in this country.

The Rev. Dr. Walter Lowrie of Paoting-Foo, one of the few survivors in that city of the Boxer outbreak, presided. He said, in part:

"Put more responsibility on the native Church, even though sometimes disappointed in it. Native-trained agents are the prime need. No foreigners can compete with them in knowledge of the language, the people, the customs, the difficulties. This is an economical and a most fruitful agency. Fifteen Chinese evangelists are less expensive than one foreign missionary, and will do as efficient work.

"Eastern and Western Mongolia offer vast fields for which little has as yet been done. It is as difficult to reach Mongols as Mohammedans. For the 20,000,000 of the latter in China there ought to be a systematic campaign. At the present time they are practically unreached."

In the evening there was an address by the Rev. T. W. Pearce on Robert Morrison, the English missionary, the centennial of whose landing at Canton is now being celebrated.

The Rev. J. E. Kittridge of Rochester, N. Y.; the Rev. H. C. Mabie of Boston, Mass., and E. I. Bosworth of Oberlin, Ohio, preached here yesterday.

A LONDON GRAFT SCANDAL.

West Ham Officials on Trial, Charged with Accepting Bribes.

LONDON, April 29.—The first trial here in a long time of municipal officials on charges of receiving bribes began to-day, when six members of the West Ham Board of Guardians and four workhouse and infirmary officials appeared in the dock of the Criminal Court, charged with accepting money for awarding contracts for coal and other supplies and for appointing minor officials.

The sums involved are comparatively small. It is charged, for instance, that a doctor paid $500 for a hospital appointment. Attorney General Walton and three assistants are prosecuting the officials, who are defended by a large array of counsel.

Britain Will Insist on Turkey Repaying Robert Abbott's Ransom.

CONSTANTINOPLE, April 29.—Seventy-five thousand dollars was the ransom paid for the release of Robert Abbott, the son of a prominent British subject residing at Salonika, who was kidnapped from his father's garden on March 24 and liberated when the demands of his abductors had been conceded. The brigands originally demanded $100,000.

The British Government will insist that the ransom be repaid by the Turkish Government.

USKUB, April 29.—The British Consul General at Salonika paid the ransom for the release of Robert Abbott, the Turkish authorities refusing to do so.

Abbott was returned to Salonika to-day.

NO WORD FROM STROMBOLI.

It Is Reported That a Number of Persons Have Been Injured.

ROME, April 29.—At Messina great apprehension continues to prevail over the eruption of the Stromboli volcano. The condition of the volcano is still unknown, as smoke and fog prevent signals being exchanged between Sicily and the Island of Stromboli.

It is reported, however, that a considerable number of persons have been injured as a result of the eruption, and a torpedo boat has been sent to Stromboli with men and material to assist persons in distress.

A panic still prevails in Calabria, and many persons are fleeing from the villages along the coast.

SAY WE GET THE BEST OF IT.

German Conservatives Don't Want Tariff Modus Prolonged.

BERLIN, April 29.—The provisional tariff arrangement between the United States and Germany will be disposed of by the Federal Council in a few days. It then goes to the Reichstag, which will take up the matter and pass the bill prior to its adjournment, which has now been fixed for the week before Whitsunday.

The Lokal Anzeiger hears that considerable opposition is developing among the Conservative parties to the feature of the arrangement prolonging it tacitly if neither party denounces it. The Conservatives fear this will mean an indefinite continuance of the provisional arrangement, giving the United States all the advantages of a good commercial treaty without any of the equivalents which she would have to give in order to get a treaty.

The Conservatives say that this feature may postpone the conclusion of a treaty to the distant future.

Revolts In Ecuador Feared.

PANAMA, April 29.—Advices from Ecuador are to the effect that serious trouble is expected in that country in connection with the Congressional elections, which are set for May 5. The Government has already suppressed an incipient revolutionary movement in Quito, but the latest reports indicate that disaffection has spread, and outbreaks are expected at several other points.

Canal Commissary Head Resigns.

PANAMA, April 29.—Henry Burnett, manager of the Commissary Department, has resigned, and John Burke, Assistant Chief of the Department of Material and Supplies, has been appointed to succeed him.

AMERICAN ARTISTS SHINE AT SALON

Lead All Foreign Exhibitors in Number and Excellence of Works.

SHOW A VERY GOOD ONE

PARIS, April 29.—President Fallières and his suite, accompanied by the representatives in France of foreign nations, including Henry White, the American Ambassador, this afternoon inaugurated the Salon of the Society of French Artists in the Grand Palais. To-morrow is varnishing day, and on Wednesday the exhibition will be opened to the public.

It is the unanimous verdict of the critics that the exhibition of paintings and sculptures surpasses any seen in a dozen years. America, for the first time, leads all foreign countries, both in the number of works displayed and in excellence. This is recognized, and a prominent place has been accorded to American canvases. England obtains second place.

The entire exposition is remarkable for the uniformly high standard of the works. Only 1,600 pictures are shown, the jury having ruthlessly rejected those of over 4,100 aspirants. Paintings of the decadent and impressionist schools have been rigorously excluded.

The sensation of the Salon is a huge canvas by William Laparra, who won the Prix de Rome last year. The painting was originally entitled "Grandeur Militaire," but this subsequently was changed to "Le Piedestal." It represents the incarnation of war in the person of a man on horseback relentlessly mounting through fire and blood to glory over the bodies of dead men and starving women and children. The picture is bold in conception and execution.

One of the most artistic canvases is that by Joseph Bail, which shows two nuns in a convent. The Marquise de Wentworth's portrait of President Roosevelt ranks among the best portraits, while Herbert Ward's "Idol" and S. E. Fry's "Indian Chief," executed for the City of Oskaloosa, Iowa, are among the best pieces of sculpture.

UMBRIAN ART EXHIBITED.

PERUGIA, April 29.—King Victor Emmanuel, who was accompanied by Foreign Minister Tittoni and Education Minister Rava, to-day inaugurated in the Municipal Palace here, a large and beautiful edifice built in the year 1271, a most complete exposition of ancient Umbrian art, arranged chronologically and comprising a thousand pictures and thousands of other objects, including sculpture, miniatures, jewelry, arms, porcelain, pottery, &c.

Among the most interesting exhibits are the pontifical robes which belonged to Pope Benedict XI., (1303-04,) which were found buried with him in the historic Church of San Domenico here.

PEACE DELEGATES CHOSEN.

D'Estournelles, Bourgeois, and Renault to Represent France.

PARIS, April 29.—Léon Bourgeois, the ex-Premier; Senator Baron d'Estournelles de Constant, President of the Parliamentary Group favoring international arbitration, and Louis Renault, one of the permanent representatives of France on The Hague Arbitration Tribunal, have been appointed delegates of France to the Second Peace Conference at The Hague.

VIENNA, April 29.—Privy Councilor Merey von Kaposmere, Baron von Macchio, and Prof. Heinrich Lammasch have been appointed principal Austro-Hungarian delegates to The Hague Peace Conference.

The naval delegate of Austria-Hungary will be Rear Admiral Haus, and the military delegate Major Gen. Baron von Gleslingen.

LONDON, April 29.—With the appointment of Lieut. Gen. Sir Edmond Roche Elles, military member of the Governor General's Council in India, as military expert; Capt. Charles Langdale Ottley, Director of Naval Intelligence, as naval expert, and a large staff of attachés, included among whom is Lieut. Col. Henry Yarde-Buller, Military Attaché to the Northern European Courts, the British delegation to the Peace Conference at The Hague is now complete.

CHRISTIANIA, April 29.—Dr. F. Hagerup, Minister to Denmark, will, according to the Aftenposten, be the Norwegian delegate to the Peace Conference at The Hague.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 29.—Inquiries made in authoritative quarters to-day regarding the report circulated abroad to the effect that Russia will propose that the Second Peace Conference at The Hague, which is to assemble June 15, be postponed, in order to avoid anti-German complications in the course of the meeting, resulted in the rumor being officially denied.

TWO MONTAGNINI VICTIMS.

One French Minister Dismissed and Another Transferred.

PARIS, April 29.—The Cabinet at its meeting to-day confirmed the dismissal of Edgar Lemarchand, the French Minister to Central America, who, according to one of the letters of Mgr. Montagnini to Papal Secretary of State Merry del Val, had agreed to obtain from the Foreign Office here certain documents for the Vatican.

Alfred Dumaine, the French Minister at Munich, who is involved to a lesser extent in the Montagnini disclosures, has been transferred to Mexico.

M. Delavaud, French Minister to Norway, and M. Gregueli, Secretary of the French Legation at Christiania, who also were under charges, have been exculpated.

SNOWSTORMS IN EUROPE.

Winter Sports Resumed In Silesia—Snow In North Italy.

BERLIN, April 29.—Snowfalls continue to be reported from various parts of Germany. Last night Fichtelgebirge, in Northern Bavaria, had a worse storm than any in January. In the valleys at the foot of the mountains the snow is three feet deep and travel is obstructed.

Snow fell at Munich and throughout the Isar Valley to-day, and new snow is so thick in the Riesengebirge district of Southern Silesia that numerous avalanches have fallen and Winter sports have been resumed.

A severe frost prevailed throughout the Thuringian forest last night, with snow in places.

ROME, April 29.—A cold wind, which arose suddenly to-day, is blowing over the peninsula, particularly in the northern part, where also a severe snowstorm is in progress.

In the Alps and in the Provinces of Belluno and Bergamo the snowfall has reached several inches.

PRESIDENTS TOOK TURNS.

But Didn't Play Fair and Another War Began In Honduras.

PUERTO CORTEZ, Honduras, April 23, via New Orleans, April 29.—Fresh fighting has occurred in Honduras, the latest hostilities being a battle in the streets of the capital city between factions of the victorious Honduran rebels who a few weeks ago helped Nicaragua to overthrow the Government.

A letter which escaped the censorship and arrived here says that an April 8 fighting began because of the unusual kind of government which the leaders had tried. Three of these leaders, Rosalcs, Bustillo, and Castro, agreed to take turns as President, each serving fifteen days. Each, however, during his term attempted to strengthen his party by dividing up the patronage where it would do him the most good. Finally the friends of Policarpo Bonilla proclaimed Bustillo Provisional President without any fifteen-day clause and the opposing factions did the same for Rosales. Then fighting began.

Troops of both sides occupied what is known as University Place, adjoining the Palace. Rosales, from a window of the Presidential palace, shouted to his partisans to open fire. The other side replied, merchants shut their shops, and a battle was on in the principal business streets of Tegucigalpa. Badly aimed bullets were showered upon the houses, but caused only seven deaths.

An almost comic opera ending closed this battle when Gen. Leguel R. Davila, who is now Provisional President, rushed among the combatants and persuaded their leaders to stop the fighting.

Later another battle was started near the town, but this time the Nicaraguan invaders marched up and literally arrested all the troops of both factions. Not a shot was fired by the Nicaraguans. Later Davila became President, with the faction leaders holding the Ministerial offices.

The Nicaraguans continue to police the capital, and it is safe to say that if President Zelaya withdraws his forces from Honduras the strongest faction will take possession and proclaim a President. These same conditions may make it necessary for the American gunboats to continue indefinitely their protection of foreign interests. Already forced loans in Tegucigalpa and the infusion of paper money into the currency have about paralyzed the commerce of that city. These conditions would probably extend to the coast towns within forty-eight hours after the departure of the American bluejackets.

LEOPOLD SEES FALLIERES.

It Is Believed He Will Make a Feint by Offering the Congo State.

PARIS, April 29.—King Leopold's visit to Paris at a time of political crisis in Belgium and his lengthy conferences to-day with President Fallières, Minister of Foreign Affairs Pichon, and Premier Clemenceau have given rise to considerable gossip and speculation. The prevailing impression appears to be that the King intends to make a feint by offering the Congo Free State to France for the purpose of coercing the Belgian Parliament into complying with his wishes.

President Fallières has arranged a gala luncheon at the Elysée Palace to-morrow in honor of King Leopold.

Siberian Dogs for Wellman.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 29.—Through the agency of the American Consul General, Mr. Watts, a train of twenty-nine Siberian sledge dogs has been obtained for the Wellman expedition. They are large, sturdy males, selected by Mr. Tronheim, who got dogs for several previous expeditions. They were obtained in the remote interior of Siberia, and are now at Tobolsk. The dogs will be shipped, via Archangel, to Mr. Wellman's base in Norway.

Eighteen Belgian Miners Killed.

LIEGE, April 29.—Eighteen miners were to-day cut off by a flood in the Angleur pit, three miles southeast of this city. Two hundred others succeeded in making their escape. The flood occurred without warning in a gallery at a depth of over 200 feet from the surface. A majority of the men who escaped were dashed to the bottom of the shafts, whence they were hoisted to the surface. The entombed men were prevented by falls of earth from making their way out. Relays of salvagers immediately began work. They recovered nine bodies, and hope has been given up that any of the entombed men will be rescued alive.

LAUNCH KING'S YACHT TO-DAY

New Turbine for His Majesty Ready to Go Overboard.

The new turbine yacht for King Edward is expected to be launched from the shipyard of A. & J. Inglis at Pointhouse, England, to-day, and will be one of the finest turbines afloat. She will be called Alexandra in honor of the Queen, and will be launched with appropriate ceremony. The boat is to take the place of the larger steam yacht Victoria and Albert, and will be used by the royal family alone for short cruises.

The boat was first built in miniature and submitted to the King for his approval. She was then reproduced on the larger scale, and fulfilled her promise of being an extremely smart, attractive looking craft. She has fine lines, well drawn out, but not so keen as to unfit her for comfortable cruising. She will not be equipped for especially high speed, though she is expected to develop in the neighborhood of 18 knots.

The boat is 285 feet long—about the size of Howard Gould's Niagara—with 40 feet beam and displacement about 2,000 tons. She will be the second largest turbine yacht afloat, being slightly smaller than the new turbine Wakiva, just built for L. V. Harkness of New York. She will have three turbines, each driving an independent shaft.

The interior arrangements of the boat are especially commodious. Required to accommodate only the members of the royal family, all the cabins are spacious, airy, and high roofed. The smoke room and the Queen's drawing room are the principal salons, both being placed on the after deck. The fittings are luxurious.

FOUGHT ON BOTH SIDES.

John Trembley, Veteran of the Civil War, Dead at 73.

Special to The New York Times.

RAHWAY, N. J., April 29.—John Trembley, aged 73 years, father of Councilman David Trembley, is dead here. He was a pensioner of the late war, an honorably discharged soldier, and yet ineligible to the Grand Army of the Republic.

In 1860 Mr. and Mrs. Trembley lived in Georgia, where he was drafted into the Confederate Army and sent to the front. Mrs. Trembley and her children were smuggled through to Rahway, her native city. Early in 1862 Mr. Trembley escaped through the lines and got inside the Union Army's fortifications. He enlisted in Company D, First Tennessee Volunteer Infantry, in which previous to his discharge in June, 1865, he fought in over thirty battles, many times against his old command, some of whom he helped to take prisoners. He was pensioned at $12 a month, but bearing arms, though unwillingly, against the flag debarred him from the Grand Army of the Republic.

AMERICAN ROADS NEED BETTER RAILS

E. L. Zalinski Declares They Can Be Made with the New Hermet System.

STEEL UNDER COMPRESSION

Process in Use Abroad, but Steel Corporation Has Thus Far Declined to Adopt It.

E. L. Zalinski, retired army officer and engineer, gave out a statement yesterday concerning a new process of making steel which he said would go far toward reducing the number of broken rails, a subject which the State Railroad Commission recently thought worthy of an extended investigation. In its report to the Governor the commission stated that during the past Winter, especially in the three months ending March 31, 1907, there had been a total of 3,014 breakages on the principal steam lines of this State alone, and during the corresponding three months of 1906, a total of 826.

According to Mr. Zalinski a newer and a better process of making steel rails is known, with a corresponding assurance of fewer accidents through the breakage of rails. He says that the new process is being used with splendid results in England, Germany, France, and Belgium, and that the United States alone is backward in using the process.

According to his assertion the United States Steel Corporation has been asked by several of the larger railroads to make the rails which these companies use by the new process, a request which has been denied. That it would reduce the number of accidents through broken rails very considerably, Mr. Zalinski said, was a self-evident fact. He would not, however, venture on an estimate of the percentage of reduction which would be caused by using the newer and better made rails. The only additional expense, which would be entailed upon the United States Steel Corporation in making the steel, he said, would be the machinery which will be required for the new process.

The new process is known as the Hermet. "It is a process of compression," Mr. Zalinski went on to explain. "In the process of solidification the object is to, as far as possible, prevent the formation of defects which are found in ingots allowed to cool undisturbed.

"The steel within the ingot mold, though it may be of the finest quality while in the liquid state, can completely change its character during the passage into the mold. It may either be left to shrink freely; may be subjected to compression by the Withworth system, or subjected to compression by the Hermet system.

"Without studying successively any of these systems it should be remarked that liquid steel immediately on being poured into the mold forms a solid crust, owing to the contact with the cold walls. This increases in thickness, rapidly forming a shell which assumes the shape of a vase filled with liquid metal. It is at this moment that the process of compression should intervene, and it is essential to have recourse to this if it is desired to preserve the steel from the defects which are liable to cause deterioration."

At some length Mr. Zalinski explained the old systems which seek to compress the liquid mass from the top. This, as he explained, still leaves the mass cooled first against the mold and produces ridges, flaws, and defects in the steel. The new, or Hermet system, as he pointed out, compresses from the base. "If this external shell is forced upward, upon the central mass, and compelled to follow the shrinking movement, or even to close in at a rate somewhat quicker than that at which the volume diminishes, the formation of cavities and internal faults will be avoided," he said.

Mr. Zalinski showed photographs of steel made by the old as well as the new process. In the uncompressed steel there are great ridges and fissures, in the compressed steel the homogeneity of the mass is much greater. Summarizing the claim for the steel made by the Hermet system as compared with the others now being used Mr. Zalinski said for it:

"It is more perfect in its physical structure, free from shrinkage cavities and piping, much more uniform in its chemical composition, gives 25 per cent. more available metal in the ingots produced, and requires a much smaller amount of forging to secure the best results."

The process is used at Cammles's in England, Beardmore's works in Glasgow, at the Oberbilk Works at Düsseldorf, and is also being installed by John Brown & Co. and Firths. It is extensively used for making gun metal.

Killed by Railroad Detective.

Henry Michaels, 21 years old, died at his home, 114 West End Avenue, yesterday morning from a bullet wound in the abdomen inflicted by Charles Hette, a railroad detective, in a fight with Michaele and his brother Peter in the freight yards at Eighty-fourth Street and the North River about 3 o'clock Sunday morning. Hette fired two shots. One proved mortal for Henry and the other hit Peter in the right leg, inflicting a slight wound. Hette said that the brothers were trying to break into loaded freight cars, and had already broken the seals on three when he discovered them.

HAMMERSTEIN A WITNESS.

Again Declares That Sunday Night Shows of the Victoria Were Legal.

The reference in the suit of the City of New York to revoke the license of Oscar Hammerstein for theatrical performances in the Victoria Theatre was continued yesterday before ex-Supreme Court Justice Lawrence, the referee appointed to discover whether Mr. Hammerstein violates the Sunday theatre law. It is contended by the representatives of the city that two Sunday night performances at the Victoria, Nov. 25 and Dec. 2, last year, were illegal.

Mr. Hammerstein testified yesterday that he viewed both performances from a box. He declared that there had been nothing illegal. He was questioned about two comedians who appeared on the night of Dec. 2.

"What would you call their act?" he was asked.

"A talking act."

"What is the significance of that term?"

"God knows," replied Mr. Hammerstein with a grin.

After characterizing several other features of the Sunday night shows, Mr. Hammerstein was asked about the singing songs by a girl who, he declared, had a very bad voice.

"What would you call that?" he was asked.

"An operatic act."

"Would you put that act on in your Opera House?"

"Not if I valued my life." And then he added: "You see, the people who go to the theatre on Sunday night go to relax their minds. They probably would not appreciate grand opera; it would not mean anything to them. It's all the same anyhow."

"In singing the songs you mention, did or did not the singer enter into and impersonate the characters whether they were or were not grand opera selections?"

"No, not at all," replied Mr. Hammerstein. "She wore no special costume and she did not announce what she was going to sing. She came out, went back, and came out again."

"What did she do then?"

"She repeated the offense a third time."

"And you say she wore no costume?"

"There you are," responded Mr. Hammerstein. "It is a very open question as to what is a costume."

SLATE CLEAN, SAYS BINGHAM.

Drops Charges Against Inspectors—Lieut. Taylor Gets Wall Street Job.

Commissioner Bingham announced yesterday that he would dismiss some charges that have been pending against ex-Inspectors Richard Walsh, Jamee Kane, and Thomas Murphy.

"From April 19," he said, "we want to date a clean slate. The charges against the three men named are wiped off the book. We'll start all over again."

April 19 was what is now known in the Police Department as Black Friday. It was then that Commissioner Bingham reduced eight Inspectors to mere Captaincies, made some Inspectors out of Captains, and sent out some twenty-odd Lieutenants, formerly Detective Sergeants, to do work in uniform in small, obscure precincts.

At that time Murphy was sent to command the Adams Street Station in Brooklyn as a Captain, Kane was brought up to the West Twentieth Street Station to do the same kind of work, and Walsh was allowed to hold his Inspectorship over the upper west side, the new Tenderloin, one of the most important districts in the city.

The charges against the three men, however, were not grave at first. Murphy was up on some technical error. Ex-Deputy Commissioner Mathot made a raid over the head of Kane about a year ago at Far Rockaway, and Deputy Commissioner Hanson did the same to Walsh a month or so ago in the upper Tenderloin.

Commissioner Bingham denied the substance of some of the reports in yesterday's morning papers which told that on Sunday afternoon he had whirled into the Tenderloin station, berated everybody in general, and had struck a policeman with his walking stick. He said that most of the stories, except where they told that he was there, were lies.

The place of "Sir Johnny" Dunn, who was transferred from the leadership of the Wall Street branch of the Detective Bureau last Friday to do uniform Lieutenant duty behind a desk in Canarsie, was filled yesterday by Lieut. John Taylor. The new man who takes "Sir Johnny's" chair at 13 Wall Street has been on the force thirty years.

THAW DEFENSE REBUFFED.

Lawyer Peabody Loses Motion for Return of Papers and Exhibits.

A. Russell Peabody of counsel for Harry K. Thaw, appeared before Justice Fitzgerald yesterday and moved for the return of all the papers and exhibits of the defense which had been submitted either at the trial or before the lunacy commission. After listening to the attorney's argument the Justice denied the motion.

$11,000 for Children's Aid Society.

The Children's Aid Society has received an endowment of $11,000 in memory of the late Mrs. William Colford Schermerhorn the interest on which is to be used to support the boys' club at the West Side Industrial School at 417 West Thirty-eighth Street. Mrs. Schermerhorn financed the club from 1903 until her death, and this fund insures the permanency of the classes in carpentry, metal working, physical culture, and literature.

Italians Held for Carrying Weapons.

Twenty-eight Italians gathered up in various sections of the Bronx on Sunday by Capt. Price and his staff were arraigned before Magistrate Crane, in the Morrisania Court yesterday morning on charges of carrying concealed weapons. Twenty of them were held in $500 bail each for trial, one was fined $5 for interfering with an officer, and seven were discharged.

FIVE FALL 150 FEET IN WILD ELEVATOR

CROUCH ON FLOOR OF CAR

A freight elevator in the Parker Building, at Fourth Avenue and Nineteenth Street, became unmanageable at the fifth floor yesterday afternoon and shot to the roof. When it had reached the limit of its upward flight, about 150 feet above the street, the cable was slipped from its block and the elevator then fell to the basement. All of its five passengers were injured, four of them so seriously that they were sent to hospitals, and the fifth escaped with bruises and a shaking up.

At the time of the accident the car was in charge of Operator Andrew Mosby of 39 West Ninety-ninth Street. In it were Frederick Carbarini, of Bedford and Downing Streets, employed by one of the printing firms in the building; Joseph Coyle, an errand boy, of 201 East Thirty-seventh Street; Setreg Mouradian, an Armenian, of 327 East Twenty-third Street, and Martin Rapley, employed by a publishing plant in the building at 111 West 143d Street.

All of the passengers had gotten on at the ground floor, and no stop had been made up to the fifth floor, when the Armenian, who had put a number of rugs in the car, said that he wished to get off at that floor. Mosby tried to stop the elevator, which is run by electricity, but the controlling lever had no effect.

Before those in the car had realized what was happening the elevator was near the top of the shaft at the twelfth floor. A few seconds more and the top of the car had struck the sheave wheels and the drum over which the cables turn. Wheels, cables, and rack, becoming loosened, gave way.

There was now nothing to hold the car. Instantly it began to dart down the shaft toward the bottom.

"Get on the floor, men, the shock'll be less!" Mosby shouted.

In a panic all of them obeyed his voice. The boy, Joseph Coyle, thinking to lessen the shock still further, burrowed into the pile of rugs.

As the car struck the pads in the basement the wheels and the cable which had broken from their fastenings at the top of the shaft came down on the car, shattering it even more than the shock of its sudden impact in the cellar.

The thud as the elevator struck the pads in the cellar was heard throughout the building. Many of the tenants hurried to the Nineteenth Street side of the building to the freight elevators. Oscar F. Shaw, Superintendent of the building, and Engineer W. L. Dulaney, with other employes, went to the cellar. There they heard the moans of the victims in the shattered car.

Before they could get the injured out the wreckage had to be pried away. Four men were then laid out on the cellar floor. Young Rapley, whose injuries were slight, was unconscious.

A call for ambulances had been sent in by Policeman Finnegan of the East Twenty-second Street Station, and three came from Bellevue and one from the New York Hospital.

When the surgeons made an examination it was found that Mosby, the elevator operator, had a broken ankle and was generally bruised; Carbarini's right leg was broken; Coyle, the errand boy, who had buried himself in the rugs, had a broken leg and internal injuries, and Mauradian, the Armenian, had bones broken in his right leg and left arm.

Martin Rapley, who was only bruised and shaken, would not allow them to send him to one of the hospitals, but insisted on going to his home. All of the others were taken to Bellevue Hospital except young Coyle, who went to the New York Hospital. The boy, it was feared, might die of his internal injuries. At Bellevue it was said that all of the men removed there would undoubtedly recover except the Armenian, whose case was doubtful.

Oscar F. Shaw of 502 Madison Street, Brooklyn, the Superintendent of the building, who had declared that the elevator had been inspected but a short time ago and that it was thought to be fit for service, was arrested by Policeman Finnegan on a technical charge of criminal carelessness.

Magistrate Baker, in the Yorkville Court, paroled him in the custody of his counsel, pending an investigation into the causes of the accident.

ELECTRIC MUSIC BOOM.

Plant Here Being Extended, and Other Plants Being Prepared.

Seventy tons of additional machinery have been installed in Telharmonic Hall, Thirty-ninth Street and Broadway, preparatory to giving a series of concerts there in August. The mechanism previously used comprised one hundred and forty-five dynamos, and weighed approximately 200 tons. The new additions consist of keyboards and switchboards, which will make possible the transmission of electric music, with orchestral effects, to many points outside the city as well as to homes and hotels in which it has been heard in the last season.

The concerts held of the new music in this city since January have been very well attended. The installation of similar central plants is being planned, and within a comparatively short time there will be telharmonic music "on tap" in Chicago, Philadelphia, Denver, San Francisco, and Los Angeles. A new factory and laboratory are to be built in France, and central stations are to be established in Great Britain, Germany, France, Austria-Hungary, Belgium, and Spain.

INSURANCE MERGER DENIED.

Officials Say Rumors About Provident Savings and Washington Life Are Untrue.

Persistent rumors that the Provident Savings Life Assurance Society is about to be merged with the Washington Life Insurance Company could not be confirmed yesterday. According to the rumor the Heinze interests, which some months ago obtained a controlling interest in the Provident Savings Life Assurance Society, have now obtained a large interest in the Washington Life.

"I have heard these rumors, but they are absolutely without foundation. So far as I know there is no possibility of any such merger taking place."

One of the high officials of the Provident Savings Life Assurance Society, who asked that his name be not used, also denied the truth of the rumors.

STEVEDORES ON STRIKE.

Mallory Line Employes Quit Work, but Make No Trouble.

All the stevedores of the Mallory Steamship Company at their piers, No. 15 and 16 East River, went on strike yesterday for an increase in wages from 25 to 30 cents an hour and 45 cents an hour for night work. About 400 men quit work.

Supt. Barstow of the company said yesterday that the strikers were making no trouble. He would not try to fill their places until Thursday.

The strikers are not organized and have no leaders. There are among them men of different races, including negroes and Italians. They gathered around the corners near the piers, but as there was no attempt to fill their places there was no picket duty for them to attend to.

Meetings of the stevedores of other coast lines were being held yesterday, and it was said that they would likely strike for the same demands to-morrow. A representative of the Ward Line said that his company was paying the stevedores 25 cents an hour and they appeared to be perfectly satisfied. He would not be surprised, however, he said, if some of them quit, as they generally became restless about May 1.

TRYING TO AVERT STRIKE.

State Agent Confers with Officers of the Coast Line Steamers.

John Lundrigan, special agent of the State Board of Mediation and Arbitration, came here yesterday with two other members of the board to bring about a conference between the officers on the vessels of the coastwise steamship companies and the officials in order to avert the general strike of the officers for higher pay to-morrow. He saw first the officers of the American Association of Masters, Mates, and Pilots, and then tried to see the officials of the companies.

Mr. Lundrigan reported later that he had reason to believe that whatever action is taken by one company will be taken by them all. He will have confirmation to-day.

It was reported by the officers of the union that the Satalla of the Brunswick Line and the Wilhelmina and May of the Bull Line have been supplied with officers at the advanced rates demanded by the men, and that the two lines have agreed to the demands.

FOR MOYER AND HAYWOOD.

Parade, Mass Meeting, and a Benefit Planned by Their Friends.

The Moyer-Haywood Conference, or the Socialistic end of it, is determined, it was learned last night, to make the "undesirable citizen" remark of President Roosevelt a rallying word at the Moyer-Hayword parade and at the mess meeting in Grand Central Palace on Saturday night. Those taking part in the parade are expected to wear buttons inscribed "I am an undesirable citizen."

It was announced also yesterday that a play entitled "The Friends of Labor," by Julius Hoppe, will be given in the Kalich Theatre on the Bowery, beginning on May 21, for the benefit of the Moyer-Haywood fund.

The officers of the American Federation of Labor said yesterday that the Federation will see that the unions are not put in the light of attacking President Roosevelt.

APPROVE THE PRESIDENT.

Boilermakers Indorse His Estimate of Moyer and Haywood.

WASHINGTON, April 29.—George F. Dunn, President, and several other officers of the Brotherhood of Boilermakers, Iron Shipbuilders and Helpers of America were in conference with the President today seeking to have an equalization and revision of wages made at all the navy yards, such as has already been provided for at some of them. The matter will be taken up by the Naval Board having charge of the compensation of employes.

The visitors, it was said officially at the White House, voluntarily expressed to the President their approval of his recent letter concerning Moyer and Haywood, whom the President referred to as "undesirable citizens."

ARBOR DAY THIS WEEK.

Schools Preparing the Observance of It on Friday.

Schools throughout the State are preparing to celebrate Arbor Day on Friday. State Commissioner of Education Draper has issued his annual call for the observance of the day. The public schools of the city, under instructions from the Board of Education, are preparing to plant trees and hold exercises.

Commissioner Draper's report contains the statement that since 1889, when Arbor Day was chosen, the children of the State have planted 318,920 trees on school grounds throughout the State. Despite this fact, investigations have shown that there are 2,000 school lots in the 10,000 School Commission districts of the State on which there is not a tree or a shrub.

SHOOTS WOMAN AND HIMSELF.

Spurned Prussian Comes Across the Atlantic and Murders Miss Korals.

PHILADELPHIA, April 29.—Miss Martha Korals, a Prussian girl, was killed here to-day by Franz Endrukat, who then mortally wounded himself.

Endrukat followed the girl to this country from Pomerania, Rhenish Prussia, where four years ago he attempted to kill her by heating her over the head with a hatchet because she would not marry him. He then cut his throat, and, after lying for four months in a hospital, was sentenced to one year and eight months' imprisonment.

Endrukat to-day met Miss Korais and followed her from the home of her employer to a near-by bakery, and again pressed his suit. The girl told him she would sooner die than marry him, whereupon he drew a pistol and sent two bullets into her head. He then turned the weapon upon himself and sent a bullet into his head, falling unconscious across the body of the girl. Endrukat is 33 years of age, and his victim was 22.

Later Hours at Post Offices.

In consequence of the large increase of Post Office business in this city, Postmaster Willcox has made arrangements by which the Madison Square Station, 310-316 Fourth Avenue, between Twenty-third and Twenty-fourth Streets, and Station H, Forty-third Street and Madison Avenue, will be kept open until midnight daily, except Sundays and holidays, for the sale of postage stamps, &c., and the registration of mail matter.

RUM DEALER A SALVATIONIST.

Sells Saloon and Fast Horses and Now Preaches In Army Band.

Members of the Salvation Army in Brooklyn are elated over the accession to their ranks of a well-known local saloon keeper, who has foresworn intoxicants and fast horses to join the army. He is John Fulton, who for twenty-five years conducted saloons in the Crow Hill and Stuyvesant districts. He was active in Democratic politics. Up to the time he joined the Salvation Army Fulton ran a saloon and hotel on upper Fulton Street.

The Salvation Army has a meeting place in the neighborhood of the saloon. One night Fulton listened to the singing and preaching in the street and became interested. Recently he sold his business and several trotters which he owned and became a member of the army. He is said to have sacrificed a great deal in a business way, as his place was a profitable one. He now takes an active part in the nightly meetings, and many men who were patrons of his place are among his hearers when he preaches with the band in the streets.

WHOLE OF MISSOURI PLEADS FOR CONVICT

A Jean Valjean in Real Life Has Aroused the Sympathy of High and Low.

ESCAPED NINE YEARS AGO

Lived Exemplary Life, Prospered and Married, but Was Recognized and Betrayed by ex-Fellow-Prisoner.

Special to The New York Times.

WASHINGTON, April 29.—The whole State of Missouri has risen up in appeal to President Roosevelt for a pardon for a Western Jean Valjean who has just been recaptured in Kansas City after an upright and prosperous life of nine years, during which he had proved himself one of the best citizens of the place. Missouri is asking the President to give the man a "square deal," and there does not seem to be much doubt that Missouri's request will be granted.

John William January, thirteen or fourteen years ago, when he was just 21 years old, broke into the Post Office at Hennessey, Okla., for the purpose of robbery. He got no booty worth anything, but was caught, tried in the Federal Court at Guthrie, and sentenced to serve five years in the penitentiary.

In prison January was a model of good behavior. He was working for the good-conduct commutation, and had come to within eight months of the time when he would be liberated, when he saw a chance to escape and took it. He worked his way north, and after a time got work on a railroad with a construction gang. He saved his money, and finally had enough to get to Kansas City. There, under the name of Charles W. Anderson, he got a job on a street railway. He was steady and sober, worked hard, and saved his money. Kansas City is a red-hot city politically, and the fact that he never could be induced to vote, even on questions in which the street railroad men were deeply interested, caused some to marvel, but Anderson, aware of his civil disability through his prison sentence, held steadfastly aloof.

At length he saved enough money to buy out a small restaurant near the car barns of the street railroad. His principal customers were his former workmates. He stuck to his restaurant as he had to his railroad work, and as before he prospered. He had lived so long undetected that he began to believe he was safe, so he married and had one child.

He made enough money to buy a better business in a more thriving locality. He sold his first place for a good price, and was looking for a new one when he was caught. It happened that a man who had been in the penitentiary at Leavenworth with him met him on the street and recognized him. The ex-convict followed Anderson and made himself known. Anderson realized at once that he was in the man's hands, and lost if he chose to betray him. The man proposed that they go "downtown and have some fun."

"No," answered Anderson. "I have quit all that. I am married and have a family. I don't want to have anything to do with you."

The convict knew there was a standing reward of $60 for information that would lead to the recapture of escaped prisoners. He got into communication with the prison authorities, and promised, if the money was forthcoming, to reveal the whereabouts of January.

The authorities promised, and the information was given them, with the result that the police of Kansas City were requested to arrest Anderson. Two policemen, hating their task, took the man they knew to have been a good citizen for nine years, and locked him up. Then it developed that the convict who had betrayed him could not receive the reward after all, because such money could be paid only to citizens, and he was outside the pale. So it was offered to the two policemen who made the arrest. Both spurned it.

There was nothing for the court to do but remand Anderson to prison. He did not attempt to deny his identity and went back to Leavenworth to serve out the unexpired portion of his full sentence, all his good conduct commutation having been forfeited by his escape. That was about a week ago.

Kansas City rose up in his behalf, and all Missouri followed the lead of the city. The two policemen who had scorned the blood money accepted it and turned it into the fund that was raised to help obtain Anderson's pardon. Everybody in Kansas City lent a hand. Doctors, lawyers, Judges, merchants, the Mothers and Home Makers' Club, the Board of Trade, the Chamber of Commerce, labor organizations, and private individuals, either signed petitions or wrote directly to the President.

The House of Representatives of the State Legislature, by formal resolution, added its weight to the appeal to Mr. Roosevelt. The Judge before whom January had been tried wrote one of the strongest letters ever received at the Department of Justice, and the warden of the penitentiary made an appeal. Nothing, he said, could better serve to convince the prisoners now in the penitentiary of the relentless pursuit of wrong-doers by the Government than the manner in which January had been brought back after nine years. But the mere bringing him back had served to enforce that lesson. Now there was opportunity to add to it a lesson equally striking, in the mercy as well as the justice of the Government, by giving the man who had proved his reform a pardon for his old offense.

Neither the White House nor the Department of Justice knew at first what it was all about. By the time the slow-going official mail had brought the information there were thousands of unofficial appeals for mercy for January. Then came a sworn certificate that a petition signed by 37,000 citizens of Kansas City was on its way. Senator Warner and Representative Ellis took up the case. Their constituents in solid mass demanded that they should act.

The red tape of official methods compels a little delay. Usually it is a great deal of delay. But in this case the pardon attorney of the Department of Justice will have his opinion ready promptly after the official application from Mrs. Anderson for her husband's pardon is in his hands. Then it will go to Attorney General Bonaparte for his recommendation, and thence to the President for action.

PRESENTS FRANCE'S PROTEST

WASHINGTON, April 29.—The French Ambassador, M. Jusserand, called at the Treasury Department to-day and had a conference with Secretary Cortelyou regarding the complaint made by the Limoges pottery interests of France as to the action of the customs authorities in New York in advancing the duties on Limoges porcelain.

It is understood that the Ambassador laid before Mr. Cortelyou representations from his Government to the effect that the detention at New York of French porcelain was operating very seriously to embarrass a large French industry, and he also conveyed assurances that the goods were really not undervalued, as had been asserted by the customs officials. Secretary Cortelyou is understood to have indicated that the importers in New York could easily relieve their goods from detention by placing an indemnifying bond to assure the Government against loss. Ambassador Jusserand at the conclusion of the conference said:

"Nothing has been settled yet, but I have every confidence that a satisfactory agreement will be reached."

PARIS, April 29.—Ambassador White has joined Consul General Mason in recommending that the American Government propose the appointment of a Joint Tariff Commission similar to the one which has been in session at Berlin in the hope of reaching a basis for a settlement which will avoid future complications.

PLAYGROUND AT THE FAIR.

Model One to be Shown at the Jamestown Exposition.

WASHINGTON, April 29.—Through the generosity of a "friend of the children" a novel model playground accommodating 600 little folks will be opened on July 1 at the Jamestown Exposition by the Playground Association of America. It will be entirely home made, and contain not a single piece of patented apparatus. It can be duplicated by any good carpenter at small expense.

For the smaller children will be four baby swings, four ordinary swings, two seesaws, a tether pole, a "giant stride," and a slide. There will also be a kindergarten shelter, with a floor for games and a sandpile. For the older children there will be basket ball, volley ball, the National game of Germany; indoor baseball, flying rings, and parallel and horizontal bars.

THIRD-TERMERS AT WORK.

Bela Tokaji Says Mr. Roosevelt Is Another Cincinnatus.

The great work of keeping Theodore Roosevelt in the White House in spite of himself, inspired by Deputy County Clerk Bela Tokaji of Brooklyn, is now under way. It was started last night at an enthusiastic meeting of the members of the newly-born National Roosevelt League, held at 44 Court Street, Brooklyn.

About seventeen grimly determined third-termers were present from different parts of the city, and they were unanimous in the belief that absolutely no quarter should be shown to the booms of Taft, Fairbanks, Root, Hughes, and Bryan. Also, another distinction, which is expected to electrify the country, has been clamped on to the man from Oyster Bay by Mr. Tokaji. Mr. Roosevelt, he declares, with firm conviction, should be regarded as the "Cincinnatus of the American Nation." Mr. Tokaji doesn't explain just why, but the idea scored a tremendous hit.

BRYAN HITS AT PARKER.

Just the Candidate He Did Not Want, He Says.

PORTLAND, Me., April 29.—Before a large audience in City Hall to-night, William Jennings Bryan, as the guest of honor at the ninth annual banquet of the Maine Democratic Club, spoke for one hour on National political issues.

In reference to the last Presidential campaign he said he did get just the platform he wanted, and added:

"But I got just the candidate I did not want at all. However, I did what I could to support the ticket. Our party had its experiment and will not try it again. Perhaps it is just as well it did. There will be no more experiments. At last we are going into a campaign united on the right side of the questions. Two years ago we were united on the wrong side. The Republicans recognize it is to be no child's play in the next campaign. The President is popular only because he has adopted Democratic ideas and only where he adopted these ideas."

HODGENS'S FUNDS ATTACHED.

Deputy Sheriff Porges has received an attachment for $205,595 against Thomas M. Hodgens, formerly cashier of the States Savings Bank of Butte, Mont., in favor of the bank, which was granted by Judge Bischoff of the Supreme Court. The attachment is to recover moneys which, it is alleged, Hodgens paid out between Sept. 15, 1901, and Aug. 11, 1905, while acting as cashier of the bank, without authority and in violation of his duties.

FIRED AT POLICEMAN.

Alleged Thief Caught After a Lively Chase.

A man, who said he was Frank Burns, 28 years old, a telegraph operator, living in a Bowery lodging house, was locked up last night in the East Eighty-eighth Street Station on charges of burglary and carrying concealed weapons. The police say that shortly before 6 o'clock Burns was discovered in the apartments of Mrs. Emma Gotleish, at 224 East Eighty-fifth Street. When she saw the strange man in her room, she screamed. He ran and she followed, crying "Stop thief!"

A crowd gave chase and Burns ran to Third Avenue, where Policeman Coughlin joined the crowd. Burns turned and shied a curved "jimmy" at the policeman. The weapon struck a woman, but did not hurt her much. Somebody in the crowd fired two shots from a revolver. Burns decided that the policeman was shooting at him and fired point blank at Coughlin, but missed. The next instant the policeman's club came down on Burns's head and he dropped to the sidewalk. He was then taken to the station.

The police say that Burns got $50 worth of property in the apartments of Mrs. Gotleish and William Wallendorff, who lives opposite the Gotleish apartment. The goods, the police say, were found on the prisoner.

BELIEVES HE HAS BLACK HAND LEADER

Petrosino's Careful Work Results in the Arrest of Pietro Pampinella.

HIS DAMAGING ADMISSIONS

Had Little Sammy Saitti in His Care —Alleged Identification by Finger Prints and Writing.

The details of the kidnapping of little Sammy Saitti by a Black Hand gang of five Sicilian men and two women came to light yesterday shortly after the arrest of Pietro Pampinella, who is said by detectives to be the leader of the daring band which has lived for several years upon money obtained as ransoms from parents of children kidnapped in Little Italy.

Four other supposed members of the Black Hand band are under arrest. They are Rosina Martenesi, a pretty nineteen-year-old Sicilian, who was arrested in the rooms of Pampinella at 73 Roosevelt Street; Ignazio Di Leonardo, who was captured last Thursday at 253 Hamilton Street, Brooklyn, and Lugi Afronte and his wife, Cacciapuota, with whom Di Leonardo boarded at the Hamilton Street house. The two latter were arrested early yesterday morning upon the charge of having harbored a kidnapper.

It was through the confession of Di Leonardo that the other arrests were made. Then followed a partial confession of the supposed leader of the gang. Acting upon the stories told by the two men, the detectives are now seeking two other Sicilians who, they have been led to believe, have been in league with Pampinella and the others.

How Pampinella Was Identified.

Joe Petrosino, head of the Central Office's Italian Squad, is responsible for the arrests. Late yesterday afternoon he said that samples of Pampinella's handwriting corresponded to the penmanship of several of the Black Hend letters which were received by the father of the Saitti child. Impressions of Pampinella's finger tips, taken by the Bertillon system yesterday, also corresponded to those on the letters demanding ransom for the Saitti lad. But most important of all, little Sammy Saitti identified Pampinella and the Martenesi woman as the two who had kept him prisoner for eight days in the Roosevelt Street house.

A story of having been forced by the Black Hand gang to kidnap the child was told by Di Leonardo. He told the detectives that early in January the leader of the gang ordered him to abduct the child, and that when he refused and said that the boy's father was his friend the leader told him that death would be the penalty should he insist in his refusal.

"We will treat you as Bendetto Madonia was treated before his body was stuffed into the barrel three years ago," said the leader of the Black Hand, according to Di Leonardo.

Continuing, the Sicilian said that he then stole the child on the afternoon of Jan. 9, took him to the 116th Street Subway Station, where he was met by the other members of the gang. They then went to the Roosevelt Street house, where the child was left with Pampinella and the woman. Di Leornado protests that he received no money and that he washed his hands of the affair after turning over the Saitti child to the supposed leader of the band.

Pampinella told the detectives that he became frightened after the child had been there eight days, and that he turned him over to a confederate. He, too, protests that he received no money from the child's father. The detectives believe that he did, although Saitti says he did not pay the ransom demanded, and that he found his son wandering about Park Row.

Supposed Kidnapper's Story.

It was only after the detectives confronted Pampinella with the evidence against him that he consented "tell a part at least of what he knew about the Saitti kidnapping. He had told the detectives that he came from Palermo four years ago and had been in New York ever since. But letters which were found in his room showed that he had been living in Chicago, Pittsburg, Buffalo, Philadelphia, and other cities.

The supposed leader of the Black Hand band is said by Petrosino and his men to be one of the keenest Sicilians in the colony here. He is 28 years old. They say he is the man who has written most of the Black Hand letters which have been received by well-to-do Italians here in the last year. They say, too, that the other members of the gang have been taking orders from him, and that whatever money was to be divided as the result of the Black Hand letters passed through his hands.

Pampinella was caught early yesterday morning, just twelve hours after the Martenesi woman had been taken into custody. Detectives Botti and Archiopoli arreested her on Sunday. Petrosino then detailed Detectives Devoti and Gallo to await the homecoming of Pampinella. It was the first case upon which the two had worked, they having joined the Italian Squad a few days ago. While Gallo waited in the hall on the second floor of the Roosevelt Street house, Devoti, disguised as a janitor, stationed himself across the street.

About midnight Pampinella appeared. He looked about him carefully before entering. Finally, having apparently satisfied himself that all was well, he went into the house. In an instant Devoti was upon him. There was a sharp struggle, and the nippers were snapped upon his wrists.

When little Sammy Saitti was taken to the Roosevelt Street house yesterday other residents of the tenement greeted him as "Sammy" and asked him where he had been. They said that they had been told by Pampinella that Sammy was his nephew, and they had wondered what had become of him when he disappeared one day.

BONAPARTE FINDS ABUSES.

Deplores the Spoils System in the Department of Justice.

Special to The New York Times.

BALTIMORE, April 29.—Attorney General Bonaparte, in an address to-night at the Woman's College upon the history and workings of the Department of Justice, declared that in his opinion there was more of the spoils system left in that department than in any other department of the Government.

"In the Navy Department," he continued, "there is no question of favoritism or patronage. All positions are filled either from the service itself or through the civil service. In the Department of Justice it has been held that legal and special and confidential positions did not come under the civil service, and a very considerable number of appointments have been made not by civil service rule. It so happens that nearly all of those engaged in politics are able to describe themselves as lawyers.

"One result of this system is that there is by no means as good a spirit of discipline as in the Navy Department. In the short time that I have been at the head of the Department of Justice I have found more cases for punishment and more causes for removals than in the whole time when I was connected with the Navy Department, where they were extremely rare. There is less of this now than when I assumed charge, and it is not unlikely that the number will continue to diminish."

ORIENTAL RUGS

Not Always Expensive

IT is a misconception common to many, that a genuine Oriental Rug is necessarily expensive.

An inspection of our enormous stock will change this impression. Prices range as low as $18 and even $12 for rugs excellent in texture and coloring, while many others, varying in grade and size, are proportionately priced.

Few articles of art or utility give such lasting satisfaction as a genuine Oriental Rug.

Medical Conference Denounces the Methods of Instruction of Most Colleges.

EXAMINATIONS A FARCE

3,000 Incompetents Sent Forth Every Year to Practice Upon the Community.

Special to The New York Times.

CHICAGO, April 29.—That three-fourths of the graduates of American medical colleges are incompetent and wholly unfit to be entrusted with the care of patients, and that the methods of instruction and the examinations given in most medical colleges of this country are "farcical," was asserted by speakers to-day before the annual conference of the Council on Medical Education, a branch of the American Medical Association. The conference to-day was attended by well-known representatives of State Medical Associations and State Boards of Medical Examiners, who comprise its membership.

"There are on an average 4,000 diplomas granted to students in America every year," said Dr. Chester Mayer, member of the State Board of Examiners of Kentucky. "About three-fourths of these men, or 3,000 of them, should never be authorized to practice medicine. The evil strikes down to the very roots of the educational system. Primary education is a farce. Men are crammed for examinations and pass them while almost entirely ignorant of the subjects in which they are examined."

More specific charges were made by Dr. W. T. Means, Chairman of the Judicial Council of the Association of American Medical Colleges, who supported his statements with statistics.

"The average man qualified as a medical practitioner," said Dr. Means, "is deficient in knowledge of bacteriology, chemistry, physiology, and anatomy. I doubt if he could make a laboratory test for typhoid fever. I have written to twenty-five State Boards, and I find that 58 per cent. of the men who fail at their final examination pass on a second examination a few weeks after. In the few days intervening, where do they get their knowledge? They do not get it. They are simply crammed with the answers to those questions which were asked on the first examination and answer them like parrots."

State ownership of medical colleges was urged by Dr. W. T. Gott, Secretary of the State Board of Indiana.

WOMAN ATTACKS BURGLAR.

Beats Him on Head with Iron Bar and Later Effects His Capture.

Courage on the part of Mrs. Bertha Hartman, the wife of David Hartman, an ice cream manufacturer of 179 Harrison Avenue, Williamsburg, landed a burglar in a police cell early yesterday morning.

She and her husband and their two children were asleep, when Mrs. Hartman was awakened by a noise. Looking through into the kitchen she saw three men with an electric flashlight, trying to force open a window. She quietly arose and then awakened her husband.

Mrs. Hartman armed herself with an iron bar, and as the burglars raised the window the tallest of the three, a powerfully built man, began to crawl through the open window. Mrs. Hartman brought the iron bar down on his head several times with all her might.

The burglar managed to get into the room, and after striking the woman and her husband he dove out through the window and joined his companions. Mrs. Hartman and her husband started in pursuit, at the same time shouting for help.

The burglars ran through an alley alongside the house. One man stopped and threatened Mrs. Hartman with a revolver. She kept on chasing the trio. Two of the burglars ran one way and the one she had struck with the iron the other. Her screams brought a policeman, who captured the lone thief in a cellar after a hard chase.

He said he was John Jankofsky, a Russian, 30 years old, of 404 East 110th Street. He was arraigned in court for burglary and remanded without bail.

Clever Base Running Gives New York Victory Over Boston.

In the fourth inning of an exceptionally interesting game between the New York and Boston National League teams at the Polo Grounds, yesterday, the local batters uncovered their box of tricks on Pitcher Pfeffer, and kept him worried throughout the inning. Strang received a base on balls after Shannon had gone out on a slow grounder. Brown made an amateurish throw to Ritchey, trying to catch Strang stealing second, and the latter reached third base. Devlin then filed to Brain. Pfeffer allowed Seymour to walk, and it was at this stage that he gave a clever exhibition of scientific baseball.

He made a pretense of going to second in order to let Strang get home. The latter took the cue and started for the plate. Brown, who had the ball, threw it to Tenney to catch Seymour between the bases. While this was going on Strang scored, and Seymour, eluding Ritchie and Tenney, safely landed on second. Seymour then stole third, and Bresnahan reached second after Pfeffer had sent him to first. McGann also walked. Seymour tried to steal another run. As he neared the plate, Dahlen, however, fouled, and then struck out.

The New Yorks added another run in the seventh on a misplay by Bridewell of McGann's grounder and a two-bagger by Dahlen to left. Seymour made his second hit of the day in the eighth, but was caught trying to make it a two-timer by Bates's speedy throw to Ritchey. Seymour helped Strang, who got his base on balls, to tally another point for his side.

Beamont contributed the only run made by Boston. He found one of Ames's inshoots with excellent precision, and hit the ball clean into the right field bleachers over the new fence elevation, for a quartet of bases. The hit was the longest recorded on these grounds in years.

But for that ill-fated fourth, Pfeffer's work was good, the New Yorks only making three hits. Ames was also steady and nonplussed the visitors. The score:

AMERICAN LEAGUE.

Boston Bunched Hits and Defeated the "Yankees" by Score of 2 to 1.

Special to The New York Times.

BOSTON, Mass., April 29.—The fact that Boston happened to win to-day from the "Yankees" does not alter the verdict of the 3,000 people who were present that the game was one of the best ever. The ball was in the air nearly all the time and the fielding was always sharp, and at times brilliant.

"Cy" Young was the master of the situation. The visiting players could not hit his delivery. On the other hand, the Bostonians assaulted the pitching of Doyle and Keefe in a fashion that but for the superb support given these pitchers the difference in the score would have been much greater.

Williams was particularly brilliant at second base, while Boston's fielding honors were divided between Criger, Wagner, Parent, and Grimshaw, the last named player in right field covering himself with glory. Ferris's batting was a feature also.

Well-placed hits by Chase and Laporte in the second inning, followed by a marvelous stop and wretched throw by Ferris, resulted in one run only.

After Collins and Grimshaw and Ferris had singled, in Boston's half, and the first two had scored, Keefe replaced Doyle and stopped the run-getting. Although the Bostons batted Keefe freely, three hits in one inning, the splendid support given him kept them from scoring. Score:

Opening of Season at Jersey City Attracts Large Crowd.

The opening exhibition of the Eastern League season at Jersey City between Jersey City and Providence attracted a big crowd yesterday afternoon. The home team defeated the New Englanders by the score of 4 to 2. President P. T. Powers of the Eastern League opened the session by pitching the first ball over the plate. OARSMEN MAY GET CASH FOR REGATTA

Legal Objection to Board of Estimate May Be Removed Next Year.

ENTRY LIST IS GROWING

Decoration Day Races Will Bring Record Number of Contestants Together.

Harlem River oarsmen have not abandoned hope of securing an appropriation from the city to cover the expenses of the Decoration Day regatta. Alderman Meyers, in a communication to the Regatta Committee of the Harlem Regatta Association, which met last night at the Harlem Casino, offered a suggestion whereby the legal objections raised by the Board of Estimate to the grant may be removed. Although it is too late to accomplish anything this year, it was decided to take the matter up next Fall.

In view of the action of the Harlem River boat clubs in furnishing shells and locker facilities for the schoolboys who will take part in the schoolboys' race on Decoration Day, the Public Schools Athletic League has offered to defray the expenses of the medals for the race. The offer was declined, and it was decided to raise the necessary amount of money by subscription among the oarsmen, it being the sentiment of the committee that the affair should be distinctively a Harlem regatta event.

President Miller and Chairman Connell of the Regatta Committee returned yesterday from a visit to Philadelphia in an effort to secure entries with the pledges of entries from the Malta Boat Club of an intermediate double, Poulterer and Kelley; from the West Philadelphia Boat Club of an intermediate double, Doyle and Keiffer, and from the Pennsylvania Barge Club of an intermediate four, Kuemmerle, Krause, Neimeyer, and Nugent.

In order to accommodate the contestants at the American Rowing Association regatta at Philadelphia, on May 23, it was decided to keep the entry list open until May 25. Over seventy entries have already been secured, which is the greatest number in the history of the association.

It was decided to eliminate the intermediate octuple sculls race from the programme owing to the remote possibility of securing entries for the event. J. M. Boyle, on behalf of Columbia University, tendered the use of the university launch the officials on the day of the regatta. The offer was accepted.

OFFERS FRENCH AEROPLANES.

Capt. Ferber Willing to Send Two Big Machines for Competition.

An offer was received by the Aero Club of America last night from Capt. Ferber of the Aero Club of France promising to send two big aeroplanes to this country for exhibition at the Jamestown Exposition and for competition in some of the events to be held there, and later at St. Louis. Capt. Ferber is well known as one of the leaders in the science of aeroplane construction and flight in Europe. One of his machines, he states, is equipped with a twenty-four-horse power motor and the other with a hundred-horse power engine. He asks the club to insure the aeroplanes against possible damage for $5,000, and the matter will be considered at the next meeting of the Aero Club Directors.

If the offer is accepted, and the members at the club last night expressed the hope that the French machines would come over, word will be sent to Cortlandt Field Bishop, President of the club, who is now in Paris, asking him to arrange for their shipment. The St. Louis Aero Club has offered two prizes aggregating $5,000 for dirigible balloons and aeroplanes, the contests to be held just before the international balloon race on Oct. 19.

Two Balloons for Jamestown Cup.

A. N. Chandler's balloon Initial and the Aero Club's balloon Orient, both of 35,000 cubic feet, have been entered for the balloon race next Saturday at Norfolk for the cup offered by the Jamestown Exposition. The Initial will be piloted by Charles Walsh and will carry as passengers R. H. Sexton and Ernest Le Rue Jones. The Orient will be in charge of Capt. T. T. Lovelace or Thomas Baldwin, and its passengers will be Wilbur R. Kimball and Carl Dienstbach. This will be the first balloon ascension to be held on the exposition grounds. The Orient is now in St. Louis, and was used last week by Alan R. Hawley, but before shipping it East he expects to make another ascension.

ITHACA, N. Y., April 29.—The Cornell 'Varsity crew received another setback to-day when F. M. Sanger, who has been rowing at 3 for the last week, was ordered to stop rowing by the physician in charge of the athletics. Bromley was taken out of the junior crew and sent into the 'Varsity. This makes the second promising man that Coach Courtney has lost in two weeks, and he declares that the prospects for a strong 'Varsity are gradually growing darker. It will be a difficult matter to find a successor to Bromley and the junior crew will undoubtedly be weakened.

GOULD MAY PLAY CHAMPION MILES

Title Holder's Right to Play Will Be Decided After Court Tennis Final Round.

QUEER BRITISH RULING

Young American Annoyed, Will Leave Question of Match to His Father.

LONDON, April 29.—The Executive Committee of the Court Tennis Association will meet May 1 after the final in the championship games has been played to decide whether or not Eustace H. Miles, the holder, shall be allowed to defend the title. The action of the champion in postponing his decision until after the winner of the preliminary matches was known has been much criticised. V. H. Pennell, the champion of 1904, won his semi-final to-day, defeating Briscoe, 3—0.

Jay Gould is regarded as certain to defeat his opponent in the semi-final tomorrow, and the opinion is widely held that the question whether Miles shall be permitted to defend the title ought to be settled before the American and Englishman meet in the final match so as to avoid any suggestion of Miles being held in reserve in the event of the American champion proving the winner, as it is thought is almost certain to be the case. Gould frankly admits that he is annoyed at the way in which Miles has treated him. He said:

"Under the circumstances I doubt very much whether I shall meet him if I win the challenge round. I would be in this position: If Miles loses it will be said that he was short of practice, and if he wins it will be said that all of us who have played in the all-comers' competition must have been a poor lot."

The decision of the matter will be left by young Gould to his father, who is a passenger on board the Hamburg-American Line steamer Amerika due at Plymouth May 3. He says he will communicate by wireless telegraphy with Mr. Gould, and that if he advises him to meet Miles he will do so.

In the meanwhile Miles has written to young Gould saying that if any of the competitors object to his playing he will keep to his original decision, adding that any idea of Gould scratching to him is out of the question, and that unless Gould notifies him by Tuesday that he has altered his plans for leaving England he [Miles] will not defend the title.

Miles started practice at the Queen's Club to-day. At first he played badly, but steadily recovered, though his service never was good. He has increased considerably in weight since he left off playing, and it seems unlikely that he will be able to get the necessary quickness of foot for an early match with Gould.

Late to-night it was believed there was a strong likelihood of Gould and Miles playing for the championship.

NARROW TENNIS VICTORY.

Miss Sutton Carries Mixed Doubles Match Against Little's Net Attack.

Miss May Sutton pitted her skill with the tennis racquet against Raymond D. Little yesterday and carried off her shots so well that she won for her side a place in the final of the mixed doubles. The match in the tournament on the court of the St. Nicholas Rink, Sixty-sixth Street and Columbus Avenue, brought Miss Sutton and Theodore Roosevelt Pell on the opposite side of the net from Mrs. Barger-Wallach and Raymond D. Little. The latter played with marked effect in the first set, winning at 9—7. Miss Sutton and Pell won the remaining sets without difficulty, however, at 6—2 and 6—1.

This semi-final contest of the mixed doubles was prece

PEACE AND ITS PRICE.

If Mayor McCLELLAN is right and will sturdily stick to what he has said, if Mr. ELLISON is right and means exactly what he says, then the political millennium is approaching in this city, and will be established even if it has to be fought for. Mr. ELLISON'S statement came first. He states the "fundamental proposition" that the Mayor shall be "left entirely free to name as vacancies occur the highest class men that he may be able to find." Nothing could be better. Mr. ELLISON, it seems, is to be an adviser. He will "advise the appointments of men of the highest calibre." The most convinced reformer could do nothing more. Misgivings arise when he adds that he will "advise against the appointment of men who may be inimical to the organization or its leaders." Experience teaches that it is often, if not always, the duty of good men in New York to be inimical to the "organization," which here means the Tammany organization. Mr. ELLISON rather neatly meets that objection by his next statement, that he has "always been of the opinion that the Administration will best serve the purposes of the organization by giving to the city the best Government possible." It is apparent that Mr. ELLISON hopes to conduct the Tammany organization into the millennial fold "unbeknownst" to itself through righteous service, which, if previously advised, it might be disinclined to accept.

Mayor McCLELLAN'S own words are of good promise. "I insist upon being left entirely free to fill the offices for which I am responsible with the highest class of men that I am able to find." That must be his sure reliance, for upon that all depends. Peace and a firm alliance with MURPHY, we are sure, would involve the ruin of Mr. McCLELLAN. There could be no such thing as the appointment of "the highest class of men" if the pencil of MURPHY were to revise the lists. But the Mayor says that his position has been altered in no way, he has made no deal, and has authorized the making of none. It is still, and will be, his "ambition to give to the city the best Administration that it is possible" for him to give, "and factional politics will not be permitted to interfere with that course."

The construction to be put upon this arrangement is that, for party reasons, for broad National party reasons, it has been felt desirable that there should be peace between the Administration and the "organization" in the great city of New York. Peace, so far as that involves the cessation of warfare and the desisting from attempts to displace the present, and establish another, control of Tammany, may seem very desirable from the point of view of the National Democratic politics; we have a feeling that it may be also quite compatible with a sound and upright Administration of the city Government. So long as the Mayor is in a fight with MURPHY his appointments will be looked upon with suspicion, as if they were moves in a political game. Now that he disclaims all considerations of "factional politics" and promises to fill the offices with "the highest class of men" he is able to find, the motive of factional tactics will not be charged against him, and his acts will be measured by their merits and by his words, which assure the people of the city that their interests are to be dominant with him.

The Mayor is evidently not convinced that Tammany is regenerate. If Tammany wants to harmonize on his plan, he is for harmony. He will go no step backward, not even for political peace, needful as that may be for the party in the city, State, and Nation.

Frankly, the Mayor's statement was needed to reinforce the assurances given by Mr. ELLISON. He was the intermediary, and an intermediary is necessarily a compromiser. Compromise with MURPHY, or even with the SULLIVANS, involves concessions, concessions mean partial surrender, and, in the case of MURPHY and the SULLIVANS, surrender is ruin. The Mayor, taking him at his word and at the natural meaning of his words, has surrendered nothing, except that he will discontinue his fight for the control of the Tammany organization. He must be well aware that his own reputation is the most valuable thing in his keeping. He might win the control of Tammany, but at a price that would imperil it. He may let Tammany shift for itself, if only he keeps his promise to appoint to the offices the best men he can find, and his reputation will not he endangered.

THE ADIRONDACK "GRAB."

With Speaker WADSWORTH and Messrs. MORELAND of Chemung, PRENTICE of New York, MERRITT of St. Lawrence, OLIVER of New York, and BURNS of New York, who compose the Committee on Rules of the Assembly, rests the fate of the Merritt resolution nullifying the wild forest lands clause of the State Constitution. They can vote against reporting this bill, and thus kill one of the most iniquitous "grabs" ever engineered by powerful and recklessly selfish interests.

The lumber interests, who constantly trespass upon the Forest Preserve, are behind the bill. The wood pulp and paper-manufacturing interests are supporting it with money and influence. All their specious pretensions of acting in the public interest while seeking the privilege to build power reservoirs for their mills on the public domain have been shown to be unequivocally false. They have no arguments left. The report comes from the State capital that they are prepared to use "influence" to get votes enough to pass the amendment, once the bill is reported out. The Rules Committee can prevent this.

RUSSIA AND THE DUMA.

Our readers will agree with us, we think, that Mr. BONSAL'S dispatches from St. Petersburg give the most vivid view accessible to them of the strange hurly-burly of Russian politics to-day. Such accounts as that he gave on Sunday of the reasons for which the Duma refuses to denounce the continuance of purely political assassination show American republicans a state of things of which they could not have dreamed. And his account on Sunday of the workingman's deputy from St. Petersburg, "VICTOR HUGO'S Quasimodo," whose snaky eyes and hissing, vibrant voice compel the attention of all hearers, or his account yesterday of the Reactionary monk who is the leader of the Reactionaries among the peasants, reminds the reader of KIPLING'S description of the marine monsters who are thrown up in times of convulsion from the untouched bottom of the deep sea.

And yet it is upon such leaders and such followers that the responsibility devolves of preparing for Russia a peaceable transition between her autocratic past and her constitutional future. It takes an optimist to believe that they will succeed in effecting such a transition. Certainly if upon both sides thoughts of vengeance are the primary thoughts and motives they are foredoomed to failure. No wonder that Russians brought up under the old order are foredoomed to failure, and it is clear that they are so foredoomed. One of the chief of these is Prof. DE MARTENS, the distinguished Professor of International Law in the University of St. Petersburg, and for nearly forty years connected as a legal adviser with the Russian Foreign Office. In a letter to The London Times, in which he takes pains to say that he speaks not as an official, but as a private person, he flatly declares his belief "that the second Duma is absolutely unfit to work successfully for the benefit of the Russian Nation, and that it cannot advance it on the way of a constitutional system of government." It is "entirely unfit even to discuss the projects which have been put upon its table by the Government." Partly he bases this opinion on the standard of education of the body, of which less than one-quarter have a university education, and only a small part even a high school education, some are entirely illiterate and some can barely read; partly upon what they have done or left undone, but chiefly upon the lack of national or patriotic feeling, the dominion of partisan or local spirit. His final conclusion is that the dissolution of the body as quite unworkable is a matter of only "days or weeks."

There are facts which go to sustain this "lame and impotent" as well as melancholy conclusion. One would say that the resolution which the Polish and Caucasian groups have introduced and the Constitutional Democrats have refused to accept was mild enough:

> In nations accustomed to "freedom and parliamentary institutions," such a resolution would be rejected as a superfluous platitude. But it cannot be said to be either a superfluity or a platitude in Russia. It is true that "absolutism" and "assassination" have for centuries gone together in the history of Russia. But it seems that when one side waives absolutism, the other can well afford to waive assassination. M. STOLYPIN, it is true, had said: "Let the assassins commence" by refusing to abandon the right to hold field courts-martial so long as the Duma does not condemn assassination. But he has in fact hold no such courts-martial since the Duma met, and there seems to be no dispute that his promise of trial and punishment for the torturers of the prisoners of Riga have been sincere and followed up by action. And how can a Minister possibly consult in a friendly and fruitful spirit with a body which declines to deprecate murdering him whenever that step may seem politically desirable?
>
> It seems impossible that the majority of the Duma can actually desire a reversion to the old conditions of absolutism and assassination. It seems certain that the only alternative to such a reversion is that the Government and the Duma may arrive at a "modus vivendi." The establishment of such an arrangement seems to be the object for which M. STOLYPIN has been working, in spite of several sad blunders of his own as well as of the obstacles thrown in his way by the temper of a large part of the Duma.

THE BRIDGE TERMINALS.

If the Poulson bridge terminal plan is measurably successful under management none too friendly it will succeed entirely under conditions better adapted to success. All that was settled Sunday was that, according to that plan, the necessary number of trains could be moved. A few weeks and a few thousands of dollars are all that now prevent remedying the bridge crush upon the present bridge terminal site. Yet it is to be expected that the alternative plan calling for millions and a year or two will be proceeded with. The cards are dealt that way. The convenience of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit road operating the bridge railway requires a plan for turning its trains around in Manhattan, and this implies a separate "stand" for trains from each of the Rapid Transit company's several systems. If the railway wants that sort of terminal it ought to provide it for itself.

Our objection to the dear and very distant plan under contemplation is that it provides for something second rate. Instead of making it easy for Brooklyn Rapid Transit trains to stop and turn around in that particular spot, every one of them ought to be sent on its journey. The ideal way would be to run them through Manhattan, and to run the Manhattan trains into Brooklyn. If that is impracticable, the next best thing is a perpetually circulating link uniting the two separate systems, with privilege of transfers to and from each. Neither of these plans seems procurable, and the choice seems to be between the dear and inferior plan at public cost for the railway's private benefit, and the better plan for less cost devised by Mr. POULSON, which has the incidental advantage of being adaptable to the "through" plan of operation if ever it is adopted. No plan is a through plan which takes the passenger in either borough and carries him a mile or two only into the other borough. No through plan is worthy of the name which does not take a passenger from almost anywhere in either borough and give him a wide option of destinations in the other borough. Anything less is a gold brick.

RAPID TRANSIT CONDITIONS AND THEORIES.

The city must have ten new subways, says Engineer RICE. The city cannot spare the funds to construct a single subway, says Controller METZ. We will construct an east side and a west side subway, if allowed to earn a profit, says the Interborough Company. I will do much to remedy present evils by law, if you will give me more power, says Gov. HUGHES. Make a beginning by repealing the Elsberg law, says President SMITH. What is the dear public to make out of this Babel of their champions? How shall they know their friends from their foes, and make sure that they will not get the wrong end of the bargain, as they are assured they did before?

The situation should be dealt with with as little attention to the theorists and politicians as possible. We give this advice through observation of the results of doing otherwise, both here and elsewhere. In Chicago the reformers, whom we also have with us, started out for "immediate municipal ownership." We refrain from taking our readers again through the slough of despond in which the Chicago transit situation has wallowed ever since. In Cleveland 3-cent fares were promised, even as some promise them here. The result was that the tracks were torn up, for there was no profit in leaving them down, and it was cheaper to abandon the property than to operate at a loss. In Detroit there was an ordinance for a 20-second service, which the company calculated would mean the expenditure of $29,000,000 for equipment, and took the matter into court, where it now rests under injunction.

Unless all signs fail, the community desires anything which will produce better transit, disregarding private profits. We have a difference of opinion, but no quarrel, with those thinking that prohibition of profit and municipal promotion are the true remedy for the situation. At this time we merely direct attention to the fact that private profits have produced rapid transit, and will produce more of it, and that, however too large the private profits were, the public profits were larger. As it seems to us, there is a conflict of interest between those who want more subways to ride in and those who want more subway plans as a basis for election campaigns. It is for the people to decide where their interest lies.

Dealing with conditions rather than with theories or campaigns, we have Engineer RICE'S word for it that the opening of the subway added 17,000,000 fares to the city's traffic, most of them accounted for by population attracted from New Jersey, Long Island, and Westchester to upper Manhattan and the Bronx. This is appalling, for the Pennsylvania and Forty-second Street tunnels will add enormously to our day population, even if they should attract away people sleeping off Manhattan Island. The traffic of Manhattan Island increases almost thrice as fast as its population, so that facilities which ought to increase, and which do increase absolutely, are relatively ever less adequate. We read of bread riots in foreign lands, and have transit riots in our own city. The practical way of dealing with the situation is to make the best bargain the case permits. The effort to impose terms in a one-sided bargain has failed more than once. There were substantial results from a bargain too much in the interest of the contractors and too little in the city's, but nobody can say that the bargain was not observed upon both sides. The case now seems ripe for a fair contract with profit on both sides, and the larger profit on the side of the third parties, who are not signatories—to-wit, the payers of the fares. And this view will commend itself just in proportion as the contentions of theorists demonstrate that there is no other thoroughfare, certainly none so easy and speedy, to travel.

WHERE ARE OUR POETS?

The interview with the British Ambassador reported in yesterday's TIMES takes us far away from the dusky intricacies of international intrigue, or of the routine of diplomacy, into "the still air of delightful studies." Many of our own diplomatic representatives abroad have represented our own literary class. But we cannot recall any one of them, excepting LOWELL, who could have done just this most agreeable "blend" of personal reminiscence and National criticism. And certainly we can recall no British Minister or Ambassador at Washington before Prof. BRYCE, multitudinous and various as their gifts and graces have been, who could have delivered this particular message to the American people. Evidently England and America have no need of any other "exchange of professors" than that which they enjoy.

It is an obvious and a striking question which the British Ambassador puts: "Where are your poets?" Neither can it be answered any more effectively than fairly by the counter-inquiry, "Where are yours?" Quite true, there is now no TENNYSON and no BROWNING, as in the days when Mr. BRYCE was at Oxford, and PLANCUS was Consul, and of which the Ambassador discourses so delightfully. But an American would find it harder to match his list of SWINBURNE, and WATSON, and KIPLING (who, by the way, is omitted from it) from American poets now writing than to match from them the American poets of an older generation. As a (British) bard puts it, and as a British Ambassador puts it after him:

We seem to partake at present, if not in the past, the destitution of France where, according to another poet, American this time,

> Poet ne'er was born.

In truth our destitution does seem strange. We are not an inarticulate people. Foreigners say we are the most fluent and glib and voluble of any. And surely there never was a time when we were so proud of our country as now. And yet, if we wish to cite a poetical expression of "the American ides," an American Confession of Faith, we have to go back a generation or more, back, say, to the "Harvard Ode," (though Mr. SWINBURNE does not much like it,) which was composed and delivered over forty years ago. Is it that there is nothing inspiring to the poets in this monotonous record of material prosperity and that it takes such an occasion as the strife of the civil war to bring out our poetry? Or is it merely that the theme is abundingly present for poetry and only the "sacer vates" is lacking? The American sonneteers may berate Mr. BRYCE. But the lovers of poetry who are not themselves engaged in the poetical business we suspect will agree with him against the sonneteers, though they will not agree with the Rev. Mr. AKED that the reason why we do not produce better poetry is because we are drowned in materialism.

TOPICS OF THE TIMES.

Getting Ready to Fly.

It can safely be assumed that Dr. ALEXANDER GRAHAM BELL spoke from a knowledge of the facts, as well as with ability to judge them, when he told our London representative that "the actual problem of the navigation of the air has already been solved by the WRIGHT brothers." There have been reports to that effect in circulation for months past, but the WRIGHTS have guarded their great secret marvelously well, and though numberless articles in the papers and magazines have credited them with success in what may be called individual flight, no real information as to the construction and management of their machines has yet reached the public.

On Sunday one of our special dispatches said that the brothers, having received what they considered an insulting reply to a proposition they made to our own War Department, had now entered into an arrangement with the German Government by which the latter, for the sum of $400,000, was to secure, if not a monopoly, at least the first use of the Wright inventions. One can only hope that is not so—no, one can also regret the probability that if the WRIGHTS talked flying machines to our older army officers they were treated with scorn by those bigbly conservative persons.

But what a pity it would be if the conquest of the air, of which men have dreamed and for which they have struggled so many centuries, should be inaugurated by the dropping of explosives from the clouds! That, at a time when there is much talk and here and there just a little thought about the dawn of an era of universal peace would indeed be a sorry spectacle. Yet it may be doubted if any nation would undertake the large expenditures which the testing of even the most promising of flying machines would involve for any other reason than that success would arm it with a new weapon calculated to fill its foes with dread—and caution.

According to report, the WRIGHTS must sell their invention before making any general disclosure of their secret, because no feature of their device is patentable. It seems, however, as though an airship that really flew would be about the newest thing imaginable and the least like anything else in existence. If that doesn't constitute a sound claim for a patent, what does? Be this as it may, there is appareatly justification for believing that some of us still alive are going to travel through the air in machines really dirigible and moving at great speed. That, when it comes, will be the beginning of a change in human life in all its activities as no invention ever made before.

"Science" Again Advertised.

For some time past the Eddyites in this vicinity have been fortunate in avoiding the attention and investigation which are so distasteful and dangerous to them. That, of course, has been due to luck, not desert, for they have been going on in what is for them the only way, applying to all sorts of diseases a remedial method properly applicable to very few, and allowing all their "cases" to which it was not applicable to go from bad to worse, and occasionally to untimely death. That doesn't trouble the "healers" any while nobody notices it, for the fees come in just the same, and the dupes of "science" are not in the slightest degree affected.

Such episodes, however, as the death of Mrs. McBRIDE and the subsequent and consequent arrest and imprisonment of her sister for no worse crime than the making of an excited protest against what, with good reason, she considered criminal neglect, carry trouble into the Eddyite camp, and it is no wonder that they are resorting to all their usual expedients to calm public indignation.

Contrary to what, we think, will be the general impression, it is not a particularly good case against "Christian Science," for the arrest of Mrs. CHISM is, after all, irrelevant to the main point at issue. Mrs. McBRIDE was an adult, of mind as sound as that of any follower of Mrs. EDDY can be, and, for all that is now known, she had the form of treatment which it was within her discretion to select. Pneumonia is an infectious disease only in the strictly medical sense, and probably nobody else was seriously endangered by the failure to call in a doctor. Moreover, pneumonia is not a disease of which a doctor could say, "If I had been summoned in time the patient now dead would certainly, or at least in all probability, have lived." He could only say that he could have increased the patient's chances of life in some degree.

In essence, therefore, the case only mildly illustrates the need of taking from the Eddyite practitioner his or her present privilege of posing as a doctor for all diseases. There are worse cases in the cult every day, but, lacking the sensational feature of the arrest of an angry relative, they pass unnoticed.

Pensions for Horses.

Somehow we are not wildly enthusiastic over the plan of "pensioning" the horses worn out in the service of the city. When a man who has long been served by a horse takes measures to give the animal a comfortable old age, with little or nothing to do, instead of selling it for a few dollars to somebody who will utilize the remnants of its strength by working it till it dies, the display of sentiment is regarded by us all as very pretty and commendable. But such a man uses his own money in proving his tenderness of heart, and only the sternest of economists would blame him for paying the price he does for saving from injury the sensibilities of—himself. That is really what he does save, for of course the horse knows nothing of the fate he has escaped and therefore is not grateful for the payment of a debt of which he has no faintest comprehension.

But when a city goes in for this form of rather morbid sentimentality it is a different matter. We are supposed to have and to enforce laws which guard all horses, young and old, from overwork and maltreatment. If those laws are enforced, that pays all the obligation we really owe to horses, or, rather, to ourselves in regard to horses, and it would be pretty hard to find sound excuses for "pensioning" a lot of horses simply because they had worked for the city, drawing fire engines or otherwise.

However, it is a complex question, and something could be said on the other side. We are not opposing the new law, mind—only wondering if it is not a little absurd and nonsensical and—sappy.

The Jewish Race in History.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Will some enlightened man or woman who can speak with authority, or some one who has pondered these things in his own mind, tell in answer to this honest inquiry why the history of the Jewish people, the most virile nation on the face of the earth, is not studied in our schools and universities? I mean studied as are other histories. Aside from the Old Testament, the Scriptures, surely there are authentic Jewish historical works which could and certainly ought to be read far more than they are. As it is, it is doubtful if any besides theological students ever even look at them.

The almost universal misunderstanding and unappreciation of the Jewish people may be traced directly, in the writer's opinion, to this deplorable ignorance, observable and all too evident in would-be cultured people, in regard to the race.

Doubtless some of our public educators (so-called, at least) could answer this question, namely, why Jewish history inside and outside of the Scriptures is not taught along with other ancient, mediaeval, and modern histories.

The writer comes of Scotch and Dutch ancestry, and as far as he knows has not a drop of Jewish blood in his veins. He would be very proud of it if he had, for as Du Maurier says substantially, a single drop of pure Jewish blood in one's veins is a thing to be grateful for.

Where Derailment is Impossible.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Referring to your leader on "Steel Rail Defects" in your issue of Sunday last, allow me to say that unfortunately it is impossible to avoid the occasional breaking of rails, especially through climatic influences. Therefore it is all important to construct railroad tracks, if possible, so as to render derailment through the breaking of rails absolutely impossible.

This is imperative for the safety of the traveling public.

This has been practically demonstrated on a very large scale by running for many months an electrical automotor car, weighing 72 tons and seating 100 passengers, over the Behr monorail track, through a curve of 4 degrees, at a speed of 90 miles per hour, on which curve a rail has been cut right through in the middle between two ties.

I can personally vouch for this fact, as I have traveled over that line in that car several times.

I think this feature of absolute safety, combined with cheapness of construction, is of special importance in a city like New York, where the lives of millions of people are at stake.

MEN HUNGRY FOR LEADERS.

Dogma That They Are Just Beginning to Think Denied.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The letter by Lurana W. Sheldon on "People vs. Parsons" which you publish to-day, while generally correct in its exposition of the reason for non-churchgoing, contains one or two statements open to serious criticism. According to Mrs. Sheldon the common people have just begun to think, and by virtue of that unusual departure have ceased to follow leaders. I have no doubt that some ancient prophet or would-be prophet of the most remote antiquity who had succeeded in getting a following and the ill-will of the powers that were, felicitated his hearers in similar language. We have made so many advances in the last two decades that we are very apt to consider those dwelling before those most enlightened times as semi-barbarians, but to assert that the art of thinking (perhaps I should have written it with a capital) has only become popular since 1897 seems almost too cruel. People have always thought more or less, but never very deeply, along similar lines for longer than a few decades. What interests one period bores another; what one takes for granted the next one or the previous one puts to the test. Could these learned times produce as brilliant and penetrating thought upon the theories of government as was disclosed by any one of that galaxy of statesmen both here and abroad who shed their light on the darkened decades following the French Revolution? To-day thought works out other channels, but to call them new would require much assurance, and to say that there were no leaders would require more. If it be true that the people care naught for leadership save that of their own consciences, it is Mrs. Sheldon's task to explain the extraordinary popularity with diverse minds of the following men: Theodore Roosevelt, Herr Bebel, Leo Tolstoy, and Ernst Haeckel, all of whom are equally admired by men who have little in common save a common culture and civilization.

To say, besides, with Mrs. Sheldon that a minister who is not a hypocrite is an uneducated man is a very broad statement which would open the way to long discussion as to what education really is, but it seems timely to remind Mrs. Sheldon that all of the Apostles were what we would call ignorant men, (save St. Paul,) and that they spread their message through the most cultivated civilization the world had then seen, and, further, to call attention to the education or lack of it of Mohammed, Martin Luther, Shakespeare, and Abraham Lincoln.

Men forsake leaders? They are always hungry for them, and never more than to-day. Let the churches translate their dogmas from metaphysics into human experience and let preachers show how the world of to-day may be vitalized and enkindled by the application of the immortal spirit of Christianity and they will no longer lack hearers, nor will those hearers consider churchgoing a bore.

PLENTY OF PENTELIC MARBLE.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

On the first page of a recent issue there was a short article stating, in connection with the use of Pentelic marble in the Carnegie Institute of Pittsburg, Penn., "that the supply of this marble has been nearly exhausted by the contractors building the Carnegie Institute, and it is understood that the Greek Government will prohibit further foreign shipments from the famous quarries."

I beg to say that this is entirely erroneous. An English company holds a concession from the Greek Government of the whole of the Pentelikon Mountain, and it has now fifteen quarries opened and in full working order. It is filling Greek, English, German, French, and Indian contracts amounting to many thousand tons, and is supplying the exterior marble for the new building of the Dime Savings Bank of Brooklyn, now being erected at the intersection of Fulton Street, Fleet Street, and De Kalb Avenue, Brooklyn, of which Mowbray & Uffinger are the architects. About 2,000 tons of Pentelic marble will be needed to complete this work, 500 tons of which have already arrived.

The deposit of marble in the Pentelikon Mountain is inexhaustible, and there is no restriction whatsoever upon shipping the marble to any part of the world. The quarries are equipped with the best of modern American quarry machinery, a railroad runs from the quarries to the harbor of Piraeus, direct to dock, to load the marble blocks into steamers.

Besides the Pentelic marble this same company has also a concession to quarry the beautiful colored marbles of Greece—the famous Cippolino Antico, from the Island of Styra; the famous Rosso Antico, from Argos; five kinds from the Island of Skyros, and the wonderfully fine green marbles from the Island of Tinos, from which the great monoliths in the main corridor of the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company's Building, Twenty-third Street and Madison Avenue, are made, and also the great columns of the main hall of the Carnegie Institute of Pittsburg, Penn.

As the article in your paper may give our American architects a wrong impression and probably make them hesitate to specify the Pentelic marble, I beg you kindly to correct the published statement.

Flags Over American Consulates.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

In your edition of to-day appears a complaint of a man from Chicago that United States Consuls in Europe do not fly the American flag. Treaties do not permit Consuls in Europe to fly a flag, except by courtesy or where specified. The State Department will corroborate this. Ambassadors and envoys are on a different plane. Consuls are only commercial agents. Besides, the United States does not supply National ensigns to Consuls. They pay for these out of their own pockets. So, your Chicago man went off at half cock.

Hotel Tips.

From The London Travel Magazine.

The proper tips at a hotel for a stay of a week or less is 10 per cent. of the bill. This money should be divided only among those servants who have actually rendered service. Usually these are the porter, the head waiter, the table waiter, the chambermaid, and the concierge.

TO THE GODDESS OF LIBERTY.

Poised at thy coign of advantageous sight,
Holding en scene, both Gotham and the Bay,
How likest thou the panoramic day?
How valuest the strange, mysterious night?
Do Ellis Island happenings delight
Thy stony heart or aid thy pulse's play?
Is Quarantine, full hemmed by waiting craft,
A pleasing spectacle toward which thine optics stray?
Or does thy whimsic fancy wend its way
To penetrate the city's pall of smoke
And fatten vague reflection on the fray
Of human effort, while at each hour's stroke,
Sol, limping westward, drags a shame-dimmed shaft,

MEZZOTINTS BY LUCAS.

Landscapes of Southern England reproduced from the paintings of John Constable, the "handsome young miller" of East Bergholt, Sussex, are to be seen at the Schaus Galleries to the number of some thirty or more. They are by David Lucas, who was called "Constable's engraver," because he came before the public as the popularizer of the work of a man who was a pathbreaker for ten years or more and still far from popular, until Paris set the seal of approval on his landscapes with a gold medal.

This recognition abroad came in 1824, four years after Constable was elected Academician; but the public was impressed, not by the prior approval of the Royal Academy, but by that of the French King who decreed him the gold medal on the strength of three pictures which a French art dealer had bought and entered in the Salon of 1824. These were the "Hay Cart," "View Near London," and "Lock on the Stour."

David Lucas made the mezzotints for Constable's publication of "English Landscapes," which appeared from 1830 to 1832, and the painter died in 1837. Here are mezzotints after "Weymouth Bay" and "The Glebe Farm," now in the Louvre; "Salisbury Cathedral," [with and without the rainbow,] now at South Kensington, and "Willy Lott's House," also called "The Valley Farm," a view on the Stour near Flatford Mill, which appeared in the Royal Academy in 1835 and is now in the National Gallery, London. From his native village where his father kept a mill came "House of Golding Constable," "Summer Evening," and "Porch of Church at East Bergholt," and from his later residence near London are "Hampstead Heath, Harrow in the Distance," "Hampstead Heath, Sand Pits," and other landscapes. Brighton is recalled by a "Sea Beach" and "Cornfield"; Dedham in Essex by a "Water Mill," and Salisbury by the large plate and by "Mound of the City of Old Sarum."

Prints after other Suffolk scenes, such as "Dell in Woods, Helmington Park," "Flatford," "The Stoke at Nayland," and "Wind Mill," show how faithfully Constable studied the country near his home and how little he cared to travel far for the picturesque. In this he resembled Rembrandt, Hobberma, and other Dutch painters of an earlier epoch. Harwich and Yarmouth, Ipswich and Colchester furnish still other views. Constable was determined not only to break with the convention in favor of brown landscapes and pictures steeped as it were in tobacco juice, but to overcome the mannered landscape in which composition was so evident that it interfered with the impression of Nature. He would not be considered much of a realist nowadays, but in his period such direct transcripts from the actual were considered by artists and amateurs a piece of impudence in a man who had not taken the proper training in classic landscape art.

Mezzotint affords a vehicle for the rich and varied effects of sky and landscape which has not yet found its superior when the problem is to translate oils into black and white. Especially are the clouds in these engravings by Lucas magnificent. His storm veils are full of the madness of the tempest; his raincloud are big with thunder and lightning, his moonlights replete with mystery. Lucas was nearly thirty years the junior of the painter he so ably translated. He is the engraver of that old favorite Carmichael's "Grace Darling," and for Constable he engraved the "Young Waltonians," "Hadleigh Castle," and other pictures not in the edition of English landscapes. Lucas lived until 1881—that is, till nearly fourscore; but intemperate habits destroyed his hand, so that during the latter half of his life he produced nothing. These mezzotints were made under the supervision of Constable himself; they will afford a pleasant half-hour to those who take the trouble to visit the Schaus Galleries.

JUSTICE MacLEAN SUED.

Supreme Court Justice MacLean is to appear as a witness before trial in a suit instituted against him by Herman Ridder, publisher of the Staats-Zeitung, for the reformation of a certain contract made between them, whereby Mr. Ridder sold to Justice MacLean a one-quarter interest in a contract for the purchase of the stock of a certain corporation.

The name of the corporation does not appear in the papers. It is alleged by the plaintiff that a clerical error was made in the preparation of the contract.

Cleveland's Birthplace Endangered.

MONTCLAIR, N. J., April 29.—The birthplace of Grover Cleveland, in Bloomfield Avenue, had a narrow escape from destruction by fire yesterday afternoon. Sparks from a fire that destroyed a barn in the rear of the Presbyterian parsonage several times ignited the birthplace of the ex-President, and only hard work by the firemen and residents of the borough saved the building.

Hamilton's Farewell to Club.

Special to The New York Times.

ALBANY, N. Y., April 29.—Andrew Hamilton, upon his retirement as President of the Albany Club, which place he had held for six consecutive terms, gave a dinner to his successor, Edward B. Cantine, at the club this evening. There were thirty guests.

A Document of Unique Beauty.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

The will of the late Charles Lounsbury, who died in Cook County Asylum at Dunning, Ill., which you were good enough to give the world this morning, is a document of unique beauty and perhaps imperishable worth. The death of poetry is often proclaimed; but poetry is not dead (unless perchance it died with Mr. Lounsbury) while words so exquisite in depth and felicitous restraint are written—words so beautiful in their proud humility and ironic tenderness. It is impossible to read them without the pain at heart which is above all pleasure. Keats might have left us such a will—and did not.

Mankind should accept these bequests and remember with gratitude the bequeather. The words of the will should be illumined upon vellum and treasured safely; they are too precious to let die.

Is it not strange that some of our most valued things have been given us by the insane in intervals of divine lucidity? Such are the noble stanzas of Smart, the gentle masterpieces of Cowper; and such are the words of Mr. Lounsbury's will, and their price is above rubies.

A Man Who Observes.

To the Editor of The New York Times:

Permit me as a citizen and taxpayer to state that your editorial in to-day's TIMES meets my disapproval.

In the first few sentences you speak against the Elsberg bill, although Mr. Shonts himself on Thursday said there was nothing in it to which he objected. Your whole editorial is a plea that the Belmont-Ryan interests should do as they please with the city and the public.

What the public want is an independent line on the east and west sides of the city. Who drew the present form of contract for bids? Who but the counsel for the Rapid Transit Commission? Why was the transfer system made such a prominent feature? The answer is obvious. Why should I or any other citizen if the proposed extensions are built, be compelled to transfer at Times Square and Grand Central Station if we wish to go downtown on the present Fourth Avenue portion of the Subway? There are, of course, scores of other reasons.

I don't suppose you will publish my letter, but I desire to let you see there are citizens who observe.

Cooke, rector of St. George's Church, Hempstead, L. I.

The house was beautifully decorated for the event. The foyer hall had portieres of Southern smilax and deep red roses arranged in rope fashions over the doorways, and an immense mirror at the back of the hall. The stair railings were covered with ropes of flowers, red roses, and smilax to the second and drawing room floors, and from there on white flowers and smilax draped them.

The ceremony took place in the drawing room, which was turned into a white and green floral chapel, the prie dieu being covered with white flowers, and a narrow aisle outlined by low posts joined by broad, white ribbons.

The bride, preceded by her attendants, came down the stairway from the second floor leading into the drawing room, where the ceremony was performed, walking with her father. She wore a simple white satin princess gown trimmed with tulle and a point lace veil that was worn by her grandmother, Mrs. Kennedy, and by her own mother at their respective weddings. She carried lilies of the valley and white orchids.

AFTER MRS. EDDY'S WORKS.

Rare Editions Bring Good Prices at a Sale.

That there is an eagerness on the part of a portion of the public to possess copies of rare works on Christian Science was demonstrated yesterday at the sale of the private library of the late Michael J. O'Shaughnessy. A large crowd attended the sale, which was held in Anderson's auction rooms in West Twenty-ninth Street.

"The Science of Man, by Which the Sick are Healed, Embracing Questions and Answers in Moral Science, Arranged for the Learner by Mrs. Mary Baker Glover," 8vo, original wrappers, Lyon (Mass.), privately printed, 1876, first edition, sold for $42, although the front cover is torn and a few of the pages are stained. An 1879 edition of the same work, the text varying so widely from the letter of the first edition as to indicate that the book was practically rewritten, sold for $24. The third edition of "Science and Health," by Mary B. G. Eddy, 2 vols., 12mo, published by Dr. Asa G. Eddy at Lynn in 1881, fetched $60.

There were a number of rare first editions of famous authors in the sale. The highest price was $120, paid for a first edition of Peter Parley's Universal History, Boston, 1837, one of the rarest of Nathaniel Hawthorne items. A copy of the original edition of John Heywood's "History of Tennessee," published in 1823, sold for $34; a copy of the original issue of the "History of the Indian Tribes of North America," by Thomas L. McKenny and James Hall, $97.50; the "North American Indian Portfolio," by J. L. Lewis, New York, 1844, $35; "The Courting of Dinah Shadd," by Rudyard Kipling, the first issue of the suppressed first edition, $10.25; The President's (Lincoln's) Policy," written anonymously by James R. Lowell in 1864, and one of the rarest of Lowell items, $20; Longfellow's "Voices of the Night," first edition, $20; Percy B. Shelley's "Hellas," first edition, $13.25; "Mr. Sponge's Sporting Tour," by R. S. Surtees, first edition, $25; a copy of the first edition of H. D. Thoreau's "Week on the Concord and Merrimack Rivers," $34, and "Memoirs of the Life of John Mytton," by C. J. Apperley, illustrated by Henry Aikin and T. J. Rawlins, $42.

TABLE DAINTIES.

Now is the time to serve ice cream with maple syrup. Fresh sugar and syrup have been in since the middle of February. The syrup, the genuine article, is 50 cents a quart. It is boiled well to serve with the cream, sent to the table hot in a sauce bowl, and from individual dishes it is put a little at a time on the cream to wax. It is playing at the real game of waxing it on the snow, as it is done in the Vermont hills, as the syrup comes fresh from the big kettles.

Pure maple sugar is put up in pound lots in pasteboard boxes in conveniently sized square cakes, eight in a box, for 25 cents.

Pineapples are in their prime now, and while, owing to the cold, other fruits, notably strawberries, are scarce and high, the pines are a delicious aubstitute. They range in price from 30 cents to $1.50. The Florida pines are from 30 to 75 cents, according to size, and the smooth cayennes from Porto Rico from $1 to $1.50. The Porto Rico fruit has, in addition to its exquisite flavor, the advantage of having smooth-edged leaves, which simplify the handling.

Strawberries are 50 cents and asparagus $1.50 and $2, and both are scarce. Spinach is also hard to find, and none of the three is very good. New lots, however, and new prices are expected, with finer quality, as the weather improves.

African Duchess pears are just getting in, are excellent, and cost $4 a dozen. African plums are gone and peachea also, but French peaches have come to take their place. These are a hothouse product which we have been getting from the other side for the past three years. They are not plentiful, and will not last long. While they do they are $2 each peach.

French strawberries, twelve in a box, are large, over an inch in diameter, and cost $1.50 a dozen.

Blood oranges are still in fine condition and cost 75 cents a dozen.

Malaga grapes are getting scarce and cost 50 cents a pound. The old crop of hothouse grapes is at an end. The Frankenthaler grapes, of which only two shipments have yet appeared, are a little acid still and cost $1.50 a pound. The old ones are $2. The Alexandria muscatels will not arrive until the end of May.

Hothouse nectarines will arrive within a week, and also hothouse cherries. These are the black cherriee, and all are from Belgium.

BELASCO MAINTAINS HIS INDEPENDENCE

Denies All Sympathy with the Shubert and Klaw and Erlanger Alliance.

DOES NOT FEAR SYNDICATE

Lee Shubert Declares the New Working Agreement Will Benefit the Public.

David Belasco made a statement last night to a reporter for THE TIMES in which he vigorously denied all sympsthy with the recent theatrical alliance between the Shubert and Klaw & Erlanger interests. He said that the situation was now more "interesting" than ever, and predicted the building of new out-of-town theatres to replace those ceded to the syndicate vaudoville plan.

"I stand to-day just where I have stood for the last week, the last month, and several yeers past," declared Mr. Belasco with deliberate emphasis. "I have made no compromise. I consider the syndicate a menace to the drama, and now I consider that it may become a greater menace than ever. The syndicate cannot do anything for me. I would not accept any privileges from the syndicate under any circumstances. I do not owe the Shuberts anything for having got concessions from the syndicate. If I had wanted only concessions I could have got them years ago.

"I declare absolutely that I will not book in any syndicate theatres, even if I might do so. I have contracts with the Shuberts for their theatres in the large cities, and have no doubt they will fulfill their contracts to the letter. Apart from the remaining Shubert theatres, I shall book my attractions with utter independence. The managers in the one-night stands already have tekcn it upon themselves to demand the right to book their ettractions directly. My one-night stand companies for next season already have been booked directly in this manner, without the intervention either of the Shuberts or the syndicate.

"I think I have the right to take unto myself some pride for the progress of the Independent movement. I also feel that I have been instrumental in making the Shuberts so strong that they were able to demand terms and the syndicate was ready to recognize them. However, in the new combination of the new company—Erlanger, Shubert and Klaw—Mr. Shubert is between the upper and the lower millstones.

"I look forward to the time when more independent theatres will be built. For myself, I can say positively that I intend to have a theatre in Pittsburg. The syndicate cannot annihilate me. If it had been able, it would have done it long ago, when I was comparatively weak—when I transformed a hall into a theatre in Washington at an expenditure of $25,000."

Lee Shubert also consented last night to speak freely of the new alliance for the first time since its formation. Mr. Shubert said that the new "working egreement" would benefit the public, as the managers would be relieved of the necessity of making hasty productions to fill time. He also said that in the cities where only one first-class legitimete theatre now remains the public would be benefited, as the poor productions would be eliminated.

"By the old syndicate agreement," Mr. Shubert explained, "no syndicate manager would book any production that had played a rival house in any other city. The real point of the present situation is that the syndicate has taken down these bars. The syndicate is now willing to let any one have bookings. This is an edvantage to us, as it gives us access to the one-night stends, and to Western territory which we have not been able to enter.

"The Shuhert Booking Agency will he continued, and will not be merged into the Klaw & Erlanger Booking Agency. We still have our theatres in the larger cities, and we shall continue to book them with our productions and with the productions of the independent managers. We are still able to book approximately half a season out of town. Belasco, Fiske, or Lawrence could go directly to Klaw & Erlanger for time outside these theatres, or we could obtain the time for them. Some of the one-night stands would have to he booked through Klaw & Erlanger, but in many cases bookings can be made directly with the managers of the theatres.

"The Shuherts do not surrender their identity in any way or degree. In the large cities there is room for hoth circuits of theatres. The spirit of rivalry can never die out, but it will he the rivalry of seeing which can produce the better attractions."

Robert B. Mantell, who is performing a useful service in his popular productions of Shakespeare, last night began a limited engagement at the New Amsterdam, appearing as Brutus in "Julius Caesar." The rôlo is one of the best in the actor's répertoire, and he succeeds generally in giving a very fair impression of the "noblest Roman of them all," playing throughout with a auggestion of sincerity and occasionally with impressive effect.

As heretofore, the general appeal of the performance is enhanced by the pictorial quality of the settings, the various scenes being carried forward in a manner which if not strictly Shakespearean, is of value in stimulating imaginations which have grown sluggish under the conditions of modern existence. The average theatregoer to-day does not want to create his own tempest, for example, through an exercise of the mental faculties, and so the stage carpenter, the scenic artist, and the electrician relieve him of all responsibility with a reaultant exhibition of cross-blue lightning that must be terrifying indeed to the unsophisticated.

The scenes of Caesar'a triumph and that of his death are made effective by the introduction of a small host of men and women instead of the old-time Corporal's guard of lean, lank supers, generally youthful and irreverent.

Mr. William A. Brady, who stands sponsor for Mr. Mantell in these productions, knows how to handle bodies of men in action, and the results of his training are to be seen in active moving groups and mobs.

In the preaent cast Mise Marie Booth Russell again appears as Portia, Miss Lillian Kingsbury as Calphurnia, and Mr. Gordon Burby as Calue Cassius. Mr. Burby'e Cassius is a good performance of the rôle, as is Mr. Francis McGinn's of the ever-popular Antony.

The large auditorium waa packed. Julius Caesar will be the bill again to-night. To-morrow afternoon Mr. Mantell will appear as Shylock.

TOO MUCH OF "POOR JOHN."

Folk Living Near a 5-Cent Show House Phonograph Want Tune Changed.

Michael Glynn, proprietor of a five-cent show in Third Avenue, near Fifty-ninth Street, was eerved last night with a summons signed by Magistrate Baker, sitting in the Yorkville Court, requesting him to appear in court to-day, and show cause why he should not be compelled to change a tune played by a giant phonograph which hangs over the door of the place of amusement.

Acting Captain Raynor of the East Fifty-first Street Station had received a petition signed by a hundred residents and business men and women in the vicinity of the phonograph. It was charged in the petition that the only tune this phonograph has played for days and days hes been one entitled "Poor John."

The petitioners say the repetition of the tune influences their minds and their work.

LONDON, April 29.—If the public follows the lead of the dramatic critics "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch" will be very successful in London. The critics all treat the piece not as a play, but aa a picture of life, and, though none of them is able to say of his own knowledge that it is true, they all seem convinced that juat such persons as appear in it really exist.

"If," saye Mr. Walkley of The Times, "there are no such people and no auch manners, we feel that there ought to be."

CORBIN AT THE GARDEN.

Lieut. Gen. H. C. Corbin, retired, and a party of friends, attended the Buffalo Bill Wild West Show last night at Madison Square Garden. Gen. Corbin was on the staff of Gen. Miles in the last Indian war, at Pine Ridge, end was delegated to receive the arms of the Indians in front of the army. The General was pleased with the battle scenes, and recalled the fact that Buffalo Bill was a Brigadier General in the same Indian campaign and advisory scout on the staff of Gen. Miles.

Major John M. Burke, as a mutual friend of the Indians and the white man, stood beside Gen. Corbin at the receiving of the arms. Among the Sioux Indians with the Wild West Show are many who surrendered on that occasion.

PHILADELPHIA OPERA PLAN.

Hammerstein Company May Be Heard in New Convention Hall.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, April 29.—One of the principal reasons for hurrying the erection of a convention hall in this city, it was learned to-dey, is to provide accommodations for Oscar Hammerstein and his Manhettan Opera Compeny next Winter.

A men close to the interests back of the proposed hall to be erected at Twenty-third end Chestnut Streets, of which Frank Howe, Jr., lessee of the Gerrick Theatre, is the heed, is authority for the statement that the desires of Mr. Hammerstein are influencing the project. He said that the hell would he arranged for the production of grand opera. It is estimated that it will cost about $500,000 to get the ground for the hall.

Liebler & Co. Move to 38th Street.

Hippodrome Colt Performs.

Giles, the pure white colt born in the Hippodrome stables a month ago, made his first appearance yesterday afternoon as one of the circus features. The colt went into the ring with his mother, Princess, and his antics greatly amused the children in the audience.

The play is offered as a testimonial to Max Hanseler, for many years a member of the company. Goethe's "Faust" will be presented on Friday night for the benefit of Carl Machold, who plays the title part.

Wagehals & Kemper announce that the tickets for the police benefits at the Astor Theatre last week will be honored any evening this week. This announcement is due to the fact that more than 2,000 who purchased benefit tickets were turned away from the Saturday performance of "Before and After."

GOWNS FOR MAGISTRATES.

After June 1 the City Magistratea will assume the dignity of gowns such aa are worn by the Supreme Court Justices. A resolution to that effect was adopted yesterday by the Board of City Magistrates. Nine voted for the adoption of the resolution, Magistrate Steinert voting no. Magistrate Harris, the appointee to fill the place of Magistrate Sweetser on May 1, aat in the back of the room, refusing to take any part in tho gown discussion, or even to emlie at some of the speechea at which his brethren loudly guffawed.

The Committee on Gowns was made up of Magistrates Berlow, Crane, House, Steinert, and Wahle, and Magistrate House introduced the resolution on behalf of that committee. He said that putting on a gown wasn't a matter of pride with him; it had been urged by a number of "Supreme Court Justices, members of the bar, and business men."

Magistrate Breen admitted in a speech that he had been opposed to the innovation until a dinner which he had recently attended had "set him to thinking." Then he was won for the gown.

"I take it that when we sit in night court," he went on, "that we should wear night caps." [Violent applause at this witticism.]

Magistrate Barlow exhibited some samples of gown cloths. They were all black. "Aren't there any green goods among them?" inquired Magistrate Walsh. [Violent applause.]

Magistrate Barlow said he had two weights of silk that was the very kind used by Supreme Court Justices and from the same tailor. One was light Japanese silk, to be worn in Summer; the other heavy silk, to be worn in the Winter. Magistrate Walsh wanted to know if the light gown wasn't to be used when misdemeanors were on trial and the heavy gown when felonies were up.

The prices were atated to range from $15 to $55 a gown. After aome more jesting the Magistrates adjourned.

DEATH LIST OF A DAY.

Thomas Whinston Peeples.

Thomas Whinston Peeples, who was Chief Engineer of the New York Elevated Railroad system for nearly a quarter of a century, is dead at his home, 47 Walnut Street South, East Orange, N. J., at the age of 77. He passed away on Saturday night after a brief illness. Mr. Peeples was taken ill on Friday.

Mr. Peeples was born in Harrisburg, Penn., and went to work in the Pennsylvania Railroad shops there when he was but 9 years old. When he was 21 he was made master mechanic of the Harrisburg Division of the Pennsylvania. At the opening of the civil war he organized a company of railroaders and went to the front with Company E of the 20ist Pennsylvania Volunteers.

His services to the railroad company were considered so vnluable, though, that President Thomas Scott of the Pennsylvenia Railroad obtained the consent of President Lincoln to Peeples's return to work. Mr. Peeples stayed with the Pennsylvania Company for a time and then was appointed to a responsible place with the New Jersey Central Railroad.

He remained there until 1874, when he was made Chief Engineer of the New York elevated roads. He leaves a son, Edward A. Peeplea, and a daughter, Mrs. Edward E. Bruen, of East Orange.

Gulian Ludlow Dashwood.

Gulian Ludlow Dashwood, descendant of an old English family who had lived for many years at Morris Heights, died there on Sunday of pneumonia. He was 80 yenrs old. Mr. Dasbwood was a bachelor, and of lete years had lived practically a recluse. The Dashwood estate, between the estates of the late Lewis G. Morris end the late Gustav Schwab, was one of the show places of the neighborhood until it was transformed into the Berkeley Oval about fifteen years ago.

Mr. Dashwood then moved from the old stone mansion to a wooden house which he built upon a corner of the property at Burnside and Sedgwick Avenues and in which he died. He still retained large holdings in the Berkeley Oval property, which has long since been cut up into building lots. He also had held outside business interests to which, however, he gave little personal attention.

He was greatly interested in horticulture, which he practiced for his own pleasure, freely giving away the products of his conservatories.

Funerel services will be held in St. James's Protestant Episcopal Church, Fordham, at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

William J. Johnston.

William J. Johnston, a well-known publisher, died at his home, 774 West End Avenue, yesterday, after a short illness. He was born in Ireland in 1853, and educated there. In 1868 he came to America, and shortly afterward founded The Operator, an electrical paper, now known as The Electrical World, and the first paper of its kind in this country.

BUTTLING TOOK HANDICAP

Lajuenesse, at Long Odds, Snatched Victory in Last Stride of Closing Race at Jamaica.

With the most pretentious field of three-year-olds that any race has induced to the post this season to oppose him, Senator Clay, from the stable of the Farrell-Johnson-Sullivan partnership, was sent out for a betting coup at the Jamaica track yesterday, and made the betting sensation of the afternoon, in spite of the fact that the coup failed, as have about all the efforts in that direction by the combination stable this Spring. Senator Clay's name did not appear in the list of entries sent out Saturday, and post positions had been assigned to the other horses before Senator Clay was announced as a runner, and as there could not be a new drawing then, the colt had to take the extreme outside. J. Martin, jockey for the Farrell combination stable, had the mount on Senator Clay, and made a gallant trial to save the plunge on his mount, but luck was all against him, and, though Senator Clay ran a race quite good enough to have won, with equal fortune all around, he finished just a head behind third place.

On the tip that had been circulated Senator Clay started nearly even in the betting with Aletheuo, but he was backed with such persistence that the price against him was forced from 4 to 1 down to 7 to 5, at which figure he started as a strong favorite.

There was a long delay at the post, and when the field finally got away Senator Clay, in his outside position, was thrown back at the start, and was far back in the crowd when the field settled into motion. In the first half furlong They're Off, one of the smart colts of last season, raced out to the front, and, with plain sailing all the distance for the remainder of the race, lasted out in the lead to the end, winning cleverly at the end by a length and a half, while Orneulum, George S. Davis, Workmaid, Senator Clay, and Aletheuo fought out after him, Oraculum getting second place, all following him heads apart.

In the mile and a sixteenth handicap, third on the card, the betting element met another severe reverse, when Samson, ridden by Miller, and favorite at 5 to 2 on, was beaten by Buttling, the top weight, and one of the outsiders of the contest. The third upset for the betting men came in the closing race, for which Fordello and Scallop were the two choices throughout the betting. Thermidor, a 7-to-1 chance, led off, and lasted in front into the very last stride of the race, Lajuenesse, a 12-to-1 chance, then getting up and snatching the race on the post, while both Fordello and Scallop finished unplaced. Master Robert, at odds on, won the first event in hard head finish, and Ontario and Jacquin, the best-backed horses, won the other races. Summaries:

AUTO CUP RACE ASSURED.

W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., Makes Slight Changes in the Deed of Gift.

All doubt regarding the running of the Vanderbilt Cup race was set at rest yesterday at the meeting of the Executive Committee of the American Automobile Association when Chairman Jefferson De Mont Thompson of the Racing Board announced that the race would positively be held over the Long Island Motor Parkway at about the same time as previously. A meeting of the Racing Board will be held on May 15, Mr. Thompson stated, at which time the rules, which are undergoing some changes, will be adopted and definite arrangements will be made for receiving entries.

William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., attended the meeting, which was held in the rooms of the Long Island Motor Parkway, 527 Fifth Avenue, and he presented a slight modification of the deed of gift, placing the control of the event in this country in the hands of the Executive Committee of the A. A. A. Racing Board. This was rendered necessary from the fact that the board has been so enlarged this season due to the number of new associations admitted to the National body that it has been necessary to form an Executive Committee of the board to take charge of the cup race and other matters of more or less National importance. Mr. Thompson named as the members of this committee William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., E. Russell Thomas, Dave H. Morris, Frank G. Webb, A. R. Pardington, R. L. Lippitt, Samuel M. Butler, A. G. Batcheider, George L. Weiss, and Ira M. Cobe, with Frederick H. Elliott as Secretary.

President William H. Hotchkiss of Buffalo presided at the meeting, and those present besides Mr. Vanderbilt were Mr. Thompson, A. G. Batcheider, Frank B. Hower, Charles T. Terry, Lewis R. Speare of Boston, George E. Farrington, and Secretary Elliott.

"Although we have trebled our State membership," said President Hotchkiss, "as we only had five State organizations on the first of the year, the work is still going on, and plans are in progress to form State bodies in Delaware, Iowa, Vermont, and Kentucky. The Louisville Automobile Club of Kentucky, the Rutland Automobile Club of Vermont, and the Automobile Club of Colorado were elected, and several additions were made to the individual membership list."

The resignation of Philip S. Flinn of Pittsburg as a Director was accepted, and Paul C. Wolff, Secretary of the Pennsylvania Motor Federation, was elected in his place. W. F. Fuller, President of the Hartford Automobile Club, was chosen a Director, taking the place of J. Henry Morris.

Chairman Terry of the Legislative Board stated that the work done by his committee throughout the country in support of the Federal act for uniform motor laws, had failed to reveal any objections, and he believed the bill would be favorably reported at the next session of Congress.

Automobile Notes of Interest.

Chairman Frank B. Haner of the A. A. A. Touring Board, who came to this city yesterday to attend the Executive Committee meeting, stated that fifteen cars are now entered for the Glidden Cup contest. He expects to announce the detailed route within a few days.

The officers of the American Automobile Association will be moved this week from the Metropolitan Building, Fourth Avenue and Twenty-third Street, to the new Knabe Building, Fifth Avenue and Thirty-ninth Street.

A meeting of the charter members of the new City and Country Motor Club has been called for to-morrow night at the city clubhouse, 306 West 109th Street, which will be formally opened at that time.

Alterations are now being made at the garage of the American Locomotive Automobile Company, 1,856 Broadway, corner of Sixty-second Street, to make room for the Corbin Motor Vehicle Corporation. The Corbin concern will have a part of the big store at the northerly end, with an entrance on Broadway, the Locomotive people keeping the major part of the salesroom for their Berliet cars.

There is no mystery about starting a motor on the spark. The explanation is that so long as compression is held in a cylinder the spark can be used to ignite the charge and start the motor. At St. Louis the other day a Winton car was started by the operator from the seat on compression that had been held an entire week, as the result of perfect fitting cylinders, pistons, and rings.

Charles E. Durysa, consulting engineer of the American Motor Car Manufacturers' Association, says that the word carburetor is misused for vaporizer. The former implies a body of liquid and carburets the air that passes over or through the liquid. The latter converts into vapor that portion admitted at each suction stroke. He is in favor of the word "mixer" to specifically describe the device for mixing gasoline and air.

ENGLISH ATHLETES INVITED.

Oxford and Cambridge Athletes Challenged—July 4 Suggested.

Special to The New York Times.

NEW HAVEN, Conn., April 29.—President Cyril Sumner of the Yale Athletic Association announced to-night that the challenge to Oxford and Cambridge for an international meet had been finally sent by Manager Rowe of the Harvard team and himself.

"It might more properly be called an invitation than a challenge," Manager Sumner said "and we put our request for a meet that way, for it was really the turn of the Englishmen to send a defi. We suggested the Fourth of July for the date, and we further stated that either the Harvard stadium or some satisfactory grounds in New York would be acceptable to hold the affair."

In case Oxford and Cambridge wish a later date, as is generally expected, they will be accommodated. Yale and Harvard both favor the Harvard stadium, but former meets in this country have been in New York, and if Oxford and Cambridge favor that city this will be the final selection.

RACING ON THE LOWER BAY.

Yachtsmen Preparing for an Active Spring Season—Lipton Cup Boats.

Three boats in the Gravesend Bay dory class have been ordered during the past Winter, two for the Atlantic Yacht Club and one for the New York Canoe Club. The latter is for Louis S. Tiemann and the others for Bartow S. Weeks and R. E. Spier. These with the seven boats building for the Lipton Cup races and one new twenty-two-footer for the Atlantic Yacht Club fleet will be the sum of the building on the lower bay.

All the seven Lipton Cup boats, with the exception of the Marine and Field Club boat for C. M. Camp have been named and are well along toward completion. B. V. R. Speidel will call his New York Canoe Club boat Goblin, while the Bensonhurst Club boat will be called Bensonhurst. Commodore D. D. Allerton of the New York Canoe Club will call his boat Blue Bill and the Atlantic Yacht Club representative for C. M. Lembcke will be called Gunda. The two Crescent Athletic Club boats will be known as New Moon and Nereid.

The members of the Bergen Fishing Club fished at Iberia Creek, off Long Beach, Sunday, and they caught eighty-one blackfish, two fluke, and seven codfish.

Eels are reported to be biting at Newark Bay. P. McDonald fished from Dressig's float, at the foot of Forty-sixth Street, Bayonne, recently and caught thirty-five on a bob.

Joseph Schumacker, John Horle, and Jacob Schmidt, mambers of the Friendly Fishing Club, tried the waters in the vicinity of Sandy Hook Sundny and caught twenty-four blackfish and asven ling.

The steamer Angler baa been making thrca ragular trips to the fishing banks weekly and, commencing to-day, will make daily trips, except Monday, leaving Eighteanth Streat Pier, Manhattan, at 7:15 A. M., and the Battery Landing nt 8:05 A. M.

Alex Smith May Go Abroad Again.

It is probable that Alexander Smith, the professional of the Nassau County Golf Club, will go abroad to play in the open British championship this year, provided the Nassau Club will grant him a leave of absence. This will mean he will not defend his title in the American open championships to be held at Philadelphia in June. If his request for permission to go abroad is granted he will sail the first part of next week for the other side in order to gat thoroughly acclimated before he is compelled to play on English soil.

Sound Raceabouts Go to Philadelphia.

Three well-known raceabouts on Long Island Sound have been sold to Philadelphia yachtsmen and will be used this year in an effort to encourage small-boat racing within the Corinthian Yacht Club. They are A. H. Pirie's Tartan, bought by Charles Longstreth; Alfred C. Bostwick's Mystral, bought by Robert Toland, and S. C. Hopkins's Rascal II., bought by Robert Berry.

HARVARD GETS ENGLISH BOAT.

Ordered the Shell When Abroad—It Is Now En Route to This Country.

Harvard has ordered an English racing shell abroad, and it is now en route across the ocean. It was built by Sims of Putney, a son of the famous English boat builder, and embodies all the typically English ideas of racing shells, including the peculiar seating. It will be tried out at Harvard on its arrival, and if it proves more effective than the American shell will be employed in the race with Yale. It is said the new boat is 63 feet long, 23½ inches beam amidships, and 9½ inches depth amidships, shallowing to 6½ inches forward and 5½ inches aft. The seats are moved about two inches outboard alternately to port and starboard, to starboard for the port oars and to port for the starboard, giving, so the English assert, a greater leverage to the oar on the outrigger.

It is said that Sims has turned out an especially fine example of his art, and that it will be found of tremendous advantage to Harvard if the men can accustom themselves to the novelty of swinging in two lines instead of the familiar single fashion. The shell was ordered abroad when the Harvard crew was in England last Summer to row the race with Cambridge University.

New York A. C. Billiards.

W. D. Lyon and Dr. Walter G. Douglas were the winners last night in the continuation of the billiard handicap at the New York Athletic Club. Both matches were decided upon the special table set up in the recreation room of the clubhouse, Sixth Avenue and Central Park South, before a large gathering of club members. In the early match Lyon, handicapped at 50, defeated J. F. Spier, 90 points, by the score of 50 points to 40. Dr. Douglas, the scratch player at 200 points, defeated Charles H. Steinway, 125 points, 200 to 94.

The games schedniled for to-night will bring together Dr. Samuel McCullough, 75, vs. Theodore Cabbeer, 75, and Chalmers D. Coloman, 125, vs. W. N. Leslie, Jr., 115.

HITCH OVER FOOTBALL RULES.

Penn and Chicago Game May Be Called Off—Talk of Columbia Match.

It appears there is a hitch in the arrangements for the Chicago-Pennsylvania football game arranged for Nov. 9, which may or may not be straightened out. The trouble arises through the necessity of Chicago observing the Conference rule in her games, while Pennsylvania employs a different code. This means that Chicago can play men only three years and must consequently exclude her present seniors from her team, while Pennsylvania may use all three of her higher class men. Bath teams debar freshmen, so Chicago can only draw from her sophomore and junior classes.

The whole matter is held in abeyance awaiting a solution of the difficulty. Meanwhile it is said that Pennsylvania is waiting to see what will be the outcome of the movement to restore football at Columbia. If the Morningside institution allows intercollegiate games to be played, it is possible that Columbia may appear on Penn's schedule on Nov. 9 instead of the Western team.

Miss Kellerman Disappoints Crowd.

Miss Helen Kellerman, the Australian Swimmer, failed to make her scheduled appearance last night at the Interior Baths, 232 West Sixtieth Street. A large number of spectators, among whom were many women, had assembled and they waited patiently until nearly 11 o'clock, when the announcement that Miss Kellerman had apparently changed her plans ended their weary waiting around the tank.

In order to afford some entertainment for the crowd, Paul Roetger, former fancy diving champion of Germany, gave an exhibition. He also won a much-prolonged stroke competition with J. D. Schwartz second and J. McCubbin third. This was so long drawn out that the crowd amused itself by jeering the swimmers. There was also an impromptu sixty-yard handicap, which was won by George South, Twenty-third Street Young Men's Christian Association, (5 seconds;) Joseph Ruddy, New York Athletic Club, (scratch,) second, and John Mantell, West Side Young Men's Christian Association, (8 seconds,) third. Time—0:35 3-5.

RAINFALL HELPS CROPS

Wheat Prices Weaken and Stocks Are Influenced on News—Paris Still Drawing Gold from London.

For the general advance in prices in yesterday's stock market, advices from the wheat country telling of the coming of much needed rains and the unexpectedly good showing of the local banks in their regular return on Saturday were responsible. It was apparent, also, that there had been built up in the past two weeks a large short interest in a number of active stocks. The theory of the speculators who were operating for the fall in these issues was that the extreme dullness of the market indicated that its next move would be downward since the resistance in that direction would be least. This reasoning, as it proved, was fallacious and did not include the possibilities of rain over the wheat area and the unlooked-for betterment of the banking situation. Advices from Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas which reached Wall Street during the course of the day, told of the breaking of the drought in the crop country, and reports from different points in this territory described the outlook as much improved. What effect these welcome rains will have upon the insect pest, which have also wrought much damage to Winter wheat, remains to be seen, but there has at all times been a belief in the financial community that the harm worked by the "green bug" has been very much exaggerated. Just what relief has been afforded to the wheat districts will be better known after the publication to-day of the weekly Weather Bureau report. There was little additional news of interest to financial markets, but a goodly crop of rumors appeared during the day, most of these having to do with Union Pacific, which was the most active stock of the trading and the issue to show the largest advance, its gain amounting to more than 4 points. Transactions in this one stock made up practically one-third of the entire business of the day. Among the rumore set afloat in connection with its rise were those that a holding company along the lines of the Northern Securities Company was to be formed in order to meet any adverse recommendations on the part of the Inter-State Commerce Commission. A second report had it that Mr. Harriman was at once to assume a less conspicuous part in the management of the property, and that a representative of a well-known banking house, heretofore on terms not the most friendly with Mr. Harriman and his associates, was to take a place in the Board of Directors. For these and other similar stories, authoritative denials were, of course, obtained. A more plausible explanation of the movement of the stock is to be found in the fact that it has been heavily sold by speculators, and that, resting as it has out of line with other stocks and its dividend return, the opportunity for the demonstraton against these operators was offered and taken. The close of the market found prices near the best of the day.

Explanations of the unexpectedly good showing of the banks on Saturday were not entirely convincing, and it is probable that the actual condition of the money market was not reflected in that return. The banks reported another loss to the Sub-Treasury, to which, since Saturday, they have paid out on balance $767,000. The demand from inland institutions continues strong. Money rates were again easy, call money lending at 1 per cent., which is the lowest rate of the year thus far. Time money underwent no change, but the banks continue rather unwilling to commit themselves to long time obligations. Paris secured a substantial part of the gold laid down in London during the day from South Africa and the further decline in the Paris check on London indicated the intention of the French Bank to continue its takings of English gold. Demand sterling here was firm, the rate rising at one time to within 25 points of the highest of the year.

PHILADELPHIA PRICES.

Special to The New York Times.

PHILADELPHIA, April 29.—Local trading quieted down materially, little activity being shown, except in two or three issues. Offerings of stocks were sufficient to meet the demand, but as they were well taken prices did not vary a great deal. Philadelphia Rapid Transit, however, showed the effect of profit-taking. The absorption of Cambria Steel and United Gas Improvement was regarded as "good." Reading was active, but United States Steel common was rather quiet. Inside information here is that the dividend will not be changed to-morrow. The local bank statement was unfavorable, loans increasing $1,977,000, while surplus reserve fell off $1,799,750, reducing the total of that item to $7,214,000. Total sales, 25,408 shares.

TOPICS IN WALL STREET.

There was just one real feature to the stock market yesterday, and that was Union Pacific, which furnished more than one-third of the trading and practically all tha gossip. It is certain that the rumors were not the influencing factors in the advance, and it is equally certain that it was ths strength of the stock that superinduced the extreme imaginative activity during the day. Every rumor that has done duty for the past two or three weeks was revived for the occasion, from the resignation of Mr. Harriman to a holding company for all tha Union Pacific roads. There was so much gossip that some part of it must come true aventually, but traders were disposed to believa that there was nothing very important behind the movement in the stock. Nearly every operator on the floor was perfectly willing to admit that Union Pacific can be advanced in a narrow market like the present with only a little exertion on the part of those qualified to mova tha stock. The necessary qualifications would seem to be some nerve, a little persistence, and an abiding faith in tbe value of tha stock at these prices. It seems reasonable to suppose, traders assert, that the insiders will not oppose an advance in the price of the stock.

***

One of the causes contributing to a more optimistic frama of mind on the part of stock operstors was the easier tone in wheat. One of the discouraging factors was the narrowness of tha market and the concentration of activity in one or two issues. Those who watch the market voiced the opinion that very little can be expected when trading is concentrated as it was yesterday. Tha transactions in issues other than Union Pacific and Reading were very smnll, comparatively speaking. Comment at the close of the market was not especially cheerful, although the net changes would seem to induca some optimism. Professionals followed tha advance in Union very gingerly. They stood ready to take to their heels on the first sign of weakness, and they limited tbeir operations in other stocks materially. They wore content to follow, but balked at leading an aggressive movament.

***

In view of the fact that the Directors of the Steel Corporation will meet to-day for dividend action, it was surprising that the Steel stocks were so apathetic in yesterday's market. Usually there is enough vigor in the professional trading to force a respectable market nnd a fair amount of trading on the ave of a dividend in these popular stocks. As it was, they were merely firm and lacked any decisive feature. Guesses as to the dividend found their way into tha gossip, but there seemed to be more or less unanimity concerning the maintenance of the regular dividend on the common stock. It is a curious fact, but true, that some of the big traders in the Steel stocks who are in a measure identified with the industry itself, have been very bearish for some time past. They take a position of optimism on the industry and pessimism on tha stocks. They do not explain the logic of this very nice distinction.

***

Some curiosity is manifested as to the sustained strength in some of the city issues, particularly the 4 per cents. of most recent issue. The expectation of another bond issue in the near future has had little effect, but, of course, tha market is very dull. Nevertheless, private offerings of a fairly large amount do not seem to have had any influence. The market is not peculiar in any respect, but an easier tone had been expected. Brokers find very little bidding for the bonds, but the quotations, and, presumably, the actual market, are about 101½ to 101¼.

***

Gradually the number of banks making returns to the Clearing House, which show less than the required reserve is growing smaller. The numbar on last Saturday was about 17, which is an improvement over previous weeks. There are many things which conspire to bring the reserves of the banks below the required limit, and these facts are very well known to the supervising officials. The power of the Controller of the Currency in the case of National tanks is scarcely ever invoked in the case of a bank whose reserve is below a required amount.

***

From time to time the announcement is seen on the news bulletins that certain towns and cities making offerings of bonds have failed to receive bids and that the offering has been withdrawn and the securities sold privately. There are men in the financial district who kaep a very close watch on these announcements and who make a comfortable living through the failure of these towns and cities to find ready bidders. Usually they have a list of individuals interested in municipal bonds, and with this as a baeis they write to tho Treasurer or other officsr of the town and ask forgan option on part or all of the issue. If they get it they make a vigorous campaign among their clients and usually succeed in placing an amount sufficient to pay them well for their exertion. Sometimes they introduce themselves to the officer in charge well ahead of the date of sals by writing for details and expressing their intention of bidding.

***

Extracts from market letters when grouped together show very conclusively the possibilities of a divergence of opinion between the heads of big brokerage houses. The markct letter industry is a flourishing one, and every wire house finds it necessary to send out at the close of the day or before the beginning of business a résumé or prediction of the day's business. In some cases one of the partners writes tho letter, in others the room manager, so called, and in some cases special men ara employed. Usually where a special man is employed he is permitted to shape the letter according to the information which he gleans from important interests which he may consult. If the house takes a distinct position on the markot in the shape of a pool participation he must needs govern himself accordingly. But as a general rule markst letters are honest expressions of opinion, and a perusal of half a dozen of the most quoted will show very conclusively how opinions can differ.

***

Nowadays there seems to be more interest or as much at least in the copper industry as in steel and iron. There is a wide difference in the views of coppsr men concerning the futura of the metal, but all tha important interests assert that a break in the price need not be expected. "It would not surprise me," said a copper man yestorday, "if the metal were to sell at 28 cents before the first week in July. From my point of view, that is, the point of view of tha sallsrs of the metal, this is not a too glowing prospect. Consumers are holding back, and when they do comn in they must pay the price for it. The inquiries for copper for delivery in the last six months of the year are heavy and very significant. Those who ara waiting for concessions will ba disappointed, or, if they are not, I do not know anything about actual conditions."

Ona paragraph in this column last week dealing with trading in grain and the commissions paid therefor failed to note that tha rule making the commission one-eighth for each operation, tbat is, one-eighth for buying and one-eighth for selling, had been rescinded after having been in operation for a short time. The paragraph conveyed the idea that it was still in effect.

Trading in Most Issues Little Better Than Nominal, but Prices Move Up.

MANHATTAN TRANSIT UP

Ths curb market was extremely quiet except in spots yesterday, though prices made substantial advances undsr tbe prevailing strong tone, and in a number of instances gains of 1 point were recorded. Manhattan Transit was the feature of the trading in tbe industrial list, and in point of activity this issua outstripped the whole market. Sales of over 11,000 were made between 5⅝ and 6⅝, the best price reacbed in recent markets.

Steamship was slightly easier. In ths mining group Dominion Copper dsveloped considarabla strength, advancing ⅝ on limited buying. Nevada Consolidated slightly firmer. Nevada-Utah was strong. Nipissing was steady, but neglected. United Copper was slightly higher. Furnaca Creek improved a small fraction. Tramp Consolidated broke sbarply nearly 15c, with a recovery of about one-balf of tha loss on the rumor that 100,000 treasury stock would be offered at 1. Boston Conealidatsd improved ⅝. Fluctuations elsewhere were small. Bonds wera dull and about steady.

GRAIN AND PROVISIONS.

WHEAT—The appearance of rain in Kansas was the basis for a declins yesterday from which thers was little or no recovery. Tha rain extendsd pretty well through the Southwest, and more was predicted for Kansas. Conditions in the Northwest remained unspringlike, but were not counted particularly as a bull asset. Foreign markets showed declines of ½ to ¾d at Liverpool, 30 points at Paris, and 1⅝ to 2 marks at Berlin. The visible supply caused soms selling at midday, as it showed an increase last year of 2,722,000 bushels. On the break exporters took 25 loads. Interior receipts were liberal and seaboard clearances rather light. Cash wheat in New York closed easy, as follows: No. 2 red, 83¼c, elevator, and 88¾c, free on board, afloat; No. 1 Northern, Duluth, 95¾c, and No. 2 Hard Winter, 90¾c, free on board, afloat, opening navigation.

CORN—Corn opened about ½c lower in sympathy with wheat, but was well suported for the balance of the day, and near the close rallied quite sharply in the West. Liverpool was ¼d lower. world's shipments aggregated 4,779,000 bushels, compared with 8,299,000 bushels the previous week, and commission houses sold moderately. The visible supply decreased 1,293,000 bushels. Exporters bought 10 loads, and cash corn in New York closed as follows: No. 2, 60c elevator, and 57¼c free on board, afloat; No. 2 white, 58c, and No. 2 yellow, 57½c, free on board, afloat.

THE FOREIGN MARKETS.

Developments of Yesterday in London, Paris, and Berlin.

LONDON, April 29.—Money was temporarily dearer in the market to-day, owing to the call for over £2,000,000 of this Japanese loan. Discounts were firm.

Operators on the Stock Exchange were mostly idle, and the business transacted was featureless, with consols and other first-class securities still drooping under fresh loan rumors. Prices hardened slightly in the afternoon on the Bank of England's getting the bulk of the gold in the open market, but consols again drooped on realizations.

Americans were favorably affected by the better New York bank statement. They opened above parity and improved in the forenoon, with Pacific stocks leading. Later New York bid up Union Pacific and a few other specialties, and the market closed steady after a fair amount of business had been transacted.

Mexican rails were in good demsnd and dearer. Japanese imperial 6s of 1904 closed at 101¾. Kaffirs were flat in the early part of the day, owing to fears of the repatriation of the Chinese coolies in South Africa, but at the close prices were firmer.

There was keen competition from Paris to-day for tho large supplies of gold in the market, totaling £1,200,000. The Bank of England, however, outbid its French competitors and obtained £700,000 at a half-penny advance. India took £200,000, and Paris obtained the balance, £300,000.

Bullion amounting to £36,000 was taken into ths Bank of England on balance to-day.

CAN'T TOUCH SURPLUS SENATOR PLATT SAYS

U. S. Express Co. Stockholders Get Reply to Demand for Higher Dividends.

NEW LAWS CUT PROFITS

Big Fund Needed for Emergencies—Shareholders' Committee Planning to Act.

Shareholders in the United States Express Company have undertaken to get together in an effort to force the officers of the company to make more liberal disbursements in dividends on the contention that the cash assets are from 25 to 30 times the original capital of $10,000,000. So far all that has come of the movement has been the issuance of a reply to this claim of large liquid assets in the form of a circular sent to shareholders over the signature of Thomas C. Platt, the President of the company, in which he says that the free assets do not amount to more than its $10,000,000 nominal capital stock. What surplus the company may have over this amount Mr. Platt informs the stockholders, "to correct any possible erroneous impression," is not available for distribution.

The minority stockholders who have undertaken to form a nucleus for protestants to join are A. L. Banister and Samuel S. Hatt. Neither of these men or their counsel would discuss their plan of campaign yesterday. They said that as the United States Express Company was a joint partnership and not a corporation the matter would have to be adjusted between the partners. The officers of the company were equally reticent.

It is less than a year ago since another minority committee made a similar attempt to induce the officials of the company to make a more liberal dividend distribution. It fell flat, however, for lack of sufficient support, and the officers of the company took no official notice of the movement.

Senator Platt, in his circular goes into some detail in giving his reasons for keeping the dividends down and lays stress on the prospect of further hostile legislation decreasing the company's earning power, at the same time showing that increased expenses in the past few years have kept the earnings down to 5 per cent. of gross receipts. The following reasons, he says, have deterred the Directors from increasing dividends:

"The company is not a corporation, but a voluntary association in which every shareholder is personally liable for the company's obligations. It has been the aim of the Directors to accumulate a fund sufficient to protect stockholders against personal liability. The Directors have been led to this conclusion especially by the obligations assumed in contracts with railroad corporations, which require the company to pay the railroads a certain guaranteed percentage of gross express earnings. These railroad guarantees now outstanding under contract amount to more than $25,000,000.

"The risk involved in carrying millions of money, especially under contract with the Government, makes it desirable to have a large surplus fund.

"The increased payments to railroads, higher labor costs and advance in prices of supplies have kept net earnings down to 5 per cent. of the present gross receipts. In 1906 the company paid the railroads $1,661,000 more than in 1904, and it paid for labor in 1906 $860,000 more than in 1904, while the increase in earnings over 1906 was but $1,552,000.

"Hostile legislation has decreased, and must continue to decrease, the company's receipts by affecting rates. In twelve of the twenty-six States in which the company does business laws have been passed in the last three months enlarging the powers of the Railroad Commissioners. One State arbitrarily reduced all express rates 25 per cent. after Jan. 1, 1907. A reduction in in-State rates generally means a reduction in inter-State rates Over twenty bills adverse to express companies have been introduced in Legislatures in the last three months. In the last two years ten States have by statute increased express company taxes."

LEITER DENIES POOL DEAL.

Testifies in Brokers' Suit He Refused to Go Into Hoadley Deal.

Joseph Leiter, one of the defendants in a suit against himself, Joseph H. Hoadley, and C. F. Judson, brought by Franklin Scott & Co., brokers, to recover certain losses caused by the collapse of the pool in the stock of the International Power Company, was on the stand all day yesterday before Supreme Court Justice Giegerich. The amount sued for in the present case is $86,000, and Judson, one of the defendants, gave testimony connecting him with the pool which failed when the stock of the company broke.

Leiter declared that he was not a member of the pool. "I told Hoadley that I would not have anything to do with it," said the witness, "and that I would not, under any circumstances, render Judson any assistance."

Leiter then told of conversations he had with Hoadley and Judson after he had come back from Europe in November, 1906. "Judson told Hoadley that she had bought 600 shares of International Power stock and was unable to carry it," said the witness. "I then proposed that we three should make a pool and share in the profits and losses, each one to take a third share. Hoadley then got 580 shares from the Cramps of Philadelphia, and with the 600 shares held by Judson, they constituted all of the shares we ever held in a pool."

The witness added that this poll was wound up Dec. 18, 1901, and that neither Judson nor Hoadley had any authority to buy stock for him after that. The case is still on.

U. S. STEEL MEETING TO-DAY.

Dividends Likely to be Unchanged and Officials Re-elected.

No changes are expected at the quarterly meeting of the Directors of the United States Steel Corporation to be held to-day, at which the officials for the coming year will be named and dividends on the common and preferred shares declared.

Regarding the dividend on the common stock, the most generally accepted view is that it will be allowed to remain at the present rate of 2 per cent. a year. While the earnings last year were much more than enough to pay a rate in excess of this amount, the opinion is that the present rate will be maintained for some time longer.

President Corey and the other officers of the Steel Corporation, it was said yesterday, will all be re-elected. One of the Directors of the company said that so far as he knew no changes in the official staff of the company are contemplated.

MAXWELL IN D. & H. BOARD.

No Other Changes Likely at May Meeting of Managers, He Says.

J. Rogers Maxwell confirmed yesterday the recent reports that he expected to become a member of the Board of Managers of the Delaware & Hudson Company at the annual meeting of the stockholders on May 14. Mr. Maxwell added that he knew of no other changes if any are likely. Nothing like a general reorganization of the board, he said, was proposed so far as he knew. He expressed the opinion that with a practical railroad man like President Loree at the head of the road it was likely to develop a good deal more rapidly than it had in the past.

President Loree, who recently inspected the company's lines in this State and Pennsylvania, is now inspecting the Canadian lines of the company, including the Quebec extension, now under construction.

$35,000,000 Loan for Pacific Road.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 29.—The Directors of the Northwestern Pacific Railroad Company, the corporation which recently took over the management of the California Northwestern and North Shore lines in Marin County, to-day ratified the issuance of bonds to the amount of $35,000,000. The stock in the new corporation is held jointly by the Southern Pacific and Santa Fé Companies.

At a meeting of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment held April 5, 1907, in the Old Council Chamber, City Hall, Borough of Manhattan, the following proceedings were had:

Whereas, The New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company has, under date of May 25, 1906, made application to this Board for a grant of the right, privilege, and franchise to construct, maintain, and operate ducts or subways through, under, and along East One Hundred and Ninety-fourth Street, Kingsbridge Road, and other streets in the Borough of The Bronx; and

Whereas, In pursuance to such laws this Board adopted a resolution September 14, 1906, fixing the date for public hearing thereon as September 28, 1906, at which citizens were entitled to appear and be heard, and publication was had for at least two days in "The Sun" and "the New York Times," newspapers designated by the Mayor, and in the CITY RECORD for ten days immediately prior to the date of hearing, and the public hearing was duly held on such day; and

Resolved, That the following form of the resolution for the grant of the franchise or right applied for by the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, containing the form of proposed contract for the grant of such franchise or right, be hereby introduced and entered in the minutes of this Board as follows, to wit:

Resolved, That the Board of Estimate and Apportionment hereby grants to the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company the franchise or right fully set out and described in the following form of proposed contract for the grant thereof, embodying all of the terms and conditions, including the provisions as to rates and charges upon and subject to the terms and conditions in said proposed form of contract contained, and that the Mayor of the City of New York be and he hereby is authorized to execute and deliver such contract in the name and on behalf of The City of New York, as follows, to wit:

NEW YORK CENTRAL AND HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY.

Proposed Form of Contract.

This contract, made this day of 190 , by and between THE CITY OF NEW YORK, party of the first part, by the Mayor of said City acting for and in the name of said City, under and in pursuance of the authority of the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of said City, and the NEW YORK CENTRAL AND HUDSON RIVER RAILROAD COMPANY, for itself, and as lessee of the NEW YORK AND HARLEM RAILROAD COMPANY, a domestic corporation of the State of New York, hereinafter called the Company, party of the second part, witnesseth:

In consideration of the mutual covenants and agreements herein contained, the parties hereto do hereby covenant and agree as follows:

Section 1. The City of New York hereby grants to the Company, subject to the conditions and provisions hereinafter set forth, the franchise, right, and privilege to construct, maintain, and operate a subway not to exceed two feet and eleven inches in width, with the necessary splicing chambers, for the sole purposes of transmitting power for the operation of its trains by electricity, as required by Chapter 425 of the Laws of 1906, said subway to be beneath the surface of the following named streets, avenues, and highways between the points described as follows, all situate in the Borough of The Bronx, City of New York, to wit:

Beginning at a point in Webster Avenue where East One Hundred and Ninety-fourth Street, if prolonged southeasterly, would intersect the right of way of the New York and Harlem Railroad Company; thence northwesterly across Webster Avenue to East One Hundred and Ninety-fourth Street, and thence northwesterly through East One Hundred and Ninety-fourth Street to a point between Valentine Avenue and the Grand Boulevard and Concourse, at the intersection of East One Hundred and Ninety-fourth Street and Kingsbridge Road; thence in a general northwesterly direction through Kingsbridge Road to a point where said Kingsbridge Road intersects the right of way of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company.

Also beginning at a point on the westerly side of the right of way of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company on the easterly side of Exterior Street, about 300 feet south from West One Hundred and Ninety-fourth Street; thence westerly across said Exterior Street to and along private property of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company;

—the said right of way and the location of the said splicing chambers being shown on a map entitled:

"N. Y. C. & H. R. R. R. Leased and Operated Lines. Electrification of Lines. Location Plan—Cable Ducts. Kingsbridge Road and 194th Street, New York City."

—dated October 30, 1905, signed by W. J. Wiggus, Vice President, copy of which is annexed hereto and made a part of this grant.

Sec. 2. The grant of this franchise, right, and privilege is subject to the following conditions:

First—The said franchise, right, and privilege to lay one subway in each of the streets, avenues, or highways, and between the limits as hereinbefore described, and the franchise, right, and privilege to maintain and operate the same shall be held and enjoyed by the said company, its lessees, or successors for a term of twenty-five years from the date of the signing of this contract, with the privilege of renewal of said grant for a further period of twenty-five years, upon a fair revaluation of said franchise, right, and privilege.

If the Company shall determine to exercise its privilege of renewal, it shall make application to the Board of Estimate and Apportionment of the City of New York, or to any authority which shall be authorized by law to act for the city in place of the said board. Such application shall be made at any time not earlier than two years and not later then one year before the expiration of the original term of this grant. The determination of the revaluation shall be sufficient, if agreed to in writing by the company and by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, or by such other authority in its place. If the company and the board, or such other authority in its place for this city, shall not reach such agreement on or before one day one year before the expiration of the original term of this grant, then the annual rate of compensation for such succeeding twenty-five years shall be reasonable, and either the city, (by the board or by such other authority in its place,) or the Company shall be bound upon request of the other to enter into a written agreement with each other, fixing the rate of such compensation at such amount as shall be reasonable; and if the parties shall not forthwith agree upon what is reasonable, then the parties shall enter into a written agreement fixing such annual rate at such amount as shall be determined by three disinterested freeholders selected in the following manner:

One disinterested freeholder shall be chosen by the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, or its successors in authority; one disinterested freeholder shall be chosen by the Company; these two shall choose a third disinterested freeholder, and the three so chosen shall act as appraisers, and shall make the revaluations aforesaid. Such appraisers shall be chosen at least six months prior to the expiration of the contract, and their report shall be filed with the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, or its successors in authority, within three months after they are chosen. They shall act as appraisers and not as arbitrators. They may base their judgment upon their own experience, and upon such information as they may obtain by inquiries and investigations without the presence of either party. They shall have the right to examine the books of the Company and its officers under oath. The valuations as ascertained, fixed, and determined shall be conclusive upon both parties, but shall not in any event be less than the minimum amount fixed as the sum to be paid annually for the last year of the original grant, if in any case the annual rate shall not be fixed prior to the termination of the original term of this grant, then the Company shall pay the annual rate theretofore prevailing until the new rate shall be determined, and shall then make up to the City the amount of any excess of the annual rate then determined over the previous annual rate. The compensation and expenses of the said appraisers shall be borne jointly by the City and the Company, each paying one-half thereof.

Second—Upon the termination of this contract, or if the same be renewed, then at the termination of said renewal term, or upon the termination of the rights hereby granted for any other cause, all subways and appurtenances thereto, constructed pursuant to this contract, shall be and become the property of The City of New York without compensation therefor, and the same may be used by the City for any purpose whatsoever. If, however, at the termination of this grant, as above, the City, by tha Board of Estimate and Apportionment, or its successors in authority, shall so order hy resolution, the said Company shall remove, at its own expense, said subway and all appurtenances thereto, and shall restore tha streets and pavements to their original condition.

Third—The Company, its successors or assigns, shall pay to The City of New York for this privilege an annual sum of four thousand five hundred dollars ($4,500). Such sum shall be paid into the treasury of The City of New York on November 1 of each year, and shall be for tha annual amount due to September 30 next preceding; provided, however, that the first payment shall he only for that proportion of four thousand five hnndred dollars ($4,500) as the time ending with this contract by the Mayor before September 30 next preceding shall haar to the whole of one year.

Any and all payments made by the terme of this franchlee to The City of New York hy the Company shall not ha considered in any manner in the nature of a tax, but each payments shall be in addition to any and all taxes of whatsoever kind or description, now or hereafter required to he paid hy any ordinance of The City of New York or by any law of the State of New York.

Fourth—The annual charges or payments shall continue throughout the whole term of the privilege hereby granted, whether original or renewal, as hereinbefore provided, notwithstanding any clause in any statute or in the charter of any other company, providing for payments of suhway righte or franchises at a different rate, and no assignment, lease, or sublease of the rights or privileges hereby granted, whether original or renewal, or of any part thereof, or of any of the rights mentioned herein, of of any part thereof, shall be valid or effectual for any purpose unless the said assignment, lease, or snhlease shall contain a covenant on the part of the assignee or lessee that tha same is subject to all the conditions of this grant, and that the assignee or lessee assumes and will be bound by all of said conditions, and especially said condition as to payments, anything in any statute or in the charter of such assignee or lessee to the contrary notwithstanding, and that the said assignee or lessee waives any more favorable conditions created by such statute or its charter, and that it will not claim by reason thereof, or otherwise, exemption from liability to perform each and all of the conditions of this grant. Nothing herein contained shall apply to any mortgages or mere lienor, but shall apply to any purchaser upon foreclosure or under or by virtue of any provision of a mortgage or lien.

Fifth—The rights and privilegee granted hereby shall not be assigned either in whole or in part, leased or sublet in any manner, nor shall title thereto or right, interest or property therein pass to or vest in any other person or corporation whatsoever, either hy the act of the Company, its succeseor or assigne, or by operation of law, whether under the provisions of the statutes relating to the consolidation or merger of any one or more of such corporations or otherwise, without the consent of The City of New York, acting hy the Board of Estimate and Apportionment, or its successor in authority, evidenced by an instrument under seal, anything herein contained to the contrary thereof in any wise notwithstanding, and the granting, giving or waiving of any one or more of such consents shall not render unnecessary any subsequent consent or consente. This provision, however, shall not apply to the making of a mortgage, but shall apply to a sale under foreclosure.

Sixth—The grant of this privilege is subject to whatever right, title, or interest the owners of abutting property or others may have in and to the streets, avenues, and highways on the route heretofore described.

Seventh—The company shall commence construction of the subway herein authorized within two months after the signing of this contract, and shall complete the construction of the same within five months from said date, otherwise this grant shall cease and determine, and all sums paid or which may be deposited with the Comptroller of the City as hereinafter provided, shall thereupon be forfeited to the City; provided, however, that the Board of Estimate and Apportionment may in its discretion extend such time for a period not exceeding one year, but such extension shall not be

IN THE REAL ESTATE FIELD.

Ogden Sale Ends with 891 Lots Sold for $1,670,675—Dwellings Prominent in the Day's Business —Sale of Crosby Street Building.

With the sale of 247 lots yesterday for a total of $539,950, Auctioneer Joseph P. Day concluded the offering of the Ogden estate property—at least for the present. Of the properties advertised to be sold there still remain several large waterfront parcels, concerning the exact boundaries of which, with regard to land under water, some points are yet to be settled between the War Department and the Ogden heirs. As soon as these difficulties have been adjusted, the waterfront properties will be readvertised and sold by order of the court.

For the four days during which the Ogden sale has been in progress, there have been sold 891 lots for a total of $1,670,675.

At yesterday's session the best prices were realized for lots facing the approach to Washington Bridge, where Aqueduct and Boscobel Avenuee join. For a plot, 87.10 by 126 by 15.10 by 131, the bid was $6,000, and for adjoining lots of depths ranging from 126 down to 56 feet, the prices scaled down from $5,100 to $2,975, with an average of about $4,700 for the lots 100 feet deep. The triangle, 69 by 80 by 50, at Boscobel and Plympton Avenues, sold for $4,700, while full lots on Plympton Avenue north of Boscobel Avenue brought $1,225 each.

On the east side of Aqueduct Avenue, just south of Merriam Avenue, prices ranged from $3,850 to $4,750, with abutting lots on the west side of Undercliff Avenue bringing from $1,425 to $1,925.

At the northwest corner of Sedgwick Avenue and Depot Place a large plot, 150 by 156 by 224 by 94.6, was sold for $31,600, and the plot of four and one-half lots on the corresponding corner at Sedgwick Avenue and 167th Street, for $15,700. Adjoining the latter plot on the west, eight lots with the right to use a canal basin brought $11,600. Other Sedgwick Avenue lots, between 167th Street and Depot Place, were struck down for an average of about $2,675 each. QUEENS—FOR SALE OR TO LET. | QUEENS—FOR SALE OR TO LET. | QUEENS—FOR SALE OR TO LE

Right on the Sound, 22 Minutes From 34th St. Ferry At Whitestone Landing Station In the City of New York.

In natural beauty and environments this Suburb has not its equal anywhere near New York. Being situated on a high bluff, every point commands magnificent views of the Sound and the shores beyond—even unto the distant Palisades.

HEALTHFULNESS IS INSURED BY ITS HIGH SITUATION.

The evolution of Beechhurst into a high-class and exclusive suburban colony is now in full progress. Houses ranging in cost from $6,000 to $15,000 are being constructed and will be finished in May.

The improvements for which we have spent over a quarter of a million dollars are all but completed. They include sewer and water mains, electric light, graded streets with cement sidewalks, a sea wall along the shore front, and various ornamental landscape effects.

As for transportation conveniences—there are trains every half hour during the busy hours of the day, and the railroad station is within four minutes' walk from the choicest part of the property. Prices of lots are not based on inflated valuations. We have not discounted the transportation improvements which will bring BEECHHURST as close to the heart of New York as 135th St. is to-day.

BOOKLET "T," CONTAINING PHOTOGRAPHS, WILL BE MAILED ON REQUEST.

The County Seat of Nassau

MINEOLA

Greatest Railroad Center in Nassau

At no time in the year does the country look so beautiful and so enchanting as in the Spring, and if you want to see a magic country where hundreds of houses are building and thousands of people are migrating, take a train on Saturday or Sunday at our expense and visit the territory of Mineola.

You Have Read Where and How Fortunes Were Made.

You believed these advertisements were simply dreams created in the minds of visionary real estate men. But evidence and facts have proved to you that the County of Queens has made fortunes for men during the year 1906.

There Are Greater Chances To-Day Than Last Year.

And if you will only shake off suspicion and get speculative and take advantage of an excursion and go and look the ground over you can readily see there is a lot of money waiting on every corner in Mineola for the investor.

WHY?

BECAUSE IT IS THE COUNTY SEAT.
BECAUSE IT IS A RAILROAD CENTER.
BECAUSE IT IS THE CENTER OF TROLLEYS.
BECAUSE IT IS THE AGRICULTURAL CENTER.
BECAUSE LAND IS CHEAPER THAN ELSEWHERE.

WHY?

YOU CAN'T MAKE A MISTAKE. IN 3 YEARS YOU WILL DOUBLE YOUR MONEY.

THE TIME TO GET IN IS NOW, TO-DAY, NOT NEXT MONTH.

ONLY 5 OF THE 200 OFFICES IN THE TIMES BUILDING

ARE VACANT.

There are Many Reasons for this Showing:

The building is the most central and most accessible office building in New York City.

Its tenants are selected with the greatest discrimination. High character and strictly legitimate business only accepted.

It is planned so that every office is an outside room.

No tall buildings near it to obstruct light.

The district has grown amazingly in the last three years.

The Times Square Station now ranks third in the Subway system—exceeded only by Brooklyn Bridge and Grand Central.

Times Square Station ticket sales have gained 100 per cent. in 2¼ years—that is, from 15,000 per day in November, 1904, to 29,429 in February, 1907.

Its elevator capacity with respect to rentable area is exceeded by that of only one office building in New York City.

Its ceilings are high.

It is the strongest office building ever erected.

Absolutely fireproof.

Doubly filtered water.

No steam in the building in Summer.

Wire outlets in every room for lights and telephones, telegraph, office boys, and stenographers.

Highest standard of operation for the safety, comfort, convenience, and health of occupants.

The building is a landmark.

More theatres, hotels and clubs located in its proximity than at any other point in the world.

UNITE IN DEMAND FOR CLEAN STREETS

Civic Clubs to Open Campaign for Reform of Present "Outrageous Conditions."

SCHOOL FOR THE SWEEPERS

Dr. S. A. Knopf Declares That Part of the Evils Are Due to Their Ignorance.

Representatives from various civic organizations met in the City Club yesterday afternoon on invitation of the club's Committee on Streets. After discussing the "outrageously disgraceful condition of the streets," as one speaker put it, and scoring the officials responsible for the situation, organized to fight for reform. A municipal housecleaning, the sweeping to be done by the broom of public opinion, was planned.

One of the representatives asked that charges he preferred against Borough President Ahearn as the official responsible for the present condition of the streets. And the rest demanded reforms of a decidedly radical character.

Resolutions were passed for the appointment of a committee to conduct the campaign. Each organization represented at the conference yesterday, and as many other organizations as may care to enlist in the cause, will have one delegate on this committee. The appointment of the committee will be made by George McAneny, President of the City Club, who presided over the conference. The suggestions offered during the conference were presented to this committee for its immediate consideration.

Wants Charter Amended.

The lack of coordination between the city departments was particularly lamented. President McAneny declared that nine-tenths of the trouble was caused by it. F. B. De Berard of the Merchants' Association asked what else could be expected in a city which has six Mayors, five of whom as Borough Presidents don't care what the real Mayor is doing. Henry Moscowitz of the East Side Civic Club offered a resolution asking for amendments to the city charter providing for the establishment of a central city department of streets, to which shall be committed those functions with relation to the care and control of the streets and highways now distributed among various uncoordinated departments and bureaus. The resolution was referred to the committee.

The Rev. Thomas R. Slicer pointed out that the Street Cleaning Department is directly under the Mayor's power because the head of the department is appointed by him. He showed further that the Commissioners of Accounts, "the eyes of the Mayor," have direct control over the bills to be paid contractors for work on the streets. Under this arrangement everything is referable to the Mayor and not to the Borough President, said Mr. Slicer.

There was some dispute as to whether the conference should make its actions subordinate to considerations now before the Academy of Medicine. Dr. J. S. Billings, Jr., explained that the Academy's section on public health adopted resolutions at a recent meeting asking the Mayor to appoint a commission to consider the problem and seek a solution of it. These resolutions are now before the Council of the Academy and will be presented on Thursday evening. President McAneny thought that the conference might fall behind the Academy in its advances.

"I look upon this meeting as of more importance than any of the Academy of Medicine on this question," declared Dr. Jacobi. "I would not subordinate any action of this conference to any resolutions now before the Academy."

It was finally suggested that the Academy shuld defer action on its resolutions or refer them to the Conference Committee for consideration. The matter was allowed to rest there.

Joseph M. Price, Chairman of the Committee on Streets of the City Club, said that the streets had been kept clean once, and could be kept clean again.

Need of Modern Methods.

Mrs. Josephine Redding told what the Woman's Municipal League had done. An investigation of three weeks by the Riverside Branch disclosed a record of inefficiency and slovenly service, said Mrs. Redding. Janitors of apartment houses reported that they could not get ashes emptied until they tipped the employes of the Street Cleaning Department. Thirteen barrels stood in front of a Broadway apartment for days for this reason. The men in the department overturned barrels of ashes into the streets and left their contents lying there. Louie Windmuller suggested that a street sweeping machine that he had seen in Toledo, Ohio, might be used to advantage here. It was an automobile that swept up the dirt and emptied it into a receptacle.

The possibility of flushing the streets with salt water was brought up by Mr. Windmuller.

Dr. S. A. Knopf of the Academy of Medicine suggested that the street sweepers should be required to pass through a training school, just as policemen and other city employes are required to do. He told of a sweeper he had seen sweeping dirt against the wind.

DOG WINS ITS OWN CASE.

Declines to Bark in Court When a Bark Would Have Convicted It.

For several minutes yesterday in Special Sessions Miss Marion H. Carter, a writer and artist who lives at 504 West 143d Street, did all that she could think of to get a small dachshund, who occupied with dignity about one-half of the witness chair, to bark, or at least to whine. When after about ten minutes the dog had not mede one whimper, Justices Olmsted, Mayo, and Wyatt decided that the animal couldn't bark, and Mrs. Fannie Henning, who lives almost behind Miss Carter at 521 West 142d Street, marched proudly out of court, the dog in her arms, happy in the assurance of the court that she was not guilty of disturbing the neighborhood in which she lives by keeping a barking dog.

For this was what Miss Carter had charged, and for which she had brought Mrs. Henning to court. Miss Carter had provided herself with photographs of the dog and typewritten memoranda of the discomforts to which she had been compelled to submit. Miss Carter testified that she had once counted 445 barks at three-minute intervals.

If any one hoped to embarrass the energetic young woman when she was asked how far the dog was from her window, they were disappointed, for Miss Carter answered, without a momont's hesitation:

"Just eighty-seven feet and a fraction. I measured the distance as the hypothenuse of a right angle triangle, keeping in mind that my window is on the fifth floor of the apartment house."

Other persons testified to the good character of the dog, and the trial threatened to prove unending when the Justices struck on the happy expedient of letting the dog testify in his own behalf. As it was, several hours were consumed between the first taking of testimony and the honorable acquittal of the dog.

RABBI SUMMONED TO COURT.

Dr. Browne of Temple Beth-El, Brooklyn, Acouses His Prayer Reader.

The Rev. Dr. Edward B. M. Browne, chief rabbi of the Temple Beth-El, Brooklyn, was summoned to the West Side Court yesterday by his Prayer Reader, Marcus Rosenstein of 78 West Ninety-fourth Street to explain why he had written a letter to Rosenstein in which he spoke disparagingly of the reader's character.

Dr. Browne accused Rosenstein of misusing funds of the 118th Street Synagogue while acting as a collector there. Rosenstein admitted that he had been short $50 in his accounts, but said the Trustees had dropped the matter and told him to keep the money as a gratuity for services rendered.

CHASED BALL TO HIS DEATH.

Ten-Year-Old George Allheim Hit by a New York Central Train.

Ten-year-old George Allheim of 63 East 122d Street was playing ball with several chums on Park Avenue, near 120th Street, late yesterday afternoon. The spot, because of the New York Central elevated structure there, is not much crowded. George was catcher. In the game the batsman struck a foul, and the ball sailed up to the railroad track. For a moment the boys were nonplussed, and then George said:

"Ah that's easy!"

They watched him with pride as he climbed up the pillar, which at that spot resembles an elevated road pillar. He was out of the view of the boys on the street for a minute. Then came a scream from a woman looking out of a fourth-story window on Park Avenue, as she pointed at the railroad structure. The next instant a train flew by above the boys on the street.

When Policeman Shaeffer of the East 126th Street police station had been found, he did with difficulty what little George had done with ease—climbed up the elevated pillar. He shouted at a lumber wagon, which was just passing the spot on Park Avenue, and with the aid of a rope the unconscious body of the boy was lowered from the railroad structure. He was hurried to the Harlem Hospital in the lumber wagon, but at that place George died of a fractured skull just as the doctors had laid him on the operating table.

New Liner Re d'Italia Inspected.

An inspection, followed by a midday dinner, was held yesterday on board the new Lloyd Sabaudo liner Re d'Italia, at Pier B, Jersey City. Cesare Conti, the general agent of the new line, was the host, and among his guests were the Italian Ambassador, Baron Meyor des Planches; Consul General Massigila, and Timothy L. Woodruff.

Devery Wins in Lawsuit.

Judge McLaughlin of the Third Municipal Court, at Jamaica, L. I., yesterday dismissed the action brought by Albert Bogart, an architect, of Rockaway Beach, against William S. Devery, former Chief of Police of New York. Bogert sued to recover $250, which he said was due him for drawing up plans for a house for Devery at Breezy Point.

AHEARN DEFIANT; CITED FOR CONTEMPT

Mayor's Board Gets Court Order to Force Him to Tell of Borough Affairs.

TEST TO COME TO-DAY

Expert Submits Figures Which, He Says, Show Improper Pay Roll and Other Entries.

Borough President John F. Ahearn, after he had refused to give testimony yesterday at the investigation into his department being held by the Commissioners of Accounts, was cited to appear in the Supreme Court to-day and show cause why he should not be punished for contempt. The order to show cause was issued by Justice Biscoff, and stated no particulars. It was granted on the application of Corporation Counsel Ellison, after agreement with Martin W. Littleton, Mr. Ahearn's counsel, who contends that the Commissioners of Accounts are without jurisdiction to question his client.

Mr. Ahearn was the first person called as a witness by Commissioner Mitchell when the hearing was resumed yesterday in the reception room of the Mayor's office. In his hand he carried a paper, and when Mr. Mitchell asked him to describe the workings of his department, he read the following statement:

Says Board Is Illegal.

I decline to answer these questions, not because there is anything in my offics or about my subordinates or me that I wish to conceal from you or from the public; not because I wish to be disrespectful to this commission; but because this commission has had five months' time in which to make a detailed investigation of all the affairs of the Borough, the fullest and freest access to all of its books, papers, and employes, has had the files and records of the Borough President's office taken away for examination, has employed private accountants for the purpose of making the examination, and has made more then thirty-three reports upon my office to the Mayor, all of which reports show that ths office is in good condition.

Because, also, the examination now being made by this commission is one as to the policy of my administration, a duty which was enjoined upon me by my election, and which cannot be taken away by the Commissioners of Accounts, not subjected to their reproof, scrutiny or criticism.

Because I respectfully challenge the power of this commission to conduct this examination in the manner and form and upon the subjects in which they are conducting it.

Mr. Mitchell asked several questions of a general nature, to all of which Mr. Ahearn replied that he declined to answer, on advice of counsel. He was finally excused, Mr. Mitchell informed him that his declination was not considered a justification. Shortly afterwards the application for the court order against him was made.

Accounts Improper, Expert Says.

During the day Marvin Scudder, the expert accountant, was examined by Mr. Mitchell and said that he had found no improper entries against the account for the restoration of streets in the books of the department, but his examination had shown that in 1904 the sum of $85,260.58 had been improperly entered in the account for pay roll. The pay roll as a whole was charged up against one account at one time, he said, and against another account at another time. There were entries for "laborers" and for "cart and horse" he said, while the city was not supposed to have anything to do with these things, which should have been furnished by the contractors.

At the afternoon session Mr. Scudder submitted a statement covering four years which seemed to show that $117,624.27 had been improperly entered on the pay roll account. The statement follows:

PAYROLL CHARGES.

	Total.	Estimated. Properly Charged.	Estimated. Improperly Charged.
1904	$52,500.14	$30,150	$22,440.14
1905	67,028.94	30,150	37,478.94
1906	76,487.69	30,150	46,337.69
1907	18,267.50	4,900	11,367.50
			$117,624.27

Another table presumably showed $200,528 improperly charged, according to Mr. Scudder. His table read:

RESTORING AND REPAVING FUND.

	Total.	May Have Been Properly Charged.	Improperly Charged.
1904	$85,260.58	$9,251.29	$76,009.29
1905	87,742.01	9,351.96	78,390.05
1906 to April 2, 1907	51,842.32	8,456.96	43,385.50
			$200,528.18

A third table showed pay roll charges made debits on the street improvement fund. It read:

STREET IMPROVEMENT FUND.

	Total.	Charged To Salaries.	Charged to St. Imp.	*
1904	$24,577.77	$10,791.05	$13,786.72	56.1
1905	22,134.84	10,627.30	11,507.54	52.0
1906	20,262.46	13,054.21	7,208.25	35.6

*Per cent. of total charged to street improvement.

There were some smaller tables of a similar nature, and Mr. Scudder, before leaving the stand, identified several pay rolls from which he had made his findings.

Mr. Scudder said that the changes made on the pay roll for the different years were of arbitrary character and that the work called for did not entitle the various stipulated changes in the pay roll as made up in the accounts.

A SHAKESPEARE EXHIBIT.

Columbia to Show Some Rare Contemporary Volumes.

An exhibit of first editions of Shakespeare and contemporaneous works about him and his works will be shown in the bibliographic room of the library at Columbia University to-morrow. The public will have an opportunity to inspect the exhibit for two weeks following the opening.

The collection will contain a dozen first folios, one of them being the most perfect Shakespearian folio extant. In addition there will be fifty later folios, all contemporaneous with Shakespeare himself. Between fifty and sixty volumes, each containing some early reference to Shakespeare, which appeared before any collection of the dramatist's plays were printed, will be shown. Added to this there will be at least eighty plays, printed over Shakespeare's name, now generally thought to be spurious.

Referee to Try Justice Fitzgerald.

Presiding Justice Hirschberg of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court in Brooklyn announced yesterday that a referee would be appointed to-day to investigate the charges preferred by the Brooklyn Bar Association against Justice Thomas W. Fitzgerald of the Court of Special Sessions. Eugene Conran, for the defendant, moved for a postponement to allow the drafting of an answer to the complaint. The motion was denied, and the defense was directed by the court to file an answer not later than to-day at noon.
